Christ, speaking of this desolating power—the papacy—says, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened,"—which marks a point previous to which the saints were taken out of the hands of the little horn power. Thus we perceive that 1260 years of the 1335 ended prior to the 19th of May, 1780, when the sun was darkened. Add 75 years to 1260 and you have 1335 years, which must end before May 19th, 1855, according to the evidence from the darkening of the sun. But we have abundant historical evidence that the papal power, i. e. the abomination that maketh desolate, was set up in 519, hence the 1335 days (years) end in 1854, which brings the coming of the Lord and the resurrection of the saints the present year.

Exposition of Ezek. chap. 38 and 39.

Continued.

The next year Judas hearing how the neighboring nations were confederating with the intent to destroy the whole race of the Jews; he immediately marched to that part of the country called Acrabattene, and there slew of the Edomites no less than twenty thousand men. "From thence he led them against the children of Bean, another tribe of the Edomites, that had been very troublesome to them; and, having beaten them out of the field, shut them up in two of their strong fortresses; and, after having besieged them there for some time, at length took them both, and put them to the sword, who were above twenty thousand more." (Prid. v. 2, p. 142.) "After this Judas passed over Jordan into the land of the Amonites where he had many conflicts with the enemies of the Jews; and, having slain great numbers of them, took Jazar, with the villages belonging thereto, and then returned again into Judea." Timotheus, governor of those parts, hearing of the success of Judas, gathered a large army, and invaded Judea. The Jews, after recommending their cause to God, engaged their numerous enemies with courage and vigor, and overthrew them with great slaughter, there being then slain of them twenty thousand and five hundred foot, and six hundred horsemen. About this time the Jews who dwelt in the cities of Gilead, were closely pressed by a strict seige. Whereon Judas and Jonathan immediately falling on Bassora, surprized the city, and having slain all the males, taken their spoils, and freed their brethren who were there imprisoned for slaughter, set the city on fire; and then, marching all night from thence to Dathema, came thither the next morning, "just as Timotheus and all his forces were storming the place; whereon falling on them behind, they put them all to the route, for being surprised with this sudden and unexpected assault, and terrified with the name of Judas, they were seized with a panic fright, and therefore immediately flung down their arms and fled; and Judas slew of them in the pursuit about eight thousand men. After this, Judas took Maspha, Casphon, Maked, Basor, and all the other cities of Gilead where the Jews were oppressed; and having thereby delivered them from the destruction designed for them, he treated all those places in the same manner as he had Bassora, that is, slew all the males, took their spoils, and set the cities on fire, and then returned to Jerusalem." Simon's success was not inferior to that of Judas, for he slew about three thousand of the enemy and took their spoils. (Prid. v. 2, pp. 143, 144.) Soon after this, Lysius besieged Bethsura, with a force of eighty thousand foot, twenty thousand horse, and thirty-two elephants. But Judas, with his little army, fell upon him and slew of his army, eleven thousand foot, and sixteen hundred horsemen, and put all the rest to flight. (Ibid.) Soon after this Timotheus came against Judas with one hundred and twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse, but the Jewish leader and the band that was with him were again victorious: and he slew of his enemies thirty thousand. "A great part of the rest of the vanquished army fled to Carnion, where Judas pursuing them, took the place; and whereas many of them thereon fled to the temple of Atargatis, which was in that city, thinking there to find safety, he set fire to it, and burnt it with all that were therein; and then, with fire and sword desolating the rest of the city, there slew in the whole, twenty five thousand more of Timotheus's forces that had taken refuge in it. And then gathering together all the race of Israel that were in the land of Gilead, or any of the parts adjoining, he carried them with him, on his return to Judea, in the same manner, and for the same reason, that Simon had the Israelites of Galilee the year before, and, for the same end as he did, planted them in the desolate places of the land of Judah. On his way to Jerusalem, he took the city of Ephron, and slew "twenty five thousand persons, took their spoils, and razed their city to the ground." "After this, Judas, carrying the war into the southern parts of Idumæa, smote Hebron, and all the towns thereof; and, after having dismantled this city, then the metropolis of Idumæa, he passed from thence into the land of the Philistines; and, having taken Azatus, formerly called Ashdod, he pulled down their heathen altars, burnt their carved images, and took the spoils of the place; and having done the same to the rest of the cities of that country over which he had prevailed, he led back his men, loaded with the spoils of their enemies, again into Judea." [Prid. v, ii, p. 146, 147.] At the battle of Caphussalama, Nicanor, the general of Antiochus lost five thousand men, and subsequently his whole army, which at first consisted of thirty five thousand, were all cut off to a man.

Who can read the foregoing historical facts, without being impressed with the language of Zech. 12 : 8,—He says,—"In that day shall the Lord defend the inhabitants of Jerusalem: and he that is feeble among them at that day shall be as David; and the house of David shall be as God, as the angel of the Lord before them."

Never was scripture more perfectly fulfilled. From the history of the wars of the Maccabees, we learn that between two and three hundred thousand of their enemies were slain, and this, by comparatively a handful of Jews. This to be sure, was not done in one battle; it required many; but never was there a time when "a lofty patriotism, adventurous valor, daring and sagacious soldiership, generous self devotion, and inextinguishable zeal of heroic men in the cause of their country and their God," were more clearly developed.

From the very commencement of the career of Judas Maccabees, to the close, the Jews were favored with the aid of the Almighty. And in the language of Ezekiel, they did go over the cities of Israel, and burn the weapons with fire. Cities were razed to the ground, armies were defeated, terror and desolation were spread throughout the ranks of the enemy, who in their hasty flight, threw down their weapons, and left their engines of war, (as they did in many cases) to be fired by the victorious Jews. At this time was fulfilled the prophecy of Zechariah 12 : 3.

"And in that day will I make Jerusalem a burdensome stone for all people;—all that burden themselves with it shall be cut in pieces, though all the people of the earth be gathered together against it.—In that day, saith the Lord, I will smite every horse with astonishment, and his rider with madness: and I will open mine eyes upon the house of Judah, and will smite every horse of the people with blindness. And the governors of Judah shall say in their heart, The inhabitants of Jerusalem shall be my strength in the Lord of hosts their God. In that day will I make the governors of Judah like an hearth of fire among the wood, and like a torch of fire in a sheaf; and they shall devour all the people round about, on the right hand and on the left; and Jerusalem shall be inhabited again in her own place, even in Jerusalem."

Again: In chap. 9 : 12–17, we have a description of this complete triumph of the Jews over their enemies. Says the prophet:—

"Turn you to the strong hold, ye prisoners of hope; even to day do I declare that I will render double unto thee; When I have bent Judah for me, filled the bow with Ephraim, and raised up thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece, and made thee as the sword of a mighty man. And the Lord shall be seen over them, and his arrow shall go forth as the lightning; and the Lord God shall blow the trumpet, and shall go with whirlwinds of the south.—The Lord of hosts shall defend them; and they shall devour and subdue with sling stones; and they shall drink and make a noise as though wine; and they shall be filled like bowls, and as the corners of the altar. And the Lord their God shall save them in that day as the flock of his people; for they shall be as the stones of a crown, lifted up as an ensign upon his land. For how great is his goodness, and how great is his beauty! corn shall make the young men cheerful, and new wine the maids."

In the above expressions "bent Judah," "filled the bow with Ephraim," and raised up thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece," we get the idea that there is to be a conflict between the Jews and Grecians; and in the foregoing historical testimony, touching the wars of the Maccabees, we have a perfect fulfilment. The only reason why the Jews made a league with the Romans, was to get rid of the oppression of the Grecians; Hence, in the first B. of Mac. 8 : 1, we read;—"Now Judas had heard of the fame of the Romans, that they were mighty and valiant men, and such as would lovingly accept all that joined themselves unto them, and make a league of amity with all that came unto them." Sent ambassadors (vs. 17, 18) "to Rome, to make a league of amity and confederacy with them, and to entreat them that they would take the yoke from them; for they saw that the kingdom of the Grecians did oppress Israel with servitude."

Another item that demands our attention is, the seven years, during which they were to burn the weapons with fire. We have already referred to the prophecy of Zech. 12, where it is said, that the Lord "will make the governors of Judah like an HEARTH OF FIRE among the wood, and like a TORCH OF FIRE in the sheaf," &c.; we have also noticed the great destruction of their enemies, the burning of the engines of war, the overthrow of cities, and the complete triumph of the children of Israel. The seven years are to be dated from where the Jews, after the desolation of their city, began to stand up for their rights; this was B. C. 167. In the commencement of the year B. C. 177, Antiochus invaded the land of Judea, and on this occasion happened the martyrdom of Eleazar, and of the mother and her seven sons, referred to by Josephus, Prideaux, and others. After Antiochus had, as he supposed, settled the affairs in Judea, he returned to Antioch. Then it was that Mattathias, with his little band, took the field and opposed the edicts of the king. Prideaux, in speaking of this, says:—"Mattathias having thus gotten such a company together, as made the appearance of a small army, came out of his fastnesses, and took the field with them;—and, going round the cities of Judah, he pulled down the heathen altars, caused all male children whom he found anywhere without circumcision to be circumcised, cut off all apostates that fell into his hands, and destroyed all the persecutors wherever he came." From this date, (B. C. 167,) seven years will carry us to the death of Alcimus "the great troubler of Israel," as Prideaux calls him, which occured B. C. 160. This event put an end, comparatively, to the war; and left the Jews in possession of the land of Judea. Prideaux, in speaking of this, remarks:—"When Bacchides saw that Alcimus was dead, for whose sake he came into Judea, he returned again to Antioch, and the land had quiet from all molestation of the Syrians for two years. It is most likely Demetrius had by this time, received the letters that were sent to him from the Romans, in behalf of the Jews, and thereupon gave Bacchides orders to surcease his vexations of that people; and that it was in obedience to those orders, that, on the death of Alcimus, he took that occasion to leave that country;" and although he returned two years after, with a design to seize the Jewish leader, Jonathan; yet in this, he was wholly defeated, after which, he never came into the land of Judea.

Here then, we have a perfect fulfilment of this part of the prophecy; for, from B. C. 167, when Mattathias commenced his opposition to the edicts of Antiochus, (probably about the middle of the year,) to the death of Alcimus, B. C. 160, when Bacchides was recalled by Demetrius, in consequence of the league made with the Romans, is seven years, during which they (the Jews) were to "spoil those that spoiled them, and rob those that robbed them." In the first Book of Maccabees, when the historian is speaking of Judas, he says; "He pursued the wicked, and sought them out, and burnt up those that vexed his people. Wherefore the wicked shrunk for fear of him, and all the workers of iniquity were troubled, because salvation prospered in his hand. He grieved also many kings, and made Jacob glad with his acts, and his memorial is blessed forever. Moreover he went through the cities of Judah, destroying the ungodly out of them, and turning away wrath from Israel." In these acts of Judas, and his brethren, the Jews, we have a fulfilment of verses 17–20, "And, thou son of man, thus saith the Lord God; Speak unto every feathered fowl, and to every beast of the field, Assemble yourselves, and come; gather yourselves on every side to my sacrifice that I do sacrifice for you, even a great sacrifice upon the mountains of Israel, that ye may eat flesh, and drink blood. Ye shall eat the flesh of the mighty, and drink the blood of the princes of the earth, of rams, of lambs, and of goats, of bullocks, all of them fatlings of Bashan.—And ye shall eat fat till ye be full, and drink blood till ye be drunken, of my sacrifice which I have sacrificed for you.—Thus ye shall be filled at my table with horses and chariots, with mighty men, and with all men of war, saith the Lord God."

The above is evidently a repetition of what is brought to view in verses 2–10 and implies a general slaughter of the enemies of the Jews; just such a slaughter as Josephus relates when speaking of the overthrow of the army under Nicanor, he says:—"Judas also pursued them, and slew them, and gave notice by the sound of the trumpets to the neighboring villages that he had conquered the enemy; which, when the inhabitants heard, they put on their armor hastily, and met their enemies in the face as they were running away, and slew them, insomuch that not one of them escaped out of this battle, who were in number nine thousand."

The burying of Gog, and all his multitude, may be understood as literal, or figurative. There is nothing against the idea of its being figurative; for, in the most literal prophecies in the bible, there are more or less, expressions, which are always regarded in this light. For instance, in Rev. 20, which many regard as literal, we have the terms "angel, key, chain, &c. which are regarded as symbolical; while the terms "resurrection," "thousand years," "and reigning with Christ," are supposed to be literal. The fact is, the language implies, that, their enemies shall be defeated, and the land released from their domination In the 32. chapter where the prophet is speaking of the overthrow of Egypt, he says:—"Thus saith the Lord God; I will therefore spread out my net over thee with a company of many people; and they shall bring thee up in my net. Then will I leave thee upon the land, I will cast thee forth upon the open field, and will cause all the fowls of the heaven to remain upon thee, and I will fill the beasts of the whole earth with thee. And I will lay thy flesh upon the mountains, and fill the vallies with thy height. I will also water with thy blood the land wherein thou swimmest, even to the mountains; and the rivers shall be full of thee. In verse 11, he says: "Thus saith the Lord God; the sword of the king of Babylon shall come upon thee." In verse 21, the dead are represented as speaking to the Egyptians thus:—"The strong among the mighty shall speak to him out of the midst of hell with them that help him: they are gone down, they lie uncircumcised, slain by the sword. Asshur is there and all her company: his graves are about him: all of them slain, fallen by the sword:"—verses 26, 27, "There is Meshech, Tubal, and all her multitude: her graves are round about him: all of them uncircumcised, slain by the sword, though they caused their terror in the land of the living. And they shall not lie with the mighty that are fallen of the uncircumcised, which are gone down to hell with their weapons of war: and they have laid their swords under their heads, but their iniquities shall be upon their bones, though they were the terror of the mighty in the land of the living." The above language is highly figurative: for the phrases, "gone down to hell," "laid their swords under their heads," "iniquities shall be upon their bones," cannot with any propriety, be understood literally. Nor can we understand every phrase in Ezekiel as literal: for while it is possible for the fowls to devour the carcasses of men and beasts, it is not at all probable that they will literally devour or eat chariots, which they are said to do in that connection. We believe the simple idea is, as remarked above, that the enemies of the Jews, or, a great number of them were to be slain; after which, the land was to be cleansed.

There is an abundance of historical testimony to show that the land was cleansed subsequently to the overthrow of the forces of the Syrian king. Prideaux, in speaking of Jonathan after he had made the league with Bacchides, who promised never to invade Judea again, says: "Whereon Jonathan settled in peace at Michmash, a town lying to the north of Jerusalem, at the distance of nine miles from it, and there governed Israel according to the law, cut off all who apostatized from it, and RESTORED AGAIN JUSTICE and RIGHTEOUSNESS in the land, and reformed, as far as he could, all that was amiss in Church or State." (V. 2, p. 170.) Josephus, in speaking of the same, says: "Then did Jonathan take the opportunity of this quiet state of things, and went and lived in the city of Michmash, and there governed the multitude, and punished the wicked and ungodly, and by that means purged the nation of them." (Book xiii, chap. 1.) At this time was fulfilled Zech. 13 : 2, "And it shall come to pass in that day, saith the Lord of hosts, that I will cut off the names of the idols out of the land, and they shall no more be remembered: and also I will cause the prophets and the unclean spirit to pass out of the land."

Bishop Newton, in speaking of the Jews at this time, says: "But the Jews in a little time, under the conduct of the Maccabees, recovered their liberties, and established their religion and government in GREATER SPLENDOR and security than before. Seven months would be none too much time for the accomplishing of this work; and although, it is no where said in history, that, they were just seven months in burying the multitude of Gog; yet, as the other points in the prophecy have been so completely fulfilled, we believe this has been also. We know that the Jews did, after the Babylonish captivity, make the Valley of Hinnom, which lay South-east of Jerusalem, or, as Ezekiel says: (v. 11,) "east of the sea," the "common receptacle of the filth, &c., of the city, in which fires were continually kept burning, to consume the carcasses of animals, executed criminals, &c." And what place, more fitting, could the Jews have chosen, in which, to inter the multitude of the carcasses, and bones of their enemies than this valley? The prophet calls it the "the valley of Hamon Gog," namely; the "MULTITUDE OF GOG." In the Septuagint it reads: "I will give unto Gog a place of renown, a tomb in Israel, the burial-place of them that approach the sea," &c., viz.: the "Valley of Hinnom;" and thus it is rendered in the margin of the Septuagint.

After this overthrow of Gog, the Jews were to be reinstated in their own land; the prophet says:—"Therefore thus saith the Lord God; Now will I bring again the captivity of Jacob, and have mercy upon the whole house of Israel, and will be jealous for my holy name; after that they have borne their shame, and all their trespasses whereby they have trespassed against me, when they dwelt safely in their land, and none made them afraid. When I have brought them again from the people, and gathered them out of their enemies' lands, and am sanctified in them in the sight of many nations; Then shall they know that I am the Lord their God, which caused them to be led into captivity among the heathen; but I have gathered them unto their own land, and have left none of them any more there. Neither will I hide my face any more from them: for I have poured out my spirit upon the house of Israel, saith the Lord God."

Rotteck, in speaking of the Jews, remarks:—"The Jews, driven to desperation, revolted, (3816,)" (from Antiochus,) "under the command of Mattathias and his heroic sons, and an independent Jewish state was formed anew. For, the gray hero himself, with a little resolute band, and, after him, his magnanimous brothers, Judas, Jonathan, and Simon, repulsed, in many battles, the Syrians, elevated by exploits the courage of the nation, which gradually subjected itself to their direction, particularly when Jonathan was invested with the pontifical dignity. The terrible distraction of the Syrian kingdom favored the undertaking of the Maccabees; the family of Mattathias was thus called from Judas' surname Macab, the hammer. It is also called the Asmonean, of which several interpretations are given; and Simon obtained (3841), under the title of an Ethnarch, (prince), complete liberation from the tribute hitherto paid, and from the dominion of the house of Seleucus. His son, Hyrcanus, established the freedom, which was again exposed to danger, and confirmed his power by SUBJECTING the SAMARITANS and IDUMÆANS. The successors of this brave prince called themselves kings; and their power became, by the rapidly rising population of the country, which was continually enlarged by successful wars, as GREAT AS IN THE TIME OF DAVID AND SOLOMON, the WEALTH of the CAPITAL STILL GREATER." (V. 1, p. 198).

Prideaux, in speaking of Hyrcanus, says: He "took the advantage of the disturbances and divisions that thenceforth ensued through the whole Syrian empire, not only to ENLARGE his TERRITORIES by seizing MEDEBA, SAMEGA, and SEVERAL OTHER PLACES in SYRIA, PHŒNICIA, and ARABIA, and ADDING them to HIS DOMINIONS, but also, after this, or "from this time, to make himself absolute and WHOLLY INDEPENDENT. For, after this, neither HE, nor ANY of HIS DESCENDANTS owned any further dependence on the kings of Syria, but thenceforth WHOLLY FREED THEMSELVES FROM ALL MANNER of HOMAGE, SERVITUDE, or SUBJECTION, to them." (V. 2, pp. 201, 202).

Josephus says, that Hyrcanus subdued ALL of the IDUMEANS; and in chap. 15, B. xiii, when referring to Alexander's administration, he says: "Now at this time the Jews were in possession of the following cities that had belonged to the Syrians, and Idumeans, and Phœnicians; at the Sea-side, Strato's Tower, Apollonia, Joppa, Jamnia, Ashdod, Gaza, Anthedon, Raphia, and Rhinocolura; in the middle of the country, near to Idumea, Adora, Marissa; near the country of Samaria, Mount Carmel, and Mount Tabor, Scythopolis, and Gadara; of the country of Gaulonitis, Seleusia, and Gabala; in the country of Moab, Hesbon, and Medaba, Lemba, and Oronas, Gelithon, Zara, the Valley of the Celices, and Pella; which last they utterly destroyed, because its inhabitants would not bear to change their religious rites for those peculiar to the Jews. The Jews also possessed others of the principle cities in Syria, which had been destroyed."

The foregoing historical facts warrant us in believing that those prophecies, which relate to the Jews inhabiting their own land again, have been completely fulfilled. For instance, Ezek. 36: and especially in the first eleven verses, we read;—"Also, thou son of man, prophesy unto the mountains of Israel, and say, Ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Lord: thus saith the Lord God; because the enemy hath said against you, aha, even the ancient high places are our's in possession; therefore prophesy and say, thus saith the Lord God; because they have made you desolate, and swallowed you up on every side, that ye might be a possession unto the residue of the heathen, and ye are taken up in the lips of talkers, and are an infamy of the people: therefore, ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Lord God; thus saith the Lord God to the mountains, and to the hills, to the rivers, and to the valleys, to the desolate wastes, and to the cities that are forsaken, which became a prey and derision to the residue of the heathen that are round about; therefore thus saith the Lord God; Surely in the fire of my jealousy have I spoken against the residue of the heathen, and against all Idumea, which have appointed my land into their possession with the joy of all their heart, with despiteful minds, to cast it out for a prey. Prophesy therefore concerning the land of Israel, and say unto the mountains, and to the hills, to the rivers, and to the valleys, Thus saith the Lord God; behold, I have spoken in my jealousy and in my fury, because ye have borne the shame of the heathen: therefore thus saith the Lord God; I have lifted up mine hand, surely the heathen that are about you, they shall bear their shame. But ye, O mountains of Israel, ye shall shoot forth your branches, and yield your fruit to my people of Israel;—for they are at hand to come. For, behold, I am for you, and I will turn unto you, and ye shall be tilled and sown: and I will multiply men upon you, all the house of Israel, even all of it: and the cities shall be inhabited, and the wastes shall be builded: and I will multiply upon you man and beast; and they shall increase and bring fruit: and I will settle you after your old estates, and will do better unto you than at your beginnings: aud ye shall know that I am the Lord." Let each person read the entire chapter at his leisure, and compare it with the foregoing facts.—Again. Says the prophet: (Obed. 17–21.) "But upon mount Zion shall be deliverance, and there shall be holiness; and the house of Jacob shall possess their possessions. And the house of Jacob shall be a fire, and the house of Joseph a flame, and the house of Esau for stubble, and they shall kindle in them, and devour them; and there shall not be any remaining of the house of Esau; for the Lord hath spoken it. And they of the south shall possess the mount of Esau; and they of the plain the Philistines; and they shall possess the fields of Ephraim, and the fields of Samaria: and Benjamin shall possess Gilead. And the captivity of this host of the children of Israel shall possess that of the Canaanites, even unto Zarephath; and the captivity of Jerusalem, which is in Sepharad, shall possess the cities of the south. And saviours shall come up on mount Zion to judge the mount of Esau; and the kingdom shall be the Lord's."

The World's Crisis.

LOWELL, APRIL 26, 1854.

Exposition of Rev. 10.

Continued.

I had intended to give an exposition of this chapter previously, but ill health and a multitude of engagements prevented.—In a previous number of the Crisis, I endeavored to explain the beautiful symbols of the first verse as having reference to the proclamation of the Advent doctrine in 1843.

V. 2. "And he had in his hand a little book open: and he set his right foot upon the sea, and his left foot on the earth."

"And he had in his hand a little book open." The word rendered, "little book" more appropriately signifies a roll of parchment, such as the Hebrews were in the habit of writing on in ancient times. On such a roll doubtless Daniel wrote his prophecy. The word rendered "open" is not like the English word an adjective, but a participle, and is rendered by Prof. Whiting "opened," implying that it had been closed, but was now opened. Says Barnes, "the word here used means, properly, to open or unclose in respect to that which was before fastened or sealed." * * * * "This would find a fulfilment if some such facts as the following should occur: if there had been any custom or arrangement by which knowledge was kept from men, or access was forbidden to books or to some one book in particular; and if something should occur by which that which had before been kept hidden or concealed, or that to which access had been denied, should be made accessible. In other words, this is the proper symbol of a diffusion of knowledge, or of the influence of A BOOK on mankind. The fact that it was in the hand of the angel.—All that seems to be implied in this, is, that it was now offered, or was ready to be put in possession of John—or of the church—or of mankind. It was open, and was held out, as it were, for perusal."

Daniel was commanded to "shut up the words and seal the book, even to the time of the end." In the time of the end, after the fulfilment of the events under the sixth trumpet, which we believe closed up in 1840, the Angel appears with the "little book," or roll of parchment opened. The visions of Daniel include prophetic periods that reach to the end of the world;—the message of the Angel was in relation to the end of time as declared by God's servants, the prophets, of whom Daniel was one. Inasmuch, therefore, as the subject matter of both are the same, and Daniel was expressly told to seal up the vision even to the time of the end, and at that time the Angel appears with the parchment opened, it seems evident that the sealed book of Daniel and the opened book of the Angel are identical.

V. 3. "And cried with a loud voice, as when a lion roareth; and when he had cried, seven thunders uttered their voices."

The power of the Advent doctrine is strikingly presented by the figure of a roaring lion. The lion being king of the forest, there is nothing so terrific to the beasts of prey as the sound of their monarch's voice. They tremble and fly for shelter from the all-devouring jaws of this monster of the desert. How strikingly emblematical of the terror which was felt by the sinner from the annunciation of the judgment approaching. How alarming was the idea to those who were backslidden from God! The hypocrite in Zion was panic stricken by this tremendously startling report of the watchmen. If there ever was a God in any thing, there surely was in the proclamation of this message. If ever the divinity was manifest among men, illuminating the understanding, arousing the conscience and alarming the rebel, it was when the proclamation of the Redeemer's coming in '43 was announced. Strength from on high was abundantly communicated to its advocates. The glory of the Lord shone around them as it did around the shepherds on Bethlehem's plain;—the channels of grace, reaching from heaven to earth, were open; and a communication full and free, was enjoyed; the weak were made strong in the Lord; the slow of speech, eloquent; the unintelligent, learned in the Scriptures and resistless in argument. The voice of God was heard in this message, in thunder-tones; and there was a power and a glory attending the proclamation of this doctrine, that stamped on the work the impress of the divinity.—It is true that opponents may have since derided and trampled under foot the heaven born, soul-thrilling doctrine; but then almost every enemy was either melted or silenced. Indeed, we think it evident that if the power and demonstration of the spirit that accompanied the word was not a full and perfect demonstration that God was moving the Church and calling out the virgins for a specific work, in fulfilment of His word, then no such demonstration can ever be made in the economy of grace.

"Seven thunders uttered their voices." As seven is what is termed a perfect number in Scripture, I suppose by seven thunders is meant all the thunders of heaven. It is as if he had said all the artillery of the skies was discharged at once; i. e., there were in the moral heavens thunder-peals that caused every thing to tremble at the sound. Verses 5–7:

"And the angel which I saw stand upon the sea and upon the earth lifted up his hand to heaven, and sware by him that liveth for ever and ever, who created heaven, and the things that therein are, and the earth, and the things that therein are, and the sea, and the things which are therein, that there should be time no longer. But in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets."

There is a clear and distinct enunciation in these verses of the Angel's message. It is uttered in the most emphatic, solemn and impressive manner conceivable, and under the sanction of an oath, that "TIME SHALL BE NO LONGER," or as some critics render it, "there shall be no longer delay." If the roaring of this lion, or the bursting of seven thunders expresses the proclamation of the Redeemer's coming in '43, then the declaration of the Angel may represent that although under the first proclamation there was a failure, and a disappointment on the part of the Church represented by the tarrying of the Bridegroom in the Parable of the virgins, and the tarrying of the vision in Habakkuk, and the prolonging of the days, and apparent failure of the visions in Ezek. 12, (which disappointment John was forbidden for wise reasons to record,) yet that there should be NO MORE DELAY, but the seventh trumpet would now sound, and probationary time cease.

Vs. 8–10. "And the voice which I heard from heaven spake unto me again, and said, Go and take the little book which is open in the hand of the angel which standeth upon the sea and upon the earth And I went unto the angel, and said unto him, Give me the little book. And he said unto me, Take it, and eat it up; and it shall make thy belly bitter, but it shall be in thy mouth sweet as honey. And I took the little book out of the angel's hand, and ate it up; and it was in my mouth sweet as honey: and as soon as I had eaten it, my belly was bitter.

Another striking symbol is pesented in these verses, viz.: that of eating the little book. We often speak of devouring a book, i. e. reading a volume with avidity and close attention. The figure here used expresses clearly the idea of laying hold with earnestness on the truth of God—reading, understanding, believing and obeying the truth, obtaining a clear apprehension of the doctrines contained, with a willingness to embrace and defend the same, and thus to declare our faith to the world. Having digested the contents of the little book, they become incorporated with our moral being, make a part as it were of our spiritual nature, and are acted out in our intercourse with society around. As natural food gives vigor to the animal frame so does the word of God feed and nourish the soul unto eternal life.

There is a beautiful illustration of this subject in a parallel passage of Ezek. 2. 6–10 and 3: 1–4. "And thou, son of man, be not afraid of them, neither be afraid of their words, though briers and thorns be with thee, and thou dost dwell among scorpions: be not afraid of their words, nor be dismayed at their looks, though they be a rebellious house. And thou shalt speak my words unto them, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear: for they are most rebellious. But thou, son of man, hear what I say unto thee; be not thou rebellious like that rebellious house; open thy mouth, and eat that I give thee. And when I looked, behold, an hand was sent unto me; and, lo, a roll of a book was therein; and he spread it before me; and it was written within and without: and there was written therein lamentations, and mourning, and woe. Moreover he said unto me, Son of man, eat that thou findest; eat this roll, and go speak unto the house of Israel. So I opened my mouth, and he caused me to eat that roll. And he said unto me, Son of man, cause thy belly to eat, and fill thy bowels with this roll that I give thee. Then did I eat it; and it was in my mouth as honey for sweetness.—And he said unto me, Son of man, go, get thee unto the house of Israel, and speak with my words unto them." In this passage it is evident that by eating the roll of parchment, or little book, he was strengthened and prepared to go and speak unto the house of Israel with the words of the Lord.

So now by not only reading as we did in 1843 the contents of the little volume, but by devouring and digesting the same, and coming to a more full and perfect understanding of the whole subject, we are prepared to publish the tidings to the house of Israel and announce the coming judgment to the world. This is now, according to our faith, being fulfilled in the proclamation of the midnight cry, and the time of our Saviour's appearing at the judgment, which we believe will be accomplished in 1854.

Faith and Obedience.

There has been much written upon the subject of faith, during the few years past, and while some have made the matter plain, others have so mystified it, as to make it appear an exceedingly difficult thing to live by faith, walk by faith, stand by faith, overcome the world by faith, and be saved by the grace of God, through faith.

We see by the prominence given to this subject in the Word of God, that it is faith which balances the scale, upon which our salvation turns; for it lies at the very foundation of obedience. We must possess true faith, in order to right action.

We intend to illustrate this subject, and make it plain, so that all can see its importance, and understand the nature of that faith which overcomes, and without which we cannot please God.

All the worthies spoken of by Paul in the 11th of Heb., overcame by faith, and this faith adapted itself to the changing circumstances in which God's people have ever been placed. To illustrate:

Abel's faith embraced the promise of a sacrifice that would be made for the sins of the world, and shadowed it forth by offering a slain lamb; and thus pleased God. Noah, in addition to this faith, must believe God when he told him that he would send a flood of waters to destroy the inhabitants of the earth, because of their wickedness, and obey him by building an ark for the preservation of himself and his family. By this "he condemned the world and became the heir of that righteousness which is by faith." While he was evincing his faith in God by his works, the antediluvians manifested their unbelief by their works. He preached that the flood was coming, while he went forward in the work of preparing the ark in which to take refuge when the flood of waters should be upon the earth. The people whom he warned believed not, and therefore went on with their avocations as usual, building and planting, until the fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened, and the deluge swept them all away.

Lot was warned of the destruction that was coming upon the cities of the plain, and directed to escape to the mountains. He believed God—warned his sons-in-law, and fled out of the city with his wife and two daughters, the only ones who believed the message.

God said to Abraham, "I will make of thee a great nation;" and, "In Isaac shall thy seed be called." He evinced his faith in the promise, by his cheerful obedience to the command; "Take thy son, thine only son, Isaac, whom thou lovest, and offer him for a burnt-offering." He knew that God's word could not fail of its full accomplishment—therefore if Isaac was slain, Isaac would be raised again to life.

When the children of Israel were groaning under the Egyptian yoke, and Moses was sent to deliver them, it became their duty to believe his message, aud obey the instructions which he gave them from the mouth of the Lord.

When the destroying angel was about to pass through the land of Egypt and slay all the first-born of the people, the Israelites were commanded to sprinkle blood upon their door-posts, if they would escape the same judgment; they believed God, obeyed the requisition, and not one among them was slain. How would it have been with them if they had reasoned thus, "O we believe Moses has been sent of God to deliver us from our bondage—and whenever the plagues have been sent upon the Egyptians, we have been preserved from them. God well knows who we are, and there is no need of our putting blood upon our door-posts; we are his peculiar people and he will take care of us." Would they have been preserved if they had neglected the performance of that act of obedience?

In their journey to the land of promise, they must move when the pillar of cloud moved, and rest when that rested. It was necessary for them to adapt their faith and obedience to the changing circumstances which every day were developed—not to give up their faith in past revealings of the Divine will, but add thereto what belonged to their present condition. And thus we find when they came to Kadeshlarnea, the border of the promised land, they were driven back again into the wilnerness—there to wander and perish for the space of forty years. It was not because they doubted the promises made to their fathers, neither for lack of faith in the miracles that had been wrought for them in the land of bondage, and in the wilderness, but because they doubted the ability of God to subdue the giants and tall sons of Anak, break down their strong walls, and give them possession of the land of Canaan. It truly seems strange, that after such glorious manifestations of the Divine power in opening before them the waters of the Red Sea—raining manna from heaven for their sustenance—and bringing water out of the flinty rock for their thirst, they should now doubt his faithful word! It is no wonder that God should be grieved at their hardness of heart, and "swear in his wrath that they should not enter into his rest."

But thus it has ever been—man has always possessed "an evil heart of unbelief in departing from the living God"—it is the "easily besetting sin" which we are commanded to "lay aside," in order to "run with patience the race set before us." And thus we might trace it down through each successive generation of the Church, and still find the same principle developed.

At the first advent of Christ there was a more important change in the Divine economy than any which had preceded it; there were far greater developments of the plan of salvation, and that which was once essential in its observance was now entirely done away, viz.: the Old Covenant, with all of its attending rites and ceremonies. It had been obligatory upon the people of God; they could not please him without strict obediance to all of its laws, but now Christ has come—the Antetype of the type—the substance of the shadow—the Mediator of the New Covenant, established on better promises—The types and shadows were now valueless—the Old Covenant had vanished away and with the change of the Priesthood, there was of necessity a change of the law.

The spotless lamb might be offered, but the altar could no longer sanctify the gift—the consecrated Priest, from the tribe of Levi, might sprinkle the blood of the slain beast around the altar—he might take of the blood of the sin-offering with his finger and put it upon the horns of the altar—he might take of the fat of the lamb, and burn it upon the altar, and thus make atonement for the sin of the Jewish worshipper, but it availed nothing—the sin yet remained unpardoned: and why? Let John the Baptist reply. As he stood with two of his disciples, looking upon Jesus as he walked, he saith, "Behold the Lamb of God!" Here was now the only true sacrifice for sin—the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. The High-Priest might still enter within the vail, into the Holy of Holies, and there sprinkle the blood before the Mercy-Seat, an offering for himself and the errors of the people—it was but mockery, after the way into the holiest of all had been made manifest and Christ had become the High Priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, and the shedding of his own blood, without which there was now no remission.

It may be plainly seen from this, that it was essential for the justification of the Church, that she should adapt her faith and obedience to all of the unfoldings of the Divine ecocomy of grace; and in order for her to do this, it was necessary for her to be well instructed in the law and the prophets, that they might understand the design of the first, and not rest therein, but consider that it was only a school-master to bring them to Christ; and the teachings of the latter, that they might clearly comprehend the manner and time of his Advent, when the ministration of death was to be done away, and the ministration of the spirit with its excelling glory commence—when they were no longer to be under tutors and governors, but to receive the adoption of sons.

But did they have this knowledge? The history of the Jewish Church shows conclusively that they did not. What though the Scriptures of their prophets were read every Sabbath-day in their synagogue?—they fulfilled them in condemning the Messiah, and thereby forfeited their title to the kingdom. They trampled under foot the Son of God—they counted the blood of the New Covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, or consecrated for the Priesthood, an unholy thing, they had done despite to the spirit of his grace—and nothing remained for them but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, seeing they had rejected the only sacrifice for sin. Truly it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

Perhaps it will not be unprofitable to briefly review the sad history of the fall of the Jewish nation, as drawn by the pen of Inspiration, and see if we can learn the cause.

There was an indefinite expectation of the Messiah about that time, in the minds of many; but few, there were, who had a clear understanding of the manner and time. He came not, however, unannounced. A good old Simeon, and the aged prophetess, Anna by name, were waiting for him in his temple. The eastern Magi saw his star, and shepherds, upon Judea's plains, heard the glad announcement from an angelic host, and hastened to pay homage to the babe of Bethlehem.

Before him went forth an Harbinger, crying in the wilderness, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord, and make his paths straight!" He was the one predicted by the prophet, saying, "Behold I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me." (Luke 7: 27.) He was the Elijah who was to come, as is evident from the testimony of the angel to Zacharias, when speaking of the birth of John: "And many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God. And he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias, (or Elijah) to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just; to make ready a people prepared for the Lord." Said Jesus to his disciples, in reply to their question, "Why then say the scribes that Elias must first come. Elias verily cometh first, and restoreth all things; and how it is written of the Son of man that he must suffer many things, and be set at naught. But I say unto you that Elias is come already, and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatsoever they listed, (or pleased.) Then the disciples understood that he spake unto them of John the Baptist."

It seems evident from this, that certain of the Scribes objected to the fact of Christ's being the predicted Messiah, the promise that Elijah, the Prophet, should first come, which, when explained by the Angel, meant, the spirit and power of Elijah. The disciples, it seems, did not know exactly how to meet this objection, and referred it to Christ, who shewed them that the prophecy had already been fulfilled.

The prophecies had been wrested from their appropriate place, and darkened by the traditions and fables of the Scribes and doctors of the law, so that instead of looking for the promised heir of David's throne to come in the humble manner predicted by the Prophets, they expected a glorious messenger to go before him and announce his advent, and that he would be manifested in all the grandeur of an earthly monarch. But O how different from their lofty expectations was the nature of his manifestation! Who was pointed out to them by John, as the one whose way he had been sent to prepare? A NAZARENE of humble birth, who had been associated with his father in the employment of a carpenter. "What," say they, "is this the promised seed, who is to bruise the serpent's head? Is this the Prophet spoken of by Moses, whom we are to hear in all things? Is this the predicted heir of David's throne, who is to deliver us from the hand of our enemies, and reign over the house of Jacob forever? Is he the one whom Isaiah denominates the "Everlasting Father, the Mighty God, the Prince of Peace?" Do you pretend to say that this Galilean is the Christ, when the Scriptures say that Christ cometh of the seed of David, and out of the town of Bethlehem, where David was?

"As for this man, we know whence he is. Joseph, the carpenter, is his father, and his brethren are all with us, but when Christ cometh, no man knoweth whence he is."

Was their reasoning sound—their objections valid? They were not; they evinced thereby their "lack of knowledge" respecting what the Prophets had written concerning Christ. Did Christ come in the manner predicted? He did. Was he manifested at the time specified by Daniel the Prophet? He was. Might they have understood it? They might. Is proof of this wanted? We will give it. The first gospel preached by Christ, was definite time. "Give us your proof," says one. We will. Turn to Mark 1: 14, 15,—"Now after that John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, and saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of heaven is at hand! Repent ye and believe the gospel!" The gospel, then, that Christ preached, was time, was it not? "Yes," says one, "but it was not definite time." How could any other than a definite period of time, have a fulfilment? Turn to Gen. 29: 27. Jacob had agreed to serve Laban a week of years for Rachel. Laban gave him Leah instead, and when Jacob objected, he said to him "Fulfil her week, and we will give thee Rachel also," &c. Would her week be fulfilled until the full expiration of seven years? All must see that it could not.—Daniel had said from the mouth of the Angel, that it should be sixty-nine weeks (of years) unto Messiah, the Prince.—Would the time be fulfilled until the expiration of the full term of years? It would not. What says Paul in his letter to the Galatians? "When the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, &c. (Gal. 4: 4.) Fulness signifies completion, when any thing is filled up. It was not, therefore, until the prophetical weeks of years extending to Messiah the Prince, were fulfilled, that he could be manifested. The Prince, or heir to the throne of Israel, came at the time predicted; consequently the kingdom of heaven was at hand; and this was the gospel motive to repentance. Said an individual, a day or two since, "I think they make the Second Advent too prominent. I should like it better if they would preach repentance." What ought they to present as the motive to induce men to repent? inquired I.—"Why, that they must believe in Christ or be lost, and that they are going to die." I asked him what Christ presented as the motive when he entered upon the work of the ministry? He could give nothing any more definite than this: that they must repent or be damned. I repeated to him the first message of Christ, the gospel of the kingdom, and the duty connected therewith, and then asked him what cause was assigned by Christ for the rejection and fall of the Jewish nation. He said he could not tell any specific reason given. Truly, there is as much darkness in the Gentile church relative to what the Scriptures teach, as there was in the Jewish, although the perusal of them need not be confined to the synagogues.

The salvation or rejection of the Jewish nation, turned upon their faith or unbelief in this time message. Is proof of this desired? We have it at hand. Hear the Saviour, as he gazes with weeping eyes on loved Jerusalem, and pronounces its awful doom. "Because," says he, "thou knewest not the TIME of thy visitation." Might they have known? If they could not have known, it surely was unjust to condemn them for their ignorance.

If they had believed the testimony of their prophets, they would have believed Christ; and if they had believed Christ, they would have known the time; and if they had known the time, they would have accepted of Christ for their King; the diadem would have been placed upon his head,—the prostrated throne of David would have been re-established, and the Jewish nation, redeemed from the hands of their enemies, would have been established in the land promised to their fathers.—But now these things were forever hid from their eyes. God did not ordain that Christ should become a stumbling-block, and rock of offence to the house of Israel; but he foresaw that it would be thus, and caused it to be recorded by the pen of Inspiration for the instruction and warning of the Gentile church.

We extract the following items from the London "Evening Mail."

"A good deal of curiosity exists as to the manner in which the Ulemas and the fanatical party in Turkey will receive the reforms and immunities proposed by the Ambassadors in favor of the Christians.—I believe that, in accordance with the new rights of the Christian subjects of the Porte, property is subject to the same laws and the same imposts with Mussulmans as non-Mussulmans. The special impost on the latter is the capitation tax—the Kharatasch or Karatadji, but from which ecclesiastics, women, children, and the infirm are exempt. The Kharatasch being in the commencement a tribute imposed by the conqueror on the conquered, and its being still a mark of degradation, must be absolutely suppressed, and the Sultan is clearly disposed to change that tax, which presses exclusively on the Christians, into a personal contribution applicable to all Ottoman subjects, no matter of what religion they may be. The right of possessing land is not enjoyed by the Christian subjects of the Porte. This disqualification will, it is said, also be removed. It may be necessary to observe that a similar law is said to exist in Servia against strangers, without reference to religion, and in the Danubian Principalities against the Mussulmans. Mixed tribunals already exist in Turkey, in which Christians are permitted to give testimony, each making his deposition before the tribunals after having previously made oath in conformity with the faith to which he belongs. This oath, it appears, will be suppressed, and in future every subject of the Ottoman Empire will be free to give his testimony in courts of justice, both before the Mussulman as before the mixed tribunals. It appears that the Sultan was prepared to relieve the Christians from the Kharatasch if they consented to military service, and that they have taken some time to reflect.—Civil and political equality cannot fail to result from the admission of all the Ottoman subjects to the honor of defending their common country. At all events the alliance of France and England will be productive of important changes in Turkey. The Emperor Nicholas demanded for the Christians rights which must have withdrawn them from the sovereignty of the Sultan. France and England demand for the Christians rights which will raise them to the rank of citizens of the Ottoman Empire from the degraded condition of Rayas.

The following "Order of the Day" has been addressed by Omar Pasha to the troops at Kalafat:—"GENERALS OF DIVISION AND BRIGADE, SUPERIOR AND SUBALTERN OFFICERS, NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS, CORPORALS, AND SOLDIERS OF THE IMPERIAL ARMY.

"The stronghold of Kalafat, which you have conquered with so much courage, has suddenly become of the greatest importance for our cause. In your hands rests the honour of the country.

"If, with your usual bravery, you remain firm in that post, if you are ready, in its defence, to shed the last drop of your blood, it will be impossible to calculate all the advantages that will result from your heroism.

"If, on the contrary, the enemy should succeed in gaining possession of your entrenched camp (may God save us from that immense calamity), it would be in the eyes of the entire world a blot on Mussulman honor. His Imperial Majesty, the Sultan, our Most Gracious Sovereign, confides entirely in your well-known courage.

"Soldiers! Can I rely upon you?—With that extraordinary courage, which I have so often seen you display; with your devotedness to His Majesty, with your love of country, you will not say, our entrenchments are terminated, nothing more remains for us to do.

"Soldiers! You will not be deterred by fatigue from augmenting still more the strength of the entrenchments of your camp. If the Russian army attacks you, you will fight to the last extremity, and overcome that implacable enemy, with the assistance of the Almighty, and the help of the Prophet. Should the enemy even carry one of your redoubts, without receding one step you will attack them with the bayonet and drive them out of it.

"Soldiers! If you fall, supreme happiness awaits you above. If you conquer, you will acquire here below the esteem and admiration of the entire world, whose eyes are fixed upon you.

"Shumla, 30 Djemasijul, year 1270."

The employment of the electric telegraph in connection with the military operations of the allied armies in the East is said to have been suggested by the Electric Telegraph Company, and to be under the serious consideration of the authorities both here and in France. It cannot be doubted that most important advantages would be gained by the use of such an agent, where time and the earliest intelligence and the facilities for rapidly concentrating troops upon particular points are all of such immense consequence. We should be indeed inexcusable if we did not supplement the bravery and discipline of our soldiers by all the aids that modern science and the resources of the country place within our reach. Of these the electric telegraph is certainly one of the most powerful, and, if turned to full account, it may exercise almost as decisive an influence over the fortunes of a campaign as the screw-steamer in our fleets.

The passage of the Danube by the Russians, which is now beyond question, still surprises and still engrosses the public attention. It surprises the public mind, because it is a step taken in direct opposition to the reiterated wishes of the German Governments, and especially of Austria, and further, because it appears most likely to superinduce a more decided and a hostile policy on the part of the latter. The 22d March, at day-break, the passage commenced on the Lower Danube, and it continued until sundown, which induces us to think there must have been large forces to cross the river; the Vienna newspapers speak of 40,000 men, with 140 pieces of artillery, but these figures are regarded as exaggerated by military men here. The Lower Danube is observed, (rather than defended) on the Turkish side by three small fortresses: Matschin, opposite Braila, Toultscha, opposite Ismail, and Isatcha, situated between these two; the Russians passed upon all three of these points simultaneously, over four bridges established on moored rafts. General Luders conducted the operation, under the direction of the General in-chief, Prince Gortschakoff, and of General Schilders, Chef d'Etat Major; besides two divisions of his own corps, he has with him the Division Outschakoff, belonging to the three corps commanded by Gen. Ostensacken. At four o'clock, A. M., the Russian batteries established below Braila, opened a heavy fire on the Turkish entrenchments above and below Matschin, which lasted until sundown.—The 23d, the Russians recommenced the firing, but the Turks did not return it very vigorously; then six Russian battalions, with four pieces of artillery, crossed the river on fourteen large boats, under protection of the Danube flotilla, to land below Matschin, where they placed themselves in position while the engineers threw a bridge across the Danube. The Turks directed their fire until night against the "Pruth" steamship, the bridge building, and the boats employed in it, but without a great result; during the night they evacuated their entrenchments, leaving twenty dead behind them. The Russians acknowledge a loss of twenty dead and thirty wounded; among the latter is Gen. Dabroaski of the Topographical Corps, who lost a leg.

The building of the bridge of Matschin was directed by Gen. Schilders, and the passage of the river by Gen. Kotzebue.—While this passage was being executed, Gen. Luders crossed, with six battalions, at Galatz, and Gen. Outschakoff, with thirteen battalions near Ismail, both on boats. The former met with no resistance, and he advanced two hours' march into the enemy's country. The bridge constructed near Galatz being completed, twenty-six battalions crossed over on it, with the artillery and the cavalry. Upon this point, Gen. Outschakoff had to overcome an obstinate resistance, having to cross the river opposite Toultscha in its greatest width, under a heavy fire. The Turkish redoubts were taken by assault: the Russians took possession of 11 cannons, and made 150 prisoners, among whom are a colonel and several officers. The Russians acknowledge their loss to be 300 dead and wounded. At Braila, Galatz and Toultscha, the Russians have established permanent bridges. The column from Braila, immediately invested Matschin. Gen. Outschakoff's division occupied the small village Toultscha but not the fort, and Gen. Aurep coming from Galatz took before Isatcha an intermediate position. Thus the three Turkish fortresses of the Lower Danube are blockaded. The Ottoman troops being in too feeble numbers on this advanced line to oppose a greater resistance to much larger forces, retired on Baba-Dagh, a small fortress situated ten leagues to the southward, and near the Lake Rassim, and in a mountainous country. This operation of the Russians is regarded by military men as a purely defensive one, forced on them by fears of the allied fleets and the attitude Austria is taking. The telegraph has communicated despatches to us which state that the Russians continue to advance further into the interior, and have taken Isatcha, Hirsowa and Babadagh, and were advancing into the Dobrudscha. The Russian Head Quarters have been established in Hirsowa. Prince Paskiewitsch quitted Warsaw on the 31st March; he will reach Bucharest the 4th of April.—[Paris Correspondent of the Boston Atlas.

THE ECLIPSE. On Friday, the 26th of May next, there will occur an annular eclipse of the sun, which will be visible in Massachusetts. It will commence at 33 minutes past 4 o'clock in the afternoon and continue two hours and four minutes—or until about 23 minutes before 7 o'clock. In this eclipse, the apparent diameter of the moon compared with that of the sun, will be about as 18 to 19—and consequently some nine-tenths of the sun will be covered. The path of the eclipse will cross the western part of the Atlantic ocean, Massachusetts, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, New York, Upper Canada, Lake Superior, Northwest and Washington Territories, and thence through the southern edge of British America to the Pacific Ocean. The central line of the eclipse will enter New England near Portsmouth, and its path will extend sixty-two miles on either side. Boston will fall within its path To those on the central line the sun will appear, during the middle of the eclipse, like a huge circle of light—the moon covering every part except a very narrow rim on the outside. In Boston the appearance will be much the same, only the ring of light will be wider on one side than on the other. The central path of the eclipse will be from Kittery, opposite Portsmouth, in a northwesterly direction, through the towns of Dover, Barrington, Pittsfield, Canterbury, Franklin, Hill, Grafton, and Lebanon. The eclipse will however, be visible, to a greater or less extent, in all parts of North America excepting Gautemala and the southwest part of Mexico. It will, also be visible in Iceland, Greenland, Northern Russia, parts of Sweden and Norway, the eastern part of Asia, the West Indies, and in the northern countries of South America.

One of the peculiarites of the human constitution is, a desire to pry into the future; and hence the success with which soothsayers, astrologers, and all sorts of divines, have practised on the simplicity of mankind. Such being the fact, it is somewhat remarkable that so little has been made of the one book which professes to deal with the future—the Sacred Scriptures. It is anything but surprising, that a small portion of the Christian Church should have addicted themselves to prophetic inquiry; the surprise is rather that this has been done by so few. Somehow, even good and Christian men have learned to sneer at the "Students of Prophecy," rather than to admire them. There is undoubtedly a blessing connected with the reading and hearing of the words of prophecy, and the keeping of the things which are written therein. It has, nevertheless been deemed sufficient answer to all arguments for the study of the mystic page, that prophecy was not given to enable man to show his foreknowledge, but to demonstrate that of the Most High. This is true: but the truth closely examined does not support the assumption. To interpret the mind of God is not to become a rival intelligence, and to aim at exercising the gift of prophecy.—[British Banner.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SOUTH ORRINGTON, ME., March 25, 1854.

Bro. Merriam:—I am very thankful to God for his long-suffering which the Apostle Peter requires us to account salvation; and indeed so it is, for in this last time God is pleased to bless the preaching of the word to the salvation of those who believe. While the Midnight Cry is sounding, Armageddon's day rolls on, and the judgment approaches; the virgins are arising and trimming their lamps, and sinners are flocking to Christ, that they may find a hiding-place from the storm which is approaching. We have had a series of meetings in this place for the last week, and it has pleased the Lord to add his blessing. Instrumentalities though feeble, the Lord has owned, and made the truth borne in earthen vessels, indeed effectual. Twenty-eight are rejoicing in hope of seeing the Lord this year, 1854, the majority of whom are young converts, together with some small children, who I doubt not the good Lord has blessed. The Lord is blessing the children of my advent brethren who have sacrificed all upon the truth of his coming,—for which I thank him.—The interest still continues. Blessed be God. O how blessed it is to see the people getting ready for the Judgment, while the nations are already getting angry, and the evil servant is smiting! May the Lord assist you in your arduous labors. The Crisis is a welcome visitor in places where I have been, the contents of which are devoured with great delight. Praise God from everlasting to everlasting, for his mercy endureth forever, for "the Midnight Cry in mercy sounds," and this year we will arrive at home! O brethren, "go ye out to meet Him!" None will do it only those who are there for that purpose.

The Lord be with and save us for His name's sake. Amen. Waiting for Jesus,

J. HOWELL.

FISHERVILLE, N. H., Apr. 10, '54.

Bro. Merriam:—I do truly feel that we are living in a solemn and awful time—We are almost at the judgment, and our fellow mortals are rushing on to that day to perish forever. But I feel to praise the Lord for his mercy to the children of men, that He is giving them an opportunity to prepare for the great day of His wrath; but there will be few that will be saved.—The midnight cry is sounding. The virgins are rising and trimming their lamps, and going out to meet their coming King. The Lord is giving the truth to the people in this place. The people are convicted that the Lord is coming according to the cry. The little flock in this place are being revived in the spirit of their minds, and some of the dear lambs that have been scattered by the enemy, are being sought out and brought back to the fold. Praise the Lord forever. Some are giving their hearts to God, and believing in the cry. Others are convinced these things are so, and say if the Bible is true, the Lord will come.—I desire they will follow the light of God's Word, and seek the aid of the spirit of God, which will guide them into the truth. We have had some extra meetings. The presence of the spirit of the Lord has been manifested in the preaching of the word and setting it home to the hearts of the people. They will not go to the judgment unwarned. My prayer to God is that the seed that has been sown, may bring forth fruit to the glory of God. I feel and believe that the last notes of warning are being given to the world. The spirit of truth is setting the message home to the sinner's heart: if rejected, he is lost forever. My heart's desire and prayer to God is, that my fellow mortals would embrace the truth and be saved in God's everlasting kingdom, and His name have all the glory, Amen.

Yours in hope of the Kingdom,

C. B.

Bro. Merriam:—I have long been satisfied, that many Brn. did not read Dan. 12: 8, with the right emphasis, and consequently did not get the meaning of the last clause.

The question is asked in v. 6, "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" i. e., How long shall it be before the resurrection of the dead, and the shining of the saints in glory. The length of time is given in v. 7, by symbolic numbers. Daniel says: "I heard, but I understood not." And Daniel asks: "What shall be the end of these things?" Many say, Daniel did not ask when—the time—but what—the events. If they would reflect a moment, they would see their mistake.

Daniel heard the length of time, but he did not understand it. Now if a person tells me something, and I do not hear distinctly or understand, I ask again, What did you say? putting the emphasis on the word what, and ending with the rising inflection, and by this, showing that I did not understand the answer, and wished to have the same answer repeated. This was evidently Daniel's wish, and he as readily asked "When," as was asked in verse 6.

IMPORTANT DISCOVERY. - Great guns, boulles asphyxiants, liquid fire, Paixhan's and Warner's long ranges, and other human contrivances, for shortening life and the duration of war, being in great repute just now, we give the following interesting communication from a writer in Paris, describing the application of an important French invention to naval warfare:

"The great invention of the day, the submarine navigation of Dr. Payerne is about to be put in practice at Cherbourg, the company purchasing the invention having volunteered to cleanse that harbor, free of expense to the government. The secret consists in the discovery of a means whereby artificial air may be produced in sufficient quantity to enable a crew of fourteen men to breathe freely beneath the water for the space of four hours. A curious experiment has been already made at Marseilles, where Dr. Payerne, in company with three sailors, went to the bottom in presence of hundreds of spectators, and rose at a considerable distance and climbed the port-holes of a man-of-war without being perceived by the crew. Many experiments are about to be tried of the efficacy of this novel means of attack. A submarine fleet of small boats, each to contain a crew of twenty men, is already talked of as being about to be organized for the Black Sea. It seems that no intimation whatever is given, by the slightest ruffle on the surface, of the approach of one of these vessels. The apparatus invented by Dr. Payerne, enables the wearer, moreover, to move about with perfect ease at the bottom of the sea, and great anticipations are formed of the immense benefit to be derived in submarine history from the adoption of this new method of becoming acquainted with the hitherto unknown mystery of the ocean. However, it is not a bad reflection on the spirit of the age in which we live, to remark, that the first application of this tremendous power, which should take rank with the electric telegraph, as proof of the wondrous perseverance and ingenuity of man, has been in use for the supply of oysters from Granville for the halls of Paris."

A BATTLE IN THE BALTIC may shortly be expected; indeed, in all human probability, ere this the British fleet under Sir Charles Napier has exchanged shots with the Russians. The first point of attack was to be the island of Aland. An on dit in the fleet affirms that an officer high in command ventured, in a conference with Sir Charles Napier, to argue against attacking Aland, saying that great carnage must occur in such an attack by ships without troops, there being about seven thousand Russian soldiers in the garrison on the island. The answer of Admiral Napier is stated to have been very characteristic—"If you think so, you had better go home again."

LATER FROM EUROPE. By the Asia, at New York, yesterday, we have three days later advices from Europe—dates to the 8th inst.—and highly important intelligence relative to the war.

Liverpool, 8th, 9 A. M. The London Gazette contains an order in council, dated April 7th, stating that Russian merchant vessels which, at this date, shall be in any of her Majesty's ports in the Indian territories, under the government of the East India Company, or within any of her Majesty's foreign or colonial possessions, shall be allowed 30 days from the time of publication of this order for loading and departing; and if met at sea by any of her Majesty' ships, shall be permitted to proceed, if upon examination it shall appear that their cargoes were taken on board before the expiration of the above term, provided they have not on board any officer in the naval or military service of the enemy, or any article prohibited or contraband of war, or despatches to the Russian Government; also, that any Russian vessel which, prior to the 29th of March, shall have sailed from any foreign port for any of her Majesty's Indian territories or colonial possessions, shall be permitted to enter such port or place and discharge their cargoes, and afterwards depart without molestation, and that any such vessel if met at sea by any of her Majesty's ships, she shall be permitted to continue her voyage to any port not blockaded.

Berlin, Friday evening. The English and French Governments entirely reject the propositions of the Czar in his letter to the King of Prussia. It is now rumored that Austria will make the crossing of the Danube by the Russians a casus belli. A despatch from Berlin says that the negotiations between Austria and Prussia were not then closed, but that Prussia had joined in the protocol signed at Vienna on the 3d of April between Great Britain, France, and Austria.

Sir Charles Napier's fleet was still at Kioge Bay. Navigation was open to St. Petersburg. The allied fleet entered the Black Sea to effect a movement in conjunction with Omrr Pasha, and have steered for Varna.

No battle had yet taken place on the Baltic. As soon as hostilities commence in the Baltic, the Empress of Russia, with the Court, will remove to Moscow. The Russians dismantled their fortresses on the Island of Aland. The Russians are razing all the fortresses in the Dobrutscha. Their position is considered critical, and reinforcements are called for.

England.—In the House of Commons, on Friday, Lord John Russell confirmed the statement that Austria was concentrating troops on the frontier of Servia, but as negotiations were still pending, he could not state what course Austria would pursue. The 26th of April is appointed a National fast day throughout Great Britain.

Spain.—A serious movement of the artisans had taken place. A riot occurred at Barcelona on the 13th. The military were called out, and several citizens killed.

Turkey.—Mustapha Pasha is advancing his troops in three lines in the direction of the Trajan Wall. On the 27th the fleets were between Batchik and Varna. The Turks have beaten Gen. Gortschakoff in Bessarabia, and forced him back. They have also crossed the Danube at Nicopolis and Rustchuk. The Turks were falling back in good order on the Trajan Wall.

Special Notice.

Advent meetings every Sabbath at Lyceum Hall, Lawrence, Mass.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige and save us immense labor and perplexity if they will strictly adhere to the following rules:

1. Over all communications designed to be published write, For the World's Crisis.

2. Over all communications not designed for the public write, Private.

☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞

3. At the head of all letters write the date, never failing to give the STATE, and also County, if written from the Middle, Western or Southern States.

☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞

4. Write all orders for the paper or for books on a page by itself, beginning thus, Order for the Crisis, or, Order for books, as the case may be.

5. At the close of each letter containing money write the amount, and to whom it is to be credited.

6. Be careful to write names and P. O. addresses in a legible hand.

7. In returning papers write on the paper the name and P. O. address of the person, to whom it had been sent.

8. In preparing matter for the Crisis we hope our correspondents will adopt, as the most important and indispensible of all rules, the practice of commending the subject to God, praying fervently for light to be reflected on the position of the Church, and for heavenly manna to feed and nurture the little flock unto eternal life—also that sinners may be induced to flee from impending wrath, and take refuge in the ark before the deluge takes them all away.

9. Let the letters and communications be carefully read over, corrected, and, if need be re-written, punctuated and prepared for the press, so far as the writer has ability so to do. If, however, the writer does not understand punctuation, &c., the Editor is just as willing, and if possible more so, to serve the humblest member of the flock in bringing his or her sentiments and feelings before the public, as those who have been favored with higher educational advantages, provided only they write under the influence of the Spirit of God.

In sending out nearly nine thousand papers, it would not be strange if some mistakes should be attributable to us, others, it may be, to the Post Offices, and others still to the neglect of subscribers to give their proper Post Office address. We hope in such cases brethren will exercise a little patience, and write us, if necessary, so that we may rectify all mistakes which it will ever afford us pleasure to do. tf

All letters of business in relation to the World's Crisis, or to books sold at the office of the Crisis, or letters containing payment for "the grand crisis in human affairs" and "the Advent Hymn-book," must in future be directed to Jonas Merriam, Editor of the World's Crisis.

Wm. B. Rose's P. O. address is Southwick, Mass.

Bro. James E. Clark's P. O. address is New Haven, Ct., instead of Waterville, Ct., as we published through a mistake. 2w

Bro. Merriam, will you please say to Bro. Grant, through the Crisis, that we will expect to see an appointment for this place (Newark) from him as soon as possible.

Hymn.

Strangers, o'er earth we're roaming,
Lonely ones,
The haughty world not knowing
Jehovah's sons.
But when our crowns we wear,
And a bright kingdom share,
There, in the new earth fair,
We'll weep no more.

We're "children of the Highest,"
Though despised,
Our rich inheritance
Unseen, unprized;
Not yet it doth appear,
While we are wand'ring here,
What glory we shall bear,
When gained our Home.

Waked in our Saviour's likeness
Satisfied,
We'll range the blissful regions
By His side.
Trials will then be o'er,
And we shall "die no more."
Death's mighty conqueror,
We wait for Thee.

Where cloudless skies are beaming
Soon we'll be;
Our King in glorious beauty
Soon shall see.
While sweetest anthems swell,
All His rich grace we'll tell,
And near His throne we'll dwell
Forevermore.

PROPHETIC PERIODS—1260, 1290, 1335 Years of Daniel and John.

The daily sacrifice taken away, and the Abomination of Desolation set up, or the Saints given into the hand of the Little Horn. . . . . 519.

1260 years of tribulation.—Rev. 11: 2, 3, and 12: 6, 14, and 13: 5. The sun darkened May 19, 1780, to show its termination. ☞ 1779.

1290 years, or time times and the dividing of time—or time times and a part, in which the TIMES and LAWS are in the hands of the Little Horn. 1809. Napoleon takes away the civil power of the Little Horn.

1833. Fall of the Stars.

☞ THE END. ☜

1335 years, reaching from the setting up of the Abomination of Desolation, or the time when the Saints' times and laws were given into the hand of the Little Horn, to the end, when Daniel with all the Saints will stand in their lot. . . . . 1854.

☞ The above Diagram is designed to illustrate the measurement of time from the rise of the little horn, with eyes and a mouth (the civil power of the Greek Empire, or Eastern Rome incorporated with the Ecclesiastical Power of the Papacy.—Dan. 7: 8) until the coming of Christ at the resurrection of the saints.

The 1290 years, or time, times and the dividing of time, (Dan. 7: 25) measure the period during which the saints, times and laws were to be given into his hand—The period of the saint's tribulation, we understand, were shortened to 1260 years, (Rev. 12: 6, 14—11: 2 and 13: 5); but times and laws were to remain in his hand during 1290 years, extending 30 years beyond the 1260. "But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion to consume and destroy unto the end." 45 years from the close of the 1290 make 1335 years, when Daniel will stand in his lot, which must be at the resurrection of the saints.

Christ, speaking of this desolating power—the papacy—says, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened,"—which marks a point previous to which the saints were taken out of the hands of the little horn power. Thus we perceive that 1260 years of the 1335 ended prior to the 19th of May, 1780, when the sun was darkened. Add 75 years to 1260 and you have 1335 years, which must end before May 19th, 1855, according to the evidence from the darkening of the sun. But we have abundant historical evidence that the papal power, i. e. the abomination that maketh desolate, was set up in 519, hence the 1335 days (years) end in 1854, which brings the coming of the Lord and the resurrection of the saints the present year.

SAMUEL PAGE.

The Great Anti-Christian Power,

AS REPRESENTED BY

DANIEL, CHRIST, PAUL AND JOHN:

BY J. COUCH.

"When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand:)"—Matt. 24: 15.

In order to understand correctly the ideas conveyed by any author, we need to understand the subject according to the application made by the writer himself. The circumstances under which this expression was uttered by our Saviour, were the following: It appears that Jesus had visited Jerusalem, and while He was leaving the city, the disciples called His attention to the temple and the buildings connected with it, to which He replied, "See ye not all these things? Verily I say unto you, there shall not be left here one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down."—Jesus then repaired to the mount of Olives, where He passed the ensuing night. In private conversation the disciples inquired of Him, "WHEN shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" The idea involved in this question was an inquiry in relation to the time when these events should transpire, and not in relation to the agent to be employed in the execution of the work. Jesus answered their question, and the answer of course corresponds to the import of the question. As expositors are not agreed in relation to the bearing of the question, the subject may be understood by a critical analysis of the reply, which Christ gave to the question. Therefore if the disciples wished to be informed when Jerusalem was to be destroyed, as it was by the Roman army under Titus, the answer would be such as would shew them when the Roman invasion would take place; but we find the answer gives the events connected with His second coming, and the end of the world. He portrays first the events that would transpire at a period remote from the event in question, saying, Many shall come professing to be Christ, and nation would rise against nation, &c. But these events were not to be in immediate proximity to that event, in relation to the time of which they had inquired. By reference to Buck's Theological Dictionary, it will be seen, that the first false Christ of any note appeared in the reign of Adrian, in the second century. In respect to the rising of nation against nation, the first war which the Church could recognize as a fulfilment of the prediction, was the same war in which Jerusalem itself was destroyed; so that when these wars were accomplished, it could not be said, that the destruction of Jerusalem was yet in the distant future. He next proceeds to shew what events would occur in immediate connection with that great event, with regard to which their inquiries were made.

1. "This Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations; THEN SHALL THE END COME." The Gospel of the kingdom was a time message to the Jewish nation, shewing the appointed time had arrived for them to receive the kingdom, (Mark 1: 14, 15.) "Now after that John was put in prison, Jesus came into Gallilee, preaching the Gospel of the kingdom of God, and saying THE TIME IS FULFILLED, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent ye and believe the Gospel." This message was limited to the Jewish nation and to their territory; but inasmuch as the Jews rejected it, the kingdom was taken from them to be given to another nation. Therefore Jesus says, "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." (Matt. 21: 43.) The nation here referred to, was the Christian Church. Peter, speaking to his brethren, says, "Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation." (1 Pet. 2: 9.—This people, (the Gentile Church,) to whom the kingdom would be given, also must have the Gospel of the kingdom preached to them, shewing that the time appointed for them to receive the kingdom had come; and as the Gentile Church are among all nations, it must consequently be preached in all the world, as that was in the land of Israel. The exhibition of Christ's coming and kingdom was connected with this proclamation to the Jews, as shewn by Christ, when He says, "These twelve Jesus sent forth, and commanded them, saying, Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not: But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand."—(Matt. 10: 5–7.) "But when they persecute you in this city, flee ye into another: for verily I say unto you, Ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel, till the son of man be come." (Matt. 10: 23) And again, "Verily I say unto you, There be some standing here which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom. And after six days Jesus taketh Peter, James, and John his brother, and bringeth them up into an high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them: and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light. And, behold, there appeared unto them Moses and Elias talking with him."—(Matt. 16: 28, and 17: 1–3.)

It appears therefore, that the coming and kingdom of Christ would occur in connection with the proclamation of the kingdom; and as the Jews rejected the proffered kingdom, it could only appear in miniature in connection with the message to the Jews.

That the transfiguration was a representation of the second Advent of Christ, and the establishment of His kingdom at the end of the world, is evident from 2. Pet. 1: 16–18; "For we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we have made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye witnesses of his majesty. For he received from God the Father honour and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount." Jesus, in shewing the connection of these events, and giving the event which should happen in immediate connection with His second Advent, says; "And this Gospel of the kingdom, (the proclamation that the time is fulfilled,) shall be preached in all the world, (as that was in the land of Israel,) for a witness unto all nations, (as that was to the Jews,) and then shall the end come, (represented by His transfiguration.) We perceive from this, that the Saviour was shewing his disciples when the world would end, and not when Jerusalem would be destroyed.

2. The Savior also predicts that the sun should be darkened, and the moon should not give her light, and the stars should fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens should be shaken. He then shews them, that in connection with these events, they should "see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven;" and that when these signs of his coming had been seen by the Church, they might then know that it (Mar. He) (not the destruction of Jerusalem,) was near even at the doors, with as much certainty as we may know when summer is near by the putting forth of leaves on the fig-tree. He then says; "But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only." He however informs them, that when the event should come, it would be as it was in the days of Noah. But we inquire, in what respect it should be as it was in the days of Noah. As He was speaking of the knowledge of the time of that event, we may conclude He refers to the same fact in relation to His second coming. The Savior shews this by His own application: "For as in the days that were before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day Noah entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." (Matt. 24: 38, 39.) What did they know not until the flood came? It was that, which they did know when the flood came, of which they had no previous knowledge.—It could not be their acts of eating and drinking, &c, for this they did know before the flood came. Therefore it could be nothing of which Jesus was speaking, but the knowledge of the time. Jesus says, in this particular, His second Advent shall be as it was in the days of Noah. And as He shows us the fate of those that knew not then, we may discover our own danger, if found in the same ignorance at the coming of Christ. Therefore Jesus foreseeing the danger in which the Church would be involved, and having shown them that they could not understand the time until the signs appeared, (for He says, "THEN know,") exhorts them to watchfulness in order that they might discern the signs of His coming. The importance of this subject He illustrates by the following comparison. A man having goods in his house which a thief had purposed to steal, and learning when the thief would come, would keep his goods; but not knowing when the thief would come, his house would be broken open, and his goods stolen. That the knowledge of the time of Christ's second coming may be obtained by watching, is evident from Rev. 3: 3, "If, therefore, thou shall not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee."

From this argument of our Savior, it appears, that, He was instructing the disciples in relation to the time of His second Advent and the end of the world, and not in relation to the destruction of Jerusalem or any other event.

But we return to the scriptural sentiment first quoted, viz. "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand.") As the abomination of desolation is involved in the answer of our Savior to the disciples, it is of course presented in order to assist the Church in understanding the time of His coming. The Saviour does not make a direct application of the abomination to the time of the Advent, but directs us to Daniel, from whose prophecy the desired information may be obtained; and then exhorts us to read and understand it. As Christ taught the Church in his answer to the disciples that the time of His Advent could not be definitely understood until the signs should appear, but that it then would be understood as Noah understood the time of the flood; and as the definite time was not given by Christ, the Church might expect to find it in some other portion of the divine word: and as He directs us to no other testimony but to that of Daniel, we may expect to find it given in connection with the history of the abomination. We therefore, agreeably to the direction of our Savior, refer to Daniel, in order to get instruction on the subject of the abomination.

But in what portion of the book of Daniel shall we obtain the information desired? Evidently in that portion which gives the history of the abomination to which He referred. But does not Daniel speak of more than one abomination? He does.—To which of the abominations, then, does the Savior refer? He must have referred to that particular abomination which corresponds to the description He gives of it. The Savior shows, by using the definite article "the," that it is a particular abomination which is designated by some distinctive mark, or characteristic. To illustrate the subject: I say to a friend, "read the book lying upon the stand." If there are several books, he would not know which one was referred to, therefore the article "the" would be improperly used. But if I say "read the book with gilt cover," and there is but one of that description, the term would be properly used. We therefore conclude that one particular abomination is referred to by the prophet. But when we refer to Daniel, we find him (ch. 9: 27,) speaking of a number of abominations thus: "For the overspreading of abominations He shall make it desolate." Here he is speaking of the desolation of Jerusalem. As Daniel does not in this passage define a particular abomination, but refers to a class of abominations, we are not authorised from this text, or context, to say that one of these is the one referred to. We inquire, therefore, what particular relation these abominations sustain to the desolation of Jerusalem. It is evident from the text, they are the procuring cause of Jerusalem's desolation, but not the agencies themselves by which Jerusalem was to be desolated: for the expression, 'he shall make it desolate,' shews that "he (the Prince of the Covenant,) is the desolating agent of Jerusalem's destruction, while the abominations here spoken of are simply the procuring cause, in consequence of which, the city was to be desolated.

That Jerusalem was to be destroyed, because of the abominations of the Jews, is clear from Ezek 6: 11,12—"Thus saith the Lord God; Smite with thine hand, and stamp with thy foot, and say, Alas for all the evil abominations of the house of Israel! for they shall fall by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence. He that is far off shall die of the pestilence; and he that is near shall fall by the sword; and he that remaineth and is beseiged shall die by the famine: thus will I accomplish my fury upon them."

We find Daniel in another passage speaking of an abomination (ch. 12: 11,) "And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination which maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days." Here Daniel alludes to a particular abomination, using the definite article, "the," as did the Saviour. But is this the abomination of which Jesus speaks? It is if we can find in this abomination that which corresponds to the gilt-covered book in our illustration; or in other words, if we can find the peculiar properties, which are distinctive marks, or characteristics of the abomination referred to by our Saviour. Jesus speaks of the abomination in connection with desolation, not as a principle, but as an agent; for he shews that it will "STAND in the holy place." Daniel says, "the abomination that MAKETH desolate." In this particular idea, viz. that the abomination is a desolating agent, we find there is a perfect correspondence between Christ and Daniel. Again, as Christ was answering the question of His disciples in reference to the time of His second Advent, whatever instructions He gives must be appropriate to the subject in question; and as we have already shewn, He taught the disciples, that the Church did not then understand the time, but in the last generation they would understand it as Noah understood the time of the flood; and as He did not give the time in answer to the disciples, we may expect it will be found in some other revelation made to the Church; and as the Saviour refers us to no other source of information, upon this subject, except to Daniel's prophecy, and to that portion of it, in particular, which relates to the abomination, therefore we may expect, when we find the abomination in Daniel referred to by the Saviour, we shall find the revelation of the time of the second Advent. In connection with the abomination spoken of by Daniel, the prophet gives us certain chronological periods, one of which reaches to the resurrection of the dead; and an understanding of these periods depends on an understanding of the setting up (or standing) of the abomination. Therefore we find Daniel treating upon the same subject when he introduces the abomination, that Christ was treating of when He introduces the abomination; and to shew this fact still clearer, the Saviour taught the disciples, that the time could not be understood until the last generation came upon the stage; and the Angel informs Daniel that the phrophetic periods connected with the abomination were to be sealed up until the time of the end, which implies that in the time of the end they would be unsealed, at which time the angel says, "the wise shall understand." The Saviour exhorts the Church to "watch" (that they might understand) and says, "whoso readeth," (this subject in Daniel,) "let him understand." From these considerations it appears, that there is a glorious harmony on this subject as presented by Christ and Daniel, shewing it is the will of heaven that this subject, involving the time of Christ's second coming, should be understood.

Now, beloved Brethren and Sisters, we have divine authority for our encouragement in seeking to understand the word in relation to the time of the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ. The prophetic periods are inseparably connected with the rise of that abomination which is to desolate the church and wear out the saints of the Most High; and those periods incontrovertibly extend to the standing of Daniel in his lot, and the resurrection of all the righteous dead. Glory to God for the blessed, soul-cheering light that beams on this subject through the medium of the prophetic vision; and blessed be His name, that the seal has been broken that covered these periods as with a vail; and now, in the time of the end; now, in the last generation, after the signs have been given, we have the glorious privilege of understanding the record in relation to these momentous subjects, in which our final salvation is involved. Let us then, as we come to examine the periods of Daniel and John, and the history of the abomination with which they are connected, seek the holy unction from on high—the heavenly eye-salve, that we may see, and know, and understand the teachings of the oracles on this subject.—A correct understanding of the whole matter depends on a correct understanding of the abomination; and may the Lord direct us in our investigations, that we may be found among the wise who shall understand, and obey the command of our blessed Saviour, "whoso readeth" (Daniel) "let him understand."

Bro. Merriam:—Permit me to express my thanks to you, and by you through the Crisis, to those dear brethren that have manifested their christian benevolence and godly charity in publishing and circulating your weekly and heart-cheering visitor, "the World's Crisis."

Although I do not at present endorse all the views that is advocated by the Crisis, but the spirit of kindness that charcterizes its pages, I can but highly approve of, my brother. But especially do I rejoice in beholding the harmony and beauty that is in the prophetic numbers, as arranged and explained by brother F. H. Berick and others that participate with him. None, it seems to me, that love God's word, and believe in its authenticity, can help admiring the beauty and harmony that is now manifested in, and that cluster around those sacred numbers. Already has the presentation of those numbers had a more general effect where they have been presented, than either the preaching of '43 or '44 did: for then many would mock, despise and scoff at all the evidence that was presented, (although many believed to the saving of their souls). But now, wherever these numbers are presented in a connected manner, entire congregations are chained for days, and that almost in breathless silence, to listen to the subject. I have not yet met the first case, where the person has been found, that has stood up and refuted these things. Some have attempted to, but have had to yield to the force of truth, or quit the field vanquished.

No one could have been more firmly established against these things than I thought myself to be: and last fall, when I learned that Brn. Berick and Couch were coming west, and that they intended to visit Buchanan, my arrangements were made for going to Illinois to preach the word before I left. However, I gave a number of lectures in Buchanan on the subject of time, or rather against the time questions, and then warned the church against being led into what I called fanaticism.

Bro. Couch came to Buchanan the day I started. I stated to him honestly that I had no sympathy with the time question, and that as far as I had examined the subject, I considered it unsustanied by scriptural argument. I acknowledged however, that their arrangement of numbers was probably correct, but the event to transpire at the end of these numbers, I believed would be the removal of the special curse from the Abrahamic land, together with the drying up of the river Euphrates (Turkish power) and the subversion of certain other powers named in Dan. 11 chap., Jer. 25 chap. Ezek. 38, 39 chaps, &c., that these were the scenes that were to transpire at the end of these chronological periods, and that we should be brought into the time called 'quickly,' (a little while), in which time we might have to wait a number of years before the Bridegroom would come. One of the main evidences that I predicated my views upon, was Gabriel's instruction to Daniel 12 chap. 13 v., as follows: "Go thou thy way till the end be, for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days." In examination of what I considered very able criticisms on the above scriptures, I had supposed that it should have been rendered thus; thou shalt stand in thy lot AFTER the end of the days. Having imbibed these views, I felt prepared to to meet all the arguments that could be offered. But I meant to prove all things according to the skill God had given me. To do so, therefore, as soon as brother Berick's work was published, entitled "the Grand Crisis in Human Affairs." I procured a copy as soon as possible, for the purpose of understanding his arguments, so as to know how to meet them; and as I progressed in the examination, my objections and difficulties were removed one after another, until the light has become so conspicous, beaming forth through these combined numbers of prophecy, that as an honest man and a watchman, I must join my voice in concert to warn the world, and proclaim the coming of the Lord at the end of the 1335 days. I have been a little particular, Brother Merriam because I thought likely that the dear saints in the East, and other places where I have labored in times past, would like to know something of the process by which I have come to a knowledge of and belief in the truth. I have mourned much since '43, and 4, thinking that we should probably never have any more light on time than we had had; but glory to God, dear children, when we were a lonely band, weary and worn, and sad, our path almost obscured, the virgins slumbering and sleeping, none among us that knew how long the time of the Bridegroom's tarrying would continue; at that critical moment, when the night was dark and dreary, a watchman faithful to his God and the people, looked forth upon the scene to watch for tokens of the promised day of deliverance, he seems to see by the lamp of truth and the signs of the times, that the promised day is breaking, the shadows are fleeing away and the morning is about to be ushered in. He lifts his warning voice, gives the midnight cry—the slumbering virgins are aroused from their slumbers, watchmen that have been stupid and drowsy, and saw no signs of the approaching morn, are now arising and echoing the cry behold he cometh! The thrilling cry is spreading, the tidings are rolling on, behold the day of deliverance is at hand, and soon, my dear brethren, those of us that have given each other the parting hand in grief, will meet to part no more. The message is affecting wonders in this western country. I shall do what I can to sound the alarm to the world, until Jesus comes, or I go to rest as Daniel did. We are truly grateful to you Bro., that you still remember us so much as to send us the Crisis.

Your Brother in trbulation, waiting for deliverance at the revelation of Jesus.

YATES HIGGINS.

ORRINGTON, March 6th. 1854.

Bro. Merriam:—I would say a few words through the Crisis, especially to the lonely portion of the flock scattered among the mountains. Being satisfied by evidence sufficient that this is the year for the gathering of the saints, I can say, "be of good cheer" ye lonely ones, you have the same God, the same Bible, the same evidence in respect to the position of thetrue Church: also the prayers of God's children, and especially the prayer of the Head of the Church recorded in John 17th. While you are deprived of many privileges that others enjoy of assembling with those of like faith, remember in a few months or weeks your privileges will be equal with theirs in a land of rest. Blessed thought! almost there—but Oh! how carefully ought we to live. Let us beware of deceptive spirits—search for the truth—let it suitably effect all of your actions, and even your thoughts. Then your conversation will be right, which is highly important. Oh we must be "without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing."

Brethren, the Midnight Cry is doing a good work for us in Orrington, as well as in other places. Last evening a number deliberately confessed their faith and desire to make preparation for the coming kingdom. To day eleven were baptized. The interest is still in progress.

While by the side of the water, looking over the assembly, thought I, how gladly you would all embrace such an opportunity when too late.

Only a little from this, all will be over.—Reader, "prepare to meet thy God."

Exposition of Ezek. chap. 38 and 39.

(Concluded.)

It may be remarked, that, the above scriptures could not be fulfilled at the time claimed by this position; for the Jews do not now possess the land, whereas, the prophets declare, that when the children of Israel are gathered back, they shall possess the land forever. To this we reply, that the same idea is inculcated throughout the Bible; but it is always on condition that they (the Jews) obey the Lord their God. This is evidently the true position, and, however much it may be doubted, it stands as an unchangeable principle. How could any person look for a restoration of the Jews, subsequently to the Babylonish captivity, whether before or after the advent of Christ, unless the promises and threatenings of Jehovah are conditional? Says Jeremiah, when speaking of the overthrow of the Jews:—"O my mountain in the field, I will give thy substance and all thy treasures to the spoil, and thy high places for sin, throughout all thy borders. And thou, even thyself, shalt discontinue from thine heritage that I gave thee; and I will cause thee to serve thine enemies in the land which thou knowest not: for ye have kindled a fire in mine anger, which shall burn for ever."

Surely, if God's anger burn for ever, against the Jews, they never will return. But says the objector, "it don't mean forever;" then, when the prophet says they shall return to their own land, and shall not be plucked up again forever, this is to be understood in the same sense. Again, the prophet says:—"Therefore, behold, I, even I, will utterly forget you, and I will forsake you, and the city that I gave you and your fathers, and cast you out of my presence: and I will bring an everlasting reproach upon you, and a perpetual shame, which shall not be forgotten."

How, we ask, are the Jews, or Israel, to be favored by the Almighty again; if, the overthrow of their city, by the Babylonians, is to result in an EVERLASTING reproach, and a PERPETUAL shame? But, says the objector; God has promised to restore Israel; true, but, has he not also threatened them with everlasting reproach? and is not the one, as positive as the other? The fact is, God's promises and threatenings to the children of men, are conditional; and in the 18 Chap. of Jeremiah, this principle is clearly presented. He says:—"At what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to pluck up, and to pull down, and to destroy it: if that nation against whom I have pronounced, turn from their evil, I will repent of the evil I thought to do unto them. And at what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to build and to plant it; if it do evil in my sight, that it obey not my voice, then I will repent of the good, wherewith I said I would benefit them."

In the presentation of this subject we have shown, we believe, a fulfilment of the prophetic word. Let each, and every one, compare the historical testimony presented with the prediction, and see, if there has not been a perfect accomplishment. The subject is worthy of our consideration. In the foregoing article we have shown, as we believe, 1. That the nations brought to view under the denomination of Gog, Magog, Meshech, Tubal, &c., were located north of Palestine, and south of the Black, and Caspian seas. 2. They did invade the land of Israel. 3. That, it was in the latter days, in the sense of the prophecy. 4. It was after the return from Babylon; and, when the Jews dwelt in their own land, that Gog came against them. 5. All the time of the invasion, the Jews were in possession of gold and silver, cattle and goods, agreeably to the prophecy. 6. They dwelt (after the captivity) to a considerable extent, in unwalled villages. 7. That Antiochus, and his successors, together with their generals and armies, ruled over the nations represented by Magog, Meshech, Tubal, Togarmah, Gomer, &c., and, that they did, in the most signal manner, fulfil the prophecy, in their war against the Jews. 8. The ostensible object of Antiochus, in invading the land, and that of Apolonius, his general, was, to get "silver and gold"—"to take a great spoil."—This fact is clearly set forth in the following remark of Josephus; he says, "But for Antiochus (Epiphanes) he had no just cause for that ravage in our temple that he made; he only came to it when he WANTED MONEY, without declaring himself our enemy, and attacked us while we were his associates and friends. * * * This is attested by many worthy writers; Polybius of Megalapolis, Strabo of Cappadocia, Nicolaus of Demascus, Timagenes, Castor, the Chronologer, and Apollodorus, who all say, that it was out of Antiochus's want of money that he broke his league with the Jews, and despoiled their temple when it was FULL of GOLD and SILVER." 9. That the attempt to root out the generation of the Jews, by this mighty power, met with a most signal defeat. 10. That the Jews, during a campaign of seven years, from B. C. 167, did destroy thousands of their enemies, burnt their engines and weapons of war, razed their cities and fortresses to the ground, and did, in the language of the prophet, "spoil those that spoiled them," and "rob those that robbed them." 11. That God did, in a special manner, aid them in thus defeating their enemies. 12. That after this overthrow of their enemies, the land was cleansed, by removing the idols, carcasses, and bones of their enemies, and restoring the true worship of God. 13. They subdued the neighboring nations,—as the Idumeans, &c. 14. Their kingdom became as great as in the days of David, and Solomon; and the wealth of their capital, still greater. Having, as we believe, sustained the foregoing points, we must as a matter of truth, regard the prophecy as in the past.

There are some points in this quotation from Obadiah to which I wish to call particular attention. It is claimed by many that the restoration of Jacob, Joseph, Israel, as specified by the prophet Obadiah, is to take place in the future, or, in what is, by some of our brethren, called the age to come. But there is no necessity of referring this prophecy to the future; it has all been fulfilled, every identical feature of it. But you may inquire where is the proof of its fulfilment, for we cannot believe without evidence? Well, let us for a moment look at the main features of this prophecy.

1st. It is declared that "on Mount Zion shall be deliverance," &c. We have shown in the historical testimony, to which we have called the reader in this article, that God did deliver his people from the Babylonish captivity, and that subsequently, they prevailed over their enemies, regained their independence, beautified Mount Moriah—the Zion of God and the glory of Israel, and inhabited it as in the days of old.

2d. Jacob is to prevail against Esau, &c. The children of Esau dwelt in what is called in the Bible, "Mount Seir," or "Idumæa," and subsequently to the Babylonish captivity, and in the days of the Maccabees, they were subjected by the Jews. In the first book of Maccabees, we read:—"Then Judas fought against the children of Esau in Idumæa at Arabattine (Akrabattine), because they besieged Israel; and he gave them a great overthrow, and abated their courage, and took their spoils." Newton, in speaking of this, says: "Judas Maccabæus attacked and defeated them several times, 'killed no fewer than twenty thousand' at one time, and 'more than twenty thousand' at another, and took their chief city 'Hebron, and the towns thereof, and pulled down the fortress of it, and burnt the towers thereof round about.'" Again, "At last his nephew, Hyrcanus, the son of Simon, took other of their cities, and reduced them to the necessity of embracing the Jewish religion, or of leaving their country and seeking new habitations elsewhere, whereupon they submitted to be circumcised, and became proselytes to the Jewish religion, and ever after were incorporated into the Jewish Church and nation." (p. 41.) In this complete overthrow of the Edomites, was fulfilled the prophecy of Ezekiel 25: 12-14, "Thus saith the Lord God; because that Edom hath dealt against the house of Judah by taking vengeance, and hath greatly offended, and revenged himself upon them; therefore thus saith the Lord God; I will also stretch out mine hand upon Edom, and will cut off man and beast from it; and I will make it desolate from Teman; and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword. And I will lay my vengeance upon Edom by THE HAND OF MY PEOPLE ISRAEL: and they shall do in Edom according to mine anger and according to my fury; and they shall know my vengeance, saith the Lord God." It was at this time that the Edomites ceased to be a distinct nation, and as Newton says: "the very name was abolished and disused about the end of the first century after Christ."

3d. The Jews were to possess the mountains of Esau; or, in the language of the text: "And they of the south shall possess the mount of Esau; and they of the plain the Philistines; and they shall possess the fields of Ephraim, and the fields of Samaria: and Benjamin shall possess Gilead." Now this text was fulfilled, and as we have before remarked, Josephus says:—that Hyrcanus subdued ALL of the IDUMEANS; and in chap. 15, B. xiii, when referring to Alexander's administration, he says: "Now at this time the Jews were in possession of the following cities that had belonged to the Syrians, and Idumeans, and Phœnicians; at the Sea-side, Strato's Tower, Apollonia, Joppa, Jamnia, Ashdod, Gaza, Anthedon, Raphia, and Rhinocolura; in the middle of the country, near to Idumea, Adora, Marissa; near the country of Samaria, Mount Carmel, and Mount Tabor, Scythopolis, and Gadara; of the country of Gaulonitis, Seleusia, and Gabala; in the country of Moab, Hesbon, and Medaba, Lemba, and Oronas, Gelithon, Zara, the Valley of the Celices, and Pella; which last they utterly destroyed, because its inhabitants would not bear to change their religious rites for those peculiar to the Jews. The Jews also possessed others of the principle citties in Syria, which had been destroyed"

4th. "The kingdom shall be the Lord's," &c. This expression of the prophet, has determined many to believe that the kingdom referred to God's everlasting kingdom; but this we believe is inadmissable. The phrase, "kingdom," as used by the prophet, is not, however, as some have supposed, of a spiritual character or nature, but substantially and really a kingdom, the sovereign authority of which is directed by the Lord. The people of Israel, or the Jews, under the direction of the Lord, are, by the prophets, called sometimes a kingdom, at other times a heritage. David, in speaking of the Jews under the figure of a vine, as illustrative of God's mercy and care for his people, says:—"Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt: thou hast cast out the heathen and planted it. Thou preparedst room before it, and didst cause it to take deep root, and it filled the land. The hills were covered with the shadow of it, and the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedars. She sent out her boughs unto the sea, and her branches unto the river."

It may be well to remark that the descendants of Jacob were, for a long time, under the immediate direction of the Almighty, both in their religious and civil government; and in this respect they differed from all the nations of the earth. This theocratic form of government continued for many years, at least, from the days of Moses to the time of Samuel, or, until Saul was chosen king. And even then, the Lord did not give up the supreme government; "he was still KING in Israel, and the king, so called, was only the vicegerent or deputy of the Lord," and hence David, when chosen to be king over Israel, is recognized as deputed, or entrusted with the sovereign power under the direction of the Almighty. The remark of Abijah, (2 Chron. 13: 5-8,) sets this matter in its true light. He says:—"Ought ye not to know that the Lord God of Israel gave the kingdom over Israel to David forever, even to him and to his sons by a covenant of salt? Yet Jeroboam the son of Nebat, the servant of Solomon the son of David, is risen up, and hath rebelled against his lord. And there are gathered unto him vain men, the children of Belial, and have strengthened themselves against Rehoboam the son of Solomon, when Rehoboam was young and tender-hearted, and could not withstand them. And now ye think to withstand the KINGDOM OF THE LORD in the hand of the sons of David," &c. Here the fact is recognized that the kingdom is still the Lords, notwithstanding David is the king. And thus it continued down to the Babylonish captivity, when the Jews were scattered among the nations, and their land was desolate for seventy years; after which, God remembered his covenant, and restored them to their own land. In this restoration we have a perfect fulfilment of Zech. 8. He says:—"Thus saith the Lord: I am returned unto Zion, and will dwell in the midst of Jerusalem: and Jerusalem shall be called, a city of truth; and the mounted of the Lord of host, the holy mountain. Thus saith the Lord of hosts; there shall yet old men and old women dwell in the streets of Jerusalem, and every man with his staff in his hand for very age. And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof. Thus saith the Lord of hosts; if it be marvellous in the eyes of the remnant of this people in these days, should it also be marvellous in mine eyes? saith the Lord of hosts. Thus saith the Lord of Lord of hosts; behold, I will save my people from the east country, and from the west country; and I will bring them, and they shall dwell in the midst of Jerusalem; and they shall be my people, and I will be their God, in truth and in righteousness. Thus saith the Lord of hosts; let your hands be strong, ye that hear in these days these words by the mouth of the prophets, which were in the day that the foundation of the house of the Lord of hosts was laid, that the temple might be built.—For before these days there was no hire for man, nor any hire for beast: neither was there any peace to him that went out or came in because of the affliction: for I set all men every one against his neighbour. But now I will not be unto the residue of this people as in the former days, saith the Lord of hosts. For the seed shall be prosperous; the vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase, and the heavens shall give their dew; and I will cause the remnant of this people to possess all these things. And it shall come to pass, that as ye were a curse among the heathen, O house of Judah, and house of Israel, so will I save you, and ye shall be a blessing: fear not, but let your hands be strong. For thus saith the Lord of hosts; as I thought to punish you, when your fathers provoked me to wrath, saith the Lord of hosts, and I repented not: so again have I thought in these days to do well unto Jerusalem and to the house of Judah: fear ye not." Review of the Week—Our latest advices from Europe are to April 8th. By these we learn that the Russian forces have crossed the Danube in great numbers, though at points much nearer the mouth of the Danube than her first attempts indicated to be her purpose; and that now nearly the whole region of country north of the great fortifications at Varna and Shumla, the keys of the Balkan mountains, is now in the hands of the Russians, who are reported to have some 50,000 soldiers on the Eastern or Turkish side of the Danube. The object of the Russians in making this movement is not very obvious. Some apprehend that the object is to make a desperate push on Constantinople before the allies can reach the theatre of war; but it would seem most probable that they were desirous of drawing the Turks into an engagement and striking a blow before the auxiliary troops should arrive. The ground which the Russians now occupy on the right bank of the Danube, is said to be unhealthy and unsafe—the space between the river and the sea being cut up by pools and marshes. At Oltenitza the Russians were defeated with a terrible slaughter in attempting to cross the river. Kalafat is still retained by the Turks, and all attempts to force that strong hold seem to be abandoned for the present at least. The Turks have still a numerical force along the Danube nearly equal to the Russians, and their [illegible] at Shumla and Varna, [illegible] make a determined resistance. In fact, it may be the plan of the Turkish commander to allow the Russians to advance without much opposition to the neighborhood of these strong fortifications, and to concentrate his troops there for a determined struggle. Our very latest accounts from the Danube mention that, in some encounters between the contending parties, the Turks were successful at points higher up the river than those at which the main body of the Russians crossed. Whatever may be the intentions of the contending parties, their relative position is now (or rather was at our last advices) such as to excite the liveliest interest in all who feel any solicitude for the ultimate result of this fearful struggle. In the meantime the course of Austria is watched with great solicitude by all parties. She has raised her army to a war footing, and has large masses near the frontiers, prepared to act as circumstances may seem to require.—Her intimation to Russia with reference to crossing the Danube, is thought to be nearly equivalent to a purpose to take sides with Turkey, if Russia persisted in advancing over the borders of that country.—[Boston Traveller.

Romanism in Nova Scotia.

[A subscriber of ours in Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, sent a few copies of the Advent Herald to the son of a Romanist. It seems that the Roman priest got hold of them and burnt them; for the Father of the young man being aged, and unable to read or write, the letter dated Halifax, February 22, was undoubtedly written by the priest. The following account of the matter we find in the Christian Messenger.]

"Now I saw in my dream, that at the end of this valley lay blood, bones, ashes, and mangled bodies of men, even of pilgrims that had gone this way formerly.—And while I was musing what should be the reason, I espied a little before me a cave, where two giants, Pope and Pagan, dwelt in old time; by whose power and tyranny the men, whose bones, blood, ashes, &c., lay there, were cruelly put to death. But by this place Christian went without much danger, whereat I somewhat wondered; but I have learnt since, that Pagan has been dead many a year. And as for the other, though he be yet alive, he is, by reason of age and also of the many shrewd brushes that he met with in his younger days, grown so crazy and stiff in his joints, that he can now do little more than sit in his cave's mouth, grinning at pilgrims as they go by, and biting his nails because he cannot come at them."—[Pilgrim's Progress.

DEAR BRETHREN:—Some time since I sent you a notice of the baptism among us of a young man formerly a Romanist.—A few weeks after his baptism he went home to his relatives, residing in your city. I had given him letters to our Baptist brethren there, and urged him to write as soon as he could. Weeks passed on, and we heard nothing, except a loose rumor that our convert had gone back to his old profession. This we could not believe.—Still we were anxious for distinct information. In this state of things the friend with whom the young man had resided here, and through whose influence he had first been led to read the Bible for himself, forwarded a few lines, begging a letter and tidings. These lines accompanied some numbers of the Advent Herald, which papers contained chronological tables touching the history of the Papacy. These papers, with their accompanying lines, fell into hostile hands. Thereupon the letter, a copy of which I now forward, was transmitted to the writer of those lines. It purports to come from the father of our young friend. It looks more like the fabrication of a priest. Its intention is, to cut off communication between him who had so lately escaped from the toils of the Papacy, and those who cared for his best interests. It has not had its desired effect, however.—It has only supplied another illustration of our glorious dreamer's picture. "Grinning" is here, and "biting of nails;" but the joints of the giant are "crazy and stiff," and "he cannot come at" our pilgrim. He is now housed in one of your city churches, where the Lord keeps him! Yes! if indeed he be his, he will do so.—For I have an entire confidence with the writer of the Halifax letter, that "a child of the eternal church—will never be forsaken," though my notions of the whereabouts of that church are vastly different from his. But to the letter. It is an extraordinary production. Let it be read and pondered with due reverence.

Yours very truly,
J. DAVIS.

HALIFAX, Feb. 22, 1854.

SIR:—I am in receipt of a letter of yours, addressed to my son, which I confess has filled me with surprise and indignation. I had little thought, when [illegible] would take advantage of his youth and inexperience, to tamper with his faith [illegible] suppose you triumph in the thought of having "converted a papist." But let me assure you that your pious labors have been chaff before the wind. Permit me also to inform you, that the admirable newspapers you sent him (in which it is hard to say whether knavery or lunacy predominates,) have been regularly committed to the flames, as unworthy the perusal of any enlightened Christian, or indeed of any pure-minded person in the possession of his senses. Let me advise you, Sir, not to distress yourself about the reception found from his "Catholic friends," as they could not feel for a moment any prejudice against him for listening to such an eloquent expounder of the "Bible" as yourself. You must have a strange idea of Catholics, and a still stranger one of truth, if you fancy that a child of the Eternal Church would really exchange a substance for a shadow, and conform blindly to your fantastic creed. Oh be! God suffers [not] his work to be done by the devil; and however, I as a parent may regret that —— should for a moment, have fallen into the snare laid for him, still I exult in the thought that a true Catholic, whose pure and simple faith is in the Most High, will never be forsaken, nor his seed and generation forever. I feel that I am wasting words. For, with your real or affected honor of "papists," you can scarcely believe that truth and purity of purpose exist amongst us. However, where the devil has cast his spells, obstinacy and ignorance are proverbial. To relieve your anxiety about the "Bible," I may tell you it accompanied the newspapers; as we Catholics cannot receive the lying versions of Luther, and his worthy successors.

I suppose you think with the rest of your enlightened brethren, that "poor benighted papists" have no Bibles. You think no doubt, like your friend of the "Advent Herald;" and no doubt your knowledge of Church history is just as accurate as his. However, Sir, before I conclude, let me give you a friendly advice. It is, not to aim at converting papists; for they will listen to you in patience, and laugh at you for your pains. I also beg not to be troubled by any future communication from you, as it can lead to no pleasant results. Indulge in your error, into it; for you will only drive yourself deeper into it. My son has now the benefit of his legitimate advisers; and I assure you bestows not a thought on the zealous Apostles it was his diversion to have met in Yarmouth.

Once more requesting that the correspondence which I reluctantly commence shall end here,

I remain your obedient servant,
Yarmouth. M——.

☞ The Boston Atlas gives the following view of the military resources of the two governments of Turkey and Russia extracted from sources of information which it deems reliable.

Turkey, whose forces have been thoroughly re-organized, and stand now upon a nearly equal footing with the best equipped armies of Europe, has at her disposal more than 280,000 infantry; of whom 100,000 are regulars, and at least 20,000 regular cavalry, to which must be added the various squadrons of irregular horse, amounting at the lowest estimate to 30,000 more. Previously to the seizure of the Principalities, she possessed 400 pieces of artillery, and since the outbreak of hostilities care has been taken to increase this number. With these 300,000 Turks will presently be associated 100,000 men, the flower of the French and English armies, and this united force will be further supported by the allied fleet of 3000 guns in the Euxine, to say nothing of the troops under the command of Schamyl, in the Caucasus, which for twenty years have destroyed a Russian army regularly every twelvemonth.

Let us now enquire what Russia can oppose to this mighty combination. This author reduces the 910,000, represented in the official reports as the numerical force of the army, and which is magnified into the incredible number of 2,000,000 by the Berlin "Kreuz-zeitung," to 577,537, of which but 400,000 are available. Of these 577,000 men Russia requires on the Danube, the shores of the Black Sea, and in the Caucasus at least 400,000, in order to oppose the 400,000 Turkish, English, French, and Circassian troops, and will, moreover, experience the greatest difficulty in concentrating more than 100,000 upon any given point. An entrenched camp at Fokschany will be necessary to cover their retreat from the Principalities; a numerous corps of observation must remain before Kalafat; Odessa and Cherson must be strongly garrisoned; the Crimea will need a strong force, at least 25,000 to 30,000 men, to protect it [illegible]

Danubian provinces. If we now concede to the Czar an additional force of 200,000 men, it is difficult to understand how he will be able to provide for the defence of the western boundary of his empire. At least 50,000 men will be required for the occupation of Poland, lest the enthusiasm prevailing there in favor of the "orthodox destroyer" of its liberties should assume an inconvenient form of manifestation; and in Courland, Livonia and Esthonia, 50,000 men will not suffice to defend those territories from being overrun by any disembarking force. The garrisons established in Cronstadt and St. Petersburg demand large reinforcements of tried troops; and, lastly, Finland and Lapland must not be left unguarded, partly on account of the English fleet under Sir Charles Napier, and partly on account of the Swedes and Norwegians, who might possibly be disposed to take advantage of so favorable an opportunity to recover possession of the territory, of which they have been so basely robbed.

In point of strength and physical force, Russia is no match for her opponents.— The active co-operation of Prussia and Austria alone can make the contest equal; and to this the Western Powers have it in their power to evoke a counter-demonstration, which would resemble an earthquake. For England, as the champion of the independence and liberties of Turkey, cannot now retreat; her name, her history, her honor, nay, her existence, are at stake.

The World's Crisis.

LOWELL, MAY 3, 1854.

Exposition of Rev. 10.

V. 11. "And he said unto me, Thou must prophesy again before many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings."— The word rendered "again" means again once more, or another time. The word rendered "before" means literally "upon." Whiting translates it "concerning." This appears evidently to be its true meaning. It is to prophesy in relation to the various kingdoms of the world. We are therefore in the second prophesying to look for some developement of prophecy in relation to the nations of the earth.

In '43, and '44, no such special development was realized. We could not then say that a time of trouble was actually impending among the governments, such as never was since there was a nation;— hence, but little was heard on the subject at that time. There seemed to be a sort of vacuum in the evidence of the immediate coming of Christ on that ... nations were not mustering their forces, and marshalling their armies for one mighty, universal conflict, as at present. But now at the time of the second proclamation, when the virgins go out to meet the Bridegroom, the nations move, the tocsin of universal war is sounded, and the belligerent powers of earth are forming into line of battle. Such are the developements among the angry nations, that a spirit of interpreting the word in relation to its prophetic bearing on the final conflict, is abroad in the Church, and they prophesy, or discourse concerning "many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings." Ch. 11: 1. "And there was given me a reed like unto a rod: and the angel stood, saying, Rise, and measure the temple of God, and the altar, and them that worship therein."

One of the principal causes of failure on the part of Bro. Miller's reckoning, was the evident mistake he made in relation to the taking away of the daily sacrifice. I have been informed the error into which he was led was brought about in this way. Being a critical Bible student, his method of arriving at the true meaning of scripture was, to let the Bible interpret itself. He, therefore, in all passages difficult of interpretation, consulted his Concordance in reference to the principal terms contained in those passages, and thus endeavored to obtain light by comparing scripture with scripture. If he could not find the desired elucidation, his next rule was, to take those terms that stood in immediate connection with the principal terms, and consult his Concordance in relation to them. In respect to the subject of "the daily sacrifice," he could obtain no light; but on looking out the expression "taken away," his eye lighted on the following passage. "For the mystery of iniquity doth already work; only he who now letteth, (hindereth) will let (hinder) until he be taken out of the way, and then shall that wicked be revealed," &c. Here the idea is conveyed, that some power, or influence stood in the way of the developement of that wicked, destructive, persecuting power that was to wear out the saints. Bro. Miller at once concluded, that it was paganism at Rome which prevented the rise of the little horn of papacy; and believed that, when the pagan rites ceased at Rome, the daily sacrifice would be taken away. He, therefore, undertook to determine when Paganism ceased to be the religion of the Roman Empire, and the result of his investigations was, that the last of the ten kingdoms was converted to Christianity in A. D. 508, and that this prepared the way for the papacy, which accordingly was set up by the decree of Justinian passed in 533, and as he believed carried into effect in 538. Thus making his calculations on a wrong basis, the result was a failure.

But let us inquire, for a moment, what is meant by the daily sacrifice. It is evident the translators of the septuagint version regarded it as the daily offerings at the temple. This has been the view entertained on this subject by expositors generally till the time of Bro. Miller. Let us turn to Daniel 8. Speaking of the work of desolation, the prophet says v. 10. "And it cast down some of the host, and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them." The host represents the children of God, and the stars the Preachers of the Gospel, as in Rev. 1: 20, where it is said, "the seven stars are the Angels of the seven Churches." Thus far then the acts of the little horn power are acts of desolation, by which persecution is carried on against the saints, and the Preachers of the Gospel. "Yea, he magnified himself (v. 11) even to the prince of the host." He assumes the prerogative of Christ to govern the Church, or in other words, "the man of sin sitteth (ruleth) in the temple (Church) of God," and "by him," (THE ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION) "the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of the sanctuary cast down." If this sanctuary be interpreted of the Jewish economy, it involves the worship of the true God, if of the Christian economy it still has allusion to genuine worship; so that in either case it destroys the worship of God. And in as much as the casting down of the sanctuary is connected with the taking away of the daily, it is clear that there is no allusion here to the conversion of the heathen—to the spread of the Gospel—or any Christian enterprise what ever. It is altogether a work of desolation—an abolition of the rights of worship—and a persecution of the saints of God.

Again v. 12. "And an host was given him against the daily sacrifice by reason of transgression, and it cast down THE TRUTH." Who cannot discern, from this expression, that in contending against the daily sacrifice or worship of God, having a host on his side, or arms standing on his part, it cast down TRUTH, and not the doctrine of Devils, or worship of the heathen?

The Great Anti-Christian Power,

AS REPRESENTED BY

DANIEL, CHRIST, PAUL AND JOHN:

BY J. COUCH.

We now inquire, what may be understood by the term abomination as used in the scriptures. In a scriptural sense, the term generally refers to idolatry. Webster says, abomination may mean idols, or idolatry. We find it used in the scriptures referring to idolatrous worshippers, to the idols worshipped, and to the character of the worship. "For all that do these things are an abomination unto the Lord." (Deut. 18: 12.) This passage refers to the worshippers as an abomination. "And he said unto me, Go in, and behold the wicked abominations that they do here. So I went in and saw; and behold every form of creeping things, and abominable beasts, and all the idols of the house of Israel, portrayed upon the wall round about." (Ezek. 8: 9, 10.) The prophet here evidently refers to the idols used in their worship. "Then said he unto me, Hast thou seen this, O son of man? turn thee yet again, and thou shalt see greater abominations than these. And he brought me into the inner court of the LORD's house, and, behold, at the door of the temple of the LORD, between the porch and the altar, were about five and twenty men, with their backs towards the temple of the LORD, and their faces toward the east; and they worshipped the sun towards the east. Then he said unto me, Hast thou seen this, O son of man? Is it a light thing to the house of Judah that they commit the abominations which they commit here? for they have filled the land with violence, and have returned to provoke me to anger: and, lo, they put the branch to their nose." (Ezek. 8: 15—17.) In this passage, the prophet presents the worship itself as an abomination. From these quotations it appears, that the term, "abomination," is used to designate idolatry, either in reference to the character of the worship, or the worshippers. By applying these principles to the expression of the Saviour, "When ye therefore see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place," and in the terms used by Daniel, to which the Saviour alluded, we learn that they referred to an association of idolatrous worshippers whose distinguishing characteristic is, its work of desolation.

We now inquire, how an understanding of the abomination of desolation can assist the Church in understanding the time when this dispensation will end, and Christ make His second appearing, for which purpose the subject was presented by our Savior to the minds of His disciples. This idea is very clearly seen in Daniel, when he presents the fact that the chronological periods, which shew when the resurrection will take place, are dependent on a certain developement in the history of this power for their commencement. Consequently a knowledge of the time of the resurrection, which is to occur simultaneously with the Second Advent, is dependent on a knowledge of certain changes in the history of the abomination of desolation.

Some admit the position we have taken upon this point to be scriptural, but affirm that there have been so many similar changes in this organization, that it is impossible to determine at which particular era the periods commenced. But the possibility of understanding the history of this power so perfectly as to make a correct application of the prophetic periods, is clearly taught in the scriptures of truth.— It is not dependent on the intellectual ability of man; neither is it affected by the numerous mistakes that men have made in relation to the history of this power; for it is based solely on the DECLARATION OF GOD.

The Lord has assured us in His word, that the revelation of divine truth which He has made, is expressly for the benefit of man; and that he is benefited by it only so far as he understands the truths revealed. Therefore Jesus says: "he that received seed into the good ground, is he that heareth the word and understandeth it, which also beareth fruit." By which we learn that in order to bring forth fruit, we must understand the word. Paul shews clearly the purpose of God in revealing to us the truths of His word, when he says; "Whatsoever things, were written aforetime were written FOR OUR LEARNING," (Rom. 15: 4.) Again; the Apostle says, "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine," &c., (2 Tim. 3: 16.) The passages here quoted perfectly establish these principles; 1. That the scriptures were given by inspiration of God, therefore must be profitable to the believer; for all communications, proceeding from a source of infinite benevolence, must be designed for the benefit of man. 2. That the scriptures, in order to be profitable to us, must be understood. 3. That the purpose of God in giving a revelation to mankind was, that it should be understood. We may therefore conclude that if any portion of the word is never to be correctly apprehended, God is defeated in His purpose of benefiting man by that portion of the word.

We find in the prophecy of Daniel, that certain chronological periods are given which point to the resurrection of the dead. For what purpose were these periods given? Was it to establish the fact, that there would be a resurrection of the dead?— Was it to prove the certainty of a coming judgment, and revelation of the Savior at the second Advent? No, those great truths are proved by moral evidence: they rest on the simple declaration of the word, and not on mathematical problems. For what purpose then were they given? Simply to teach the time when those events would transpire. Therefore the only benefit which the Church can receive from them is, that of learning the time when the events connected with the periods should occur.

As this subject is a portion of divine truth, it must come under the general principles which God has laid down to be applied to His word.

The Lord, foreseeing that men would cavil at His word, and deny the possibility of understanding the record in relation to this subject, and thus attempt to defeat the object for which the prophecy was given, in order to make the idea clear and plain beyond controversy, has not only given the general principle applicable to all prophecies, shewing that they may be understood, but has exhorted us expressly to understand this particular subject as presented by Daniel, and Daniel in connection with the same subject says expressly, "THE WISE SHALL UNDERSTAND."

But some may say that chronographers do not agree in their testimony in relation to dates, and that there is an uncertainty in relation to the records of history, so that the events presented in the prophecy cannot be definitely understood. Shall we therefore take the ground, that the statement of the angel was false, and that the opposite position is true? Which shall we believe, God, or man? An understanding of the prophecies implies an understanding of the events revealed in the prophecies. In understanding the prophecy relating to the abomination, we shall of course understand what constitutes the abomination, and the different changes in its history spoken of in the prophecy.

When a portion of revealed truth is understood, the events given will be understood as perfectly and definitely as it is revealed; and those events will be understood as early in their history as a knowledge of them will be beneficial to the Church. All prophetic truth is designed to become practical to the Church, when a knowledge of the events revealed is obtained; therefore the time for all prophetic events to be known, may be determined by the relative position which the Church occupies in relation to those events.

It was not necessary e. g. for Noah to understand the events of the flood, until the time came for him to make special preparation for that catastrophe. Neither was it necessary, that the children of Israel should understand the manner of their deliverance from Egypt, until the time came for them to make a preparation for their departure; because a knowledge of that event could be of no benefit until the time came for the nation to be moved to action in regard to it. But if the action of the Church in respect to an event, come not before the occurrence of that event, then a definite knowledge of it may not be obtained until the event shall transpire. When however the time of an event is revealed, it must always be understood BEFORE the event transpires, because the Church could not be benefited by a knowledge of the time, after the event had taken place. Therefore Solomon says: "The wise man's heart discerneth both time and judgment: because to every purpose there is time and judgment." In this passage a man is represented as wise on account of being in readiness for the events of judgment; and this readiness evidently depends on an understanding of the time and event to occur. This subject has been practically demonstrated at different periods in the history of the Church, as in the case of Noah, of Lot, the first advent of Christ, &c.

As we have endeavored to establish several important principles relating to divine truth, and have seen that they apply to the point in question, we will now proceed to examine the subject, applying those principles agreeably to divine instruction. As we have shewn that the abomination is an idolatrous people, and that it is a desolating agent, it must be an association of idolatrous worshippers. The first important development in this power is, its being "set up."—(Dan. 12: 11.) The expression "set up" shews that an individual, or people previously subordinate, is exalted to supremacy as in Hosea, 8: 4—"They have set up kings, but not by me;" and in 2 Sam. 7: 12, "I will set up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish his kingdom." If therefore the abomination of desolation referred to an organizatian of idolatrous worshippers, there must be a time in their history, when they were exalted to supremacy in the sense of the prophecy, at which time the prophetic periods will commence.

In Dan. 11: 31, we find the same power referred to, "And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate." The term "place", indicates a particular position in which it is exalted. By a reference to the passage in Matthew, which we took as a starting point, we find the Saviour shews that the abomination was to "STAND" (be exalted) "in the HOLY PLACE." In the days of Paul, the Thessalonian brethren had received the impression that the coming of Christ was immediately to be expected, but the Apostle knowing this power must first be developed, and recognized by the Church, shews them the second Advent of our Lord could not take place until this persecuting agent, whom he denominates "the man of sin," had been revealed. And he proceeds to shew there must first be a falling away, before the exaltation of the man of sin. By reference to Dan. 11: 30, we find, that a certain class of people would "forsake the holy covenant;" or Gospel of Christ; therefore they must be comprised of a backslidden, or apostate Church, which harmonizes with the representation of Paul. Daniel informs us that the government of which he was speaking, (the government of Rome,) would have intelligence with this apostate Church. The word intelligence, according to Webster, is derived originally from intelligo, to understand; and he adds, "the primary meaning of understand is generally to take, or hold, as we say TO TAKE ONE'S IDEAS, or meaning." Whenever the scripture refers to a government, it of course refers to government acts; therefore when the government has an understanding with the apostate Church, or in other words, receives its ideas or faith from the Church, it establishes the same by government acts. Daniel teaches us that the government occupying this position would establish the abomination in the sense of the prophecy. Paul shews us this power would be exalted (or set up, as expressed by Daniel,) and that he would be exalted in the place of, or acting for God.

What is it to be exalted in the place of God, or to act for God, in the sense of the prophecy? It appears from the expression of Paul, that he would act for, or as God, in the temple of God, therefore he will assume to exercise the prerogatives of God in the temple.

We now inquire what is meant by the temple of God. It could not have been the temple at Jerusalem, because God had forsaken it as the seat of the divine administration, after which his government was exercised in another place, which the Apostle calls the temple of God. In 1 Cor. 3: 16–17, we read, "Know ye not that ye are temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are." Eph. 2: 21–22—"In whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord: In whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit." Thus it appears that the Apostle called the Church the temple of God, so that under the Christian dispensation the temple of God is the Church.— Eph. 1: 20–22—"Which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come; and hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the Church." This passage clearly teaches that the Church should submit to the government of Christ, without regard to the governments of this world, when the demands of earthly powers conflict with those of her sovereign Head. Again: "Eph. 5: 22–24. Wives submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord. For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the Church; and he is the saviour of the body. Therefore as the Church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in every thing." This passage shows, that as in the family relation the wife is to submit to the government of her husband, so the Church is to submit to Christ as her Lord and lawgiver in all things. Therefore when the man of sin takes his seat in the temple of God, he will assume the prerogative of God to govern the Church by legislative enactments, in the place of Christ, the legitimate ruler of the Church.

As the abomination is a desolating agent, we inquire, in the next place, what it will desolate. By a reference to Daniel 11, we find that when the abomination is established, "the people that do know their God shall be strong, and do exploits; and such as understand among the people shall fall by sword, and by flame, by captivity and by spoil, many days" This passage shows in the first place, that the abomination would desolate the people of God; in the next place, it shows the manner in which the desolation would be accomplished.— 1. By the sword; i. e., various implements of shedding blood. 2. Flame, which implies that many would be burned at the stake. 3. By captivity, which implies that they would be incarcerated in prisons or dungeons, by which their lives would be destroyed; and 4. By spoil, i. e., by the confiscation of their goods. The Prophet, after having given the character of the persecution, shows that it was to continue for an appointed time. If this abomination spoken of by Daniel, is the same as that to which Christ refers in Matthew, and its location, as given by Daniel, the same as that given by the Saviour, we may expect to find the Church in tribulation, as described by Daniel, when this power is revealed; and to continue in that tribulation an appointed number of days.

By reference to the language of the Saviour in Matthew, we find Him speaking of a great tribulation, in connection with the abomination; and the people suffering this tribulation, He denominates "The elect," as appears from the expression, "For the elect's sake, those days shall be shortened." But did the Lord show us that this tribulation would continue for a definite length of time? I understand He did, for He tells us "those days shall be shortened."

What may we understand by the expression, "those days shall be shortened"? We can only understand that they were made shorter than before; therefore they must have had a definite length, both before and after they were shortened; for how can we say that a period is made, e. g., ten days shorter than before, unless it had a definite length? Suppose, for instance, a culprit were condemned to imprisonment for an indefinite length of time; the jailor receives orders from government to shorten his imprisonment thirty days; when would the prisoner be released? We perceive from this illustration, that an indefinite period of time cannot be shortened; and the same principle will apply in every case.— Therefore the tribulation must have had an appointed length, which was susceptible of being shortened.

But some may object to the idea that the Saviour referred to the days spoken of in Daniel, inasmuch as they were given by divine appointment, and therefore could not be altered. But as we find God has acted upon this principle in other instances, we would not deny the possibility that the same principle may be carried out in this case.

In the case of Nineveh's destruction, the time appointed for that event was afterward altered; so also in the case of Hezekiah's death. In these instances, we find God has exercised the prerogative to change an appointed time; and we see no reason why the same principle may not apply in this case. Therefore the length of the persecution must have been previously appointed. This corresponds with the tribulation given in Daniel, both having an appointed number of days for their continuance.

We now inquire, was it the same people suffering this tribulation? Daniel says it was "the people that do know their God." Jesus shows that it was the elect. All will admit that the people referred to by Daniel were the true people of God. Jesus says, in connection with this subject, the Angels shall be sent forth to "gather together His elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." In this passage, the people of God are evidently referred to. Paul says in reference to the Jewish nation, "Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for, but the election hath obtained it." Peter, in writing to his brethren, says, "Elect according to the foreknowledge of God, through sanctification of the spirit." These passages clearly prove that Christ and the Apostles denominated Christians the elect. As Christians are the only people "that do know their God," this must be the same class referred to by Daniel as suffering tribulation.

We now inquire, if this persecuting power can be found in any other connection in the book of Daniel. By reference to the 7th of Daniel, we find a persecuting power symbolized by one of the horns of a beast, and this power making war on the saints. If this is the same power denominated "the abomination that maketh desolate," in the 11th and 12th of Daniel, we shall be able to identify it as possessing the same characteristics, and performing the same work. In the 11th of Daniel, we find the abomination associated with the civil government of Rome. In the 7th chap. the horn, symbolizing this persecuting power appears on the head of the beast representing the Roman Empire; therefore, in this particular, they correspond.

The people persecuted in the 11th ch. of Daniel, are the people of God—the people persecuted by this horn of the 7th ch., are "the saints." In this particular, also, there is a perfect correspondence. From the 11th of Daniel, we learn that the time the tribulation connected with the abomination was to continue, was previously appointed. From the 7th, we learn that the time during which the saints were to be worn out, was also appointed; and this is the only appointment in the Scripture, which could have been referred to.

From these facts, it appears evident that the eleventh horn of the fourth Beast, (ch. 7) is the same great persecuting power as "the abomination that maketh desolate," spoken of in chapters 11th and 12th, and referred to by the Saviour.

Extracts from the London Evening Mail of April 14:

The great object of European statesmen at the present moment is to avoid, at well nigh any cost, the outbreak of a war of opinion or of principles. As long as the conflict can be confined within the narrow area of a mere territorial aggression, we know more or less what its general character and results must be. That which we have most carefully to ward off is an open antagonism between rulers and subjects in those portions of continental Europe which are still under despotic sway. This is the opinion, we believe, of moderate and sober-minded men in every portion of the civilized world. It is not that they wish well to the cause of despotism, but that they dread to give Europe up to fire and sword on the mere chance of a result not quite intolerable. Therefore it is that the proceedings of the Prussian and Austrian Courts are at this moment scanned with the deepest anxiety, for the present is a season in which Emperors and Kings must act with moderation and good faith, or accept the hazards of a very hypothetical future. The turn of the table is all against them if they provoke the contest, and therefore it is our earnest hope—we may add, our firm expectation—that the German potentates will see their true interests, and adhere to the cause of justice and order. Beyond the Alps, we grieve to say, the prospect is not so reassuring. Italy is one of the tenderest points of the European State-system, and, if things are to be maintained in their present groove, the Kings and statesmen of that Peninsula must take careful cognizance of the signs of the times. Is it not enough that half a million of men will soon be in arms upon the banks of the Danube—that the provinces of Asia which surround the Black Sea are given up to the guerilla warfare of a half-trained soldiery—that the Czar of Russia has called up his barbarous levies from the steppes and mountains of his vast territory—that Austria is already gathering the forces of the empire on her south-eastern frontier—that the disciplined bands of Prussia are awaiting the summons to arms—that France is ready to continue the traditions of her great Emperor with or without a moment's notice—and that, in conjunction with Great Britain, she has already despatched her fleets to the Euxine and the Baltic, and that some of the choicest levies of these two great nations have already been forwarded to the seat of war? Is there not enough of menace in all this, and must an Italian potentate choose such a moment for adding to the general confusion? Surprising and startling as such an announcement must be, it is our painful duty to record the fact that an Italian potentate has chosen the present time for attempting a coup d'etat and adding to the general confusion of the world. True it is that Monaco does not count among the great European Powers, and that at the general congresses of nations her voice has not been raised with great effect; but men who are accustomed to watch the vicissitudes of human affairs and the rise and fall of empires must be prepared to admit that, under favorable circumstances, Monaco might become a great and influential Power.

"It is rumored at Orsova," says the Ost. Deutsche Post, "that the Russians have begun to construct a bridge across the Danube opposite the Servian quarantine at Radujevatz." The sentence is a short one, but, if the information it contains be correct, it is one of the most important it has ever fallen to my lot to write. If the Russians cross the Danube at Radujevatz, and the Austrians do not immediately effect a passage of the Save and occupy Servia, it will be that their courage has failed them. The object of the vast concentration of troops on the south-eastern frontier is a double one; it is to prevent the Russians from taking possession of Servia, and to keep the inhabitants of the Turkish provinces lying on the Austrian frontiers from sharing in the revolutionary movement which Russian agents are intent on provoking.

The War.

The preparation having been made for the scene of slaughter, it appears by the last arrival, that the orders are given for the onset both in the Baltic and in the Black Sea, we may expect now the war will commence in serious earnest, and by the next arrival we may expect to hear tidings that will remind one of the expression of Scripture 2 Kings, 21: 12, "Behold I am bringing such evil upon Jerusalem and Judah, that whosoever heareth of it, both his ears shall tingle."

Seven Days Later from Europe.

The Arabia, from Liverpool, arrived at Halifax, Tuesday, with dates to the 13th April.

On the 9th, the protocol re-defining the integrity of the Ottoman territory was signed at Vienna by the four powers, including Prussia; but simultaneously therewith Prussia introduced into her mutual alliance treaty with Austria conditional limitations which would render the treaty a dead letter, and which Austria refused to accept. The military arrangements arising out of the proposed treaty have been referred to a Commission, presided over by the Prince of Prussia.

It has been announced, via Southampton, that Chevalier Bunson, the Prussian Minister at London, was recalled, for which no reason was assigned, but the whole story is since contradicted.

Hanover sides with the Western Powers.—All the minor states, except Bavaria, do the same, and will support Austria in forcing Prussia to declare herself, should the subject come before the Federal Diet.

The Independence Belge announces positively that a treaty of permanent alliance, "offensive and defensive" has just been signed between France and England, independently of the treaties of the present war.

The Turkish Government have offered all Greeks who will not consent to place themselves under the exclusive protection of the "Porte," permission to leave the Turkish territory within 15 days from March 30th. This expulsion, it is said, was determined on by the advice of the representatives of the Powers.

Sir Charles Napier left Kioge Bay, in the Baltic, for Gothland, in consequence of a report that some of the Russian ports were open, and that a Russian squadron was off Farod.

Admiral Bruat will replace Admiral Hamelin, in the Black Sea, for the purpose of giving Admiral Dundas the chief command of the combined fleets, while Gen. St. Arnaud, the French General, was to have the command of the combined land force.

The allied fleets, in the Black Sea, were at Kavadana Bay, March 26th, 8 French line-of-battle ships anchored east of Varna, and further east were ten English line-of-battle ships and six steamers. All the marines of the fleet were to land and protect Varna. Admiral Dundas had signalized his cruisers, "Take, burn and destroy everything." His fleet were in communication with the Turkish land force.

Prince Paskivitch arrived at Bucharest on the 5th of April. Gortschakoff retains the command of the army, but subject to Paskivitch's orders. The latter is invested with the same powers he had in Poland.

On the 20th of March an important attack was made on Kalafat and a sanguinary encounter took place for some four hours. The Russians were routed and pursued for a considerable distance. From March 20th to April 2d there were some engagements of greater or less severity.

It was reported that an important battle was fought near Rassova, which continued from April 2d to 4th. Result unknown; but doubtless some fighting did occur; the details, however, are unknown.

The Turks purposely left a free passage for the Russians to Hirsova, but then attacked them in the rear, and, after a hard fight, one-half of the Russians were cut to pieces—the remainder being obliged to re-cross the Danube. No date is given.

The Turks had evacuated the fortress of Chernovodi, in the Dobrutscha, which was shelled by the Russians. It was further stated, without date, that 30,000 Russians had crossed at Galatz without opposition: All these accounts are however very confused; as are also other rumors of the sinking of two or three British armed vessels by the Russians.

Gen. Canrobert, with 3000 French troops, arrived at Constantinople on the 3d of April.—The declaration of war by France and England was known in Turkey and caused immense enthusiasm. There is a report of the death of the French Col. Dieu, on a reconnoisance. He was a meritorious staff officer of Omar Pasha. St. Petersburgh was illuminated and a 'te deum' sung for the passage of the Danube.

The Greek insurrection had made no progress. An Austrian note of remonstrance had been forwarded to Athens, holding the Greek Government liable for all mischief that may arise through the insurrection.

In England everything was very dull, in consequence of the Easter Holiday. Parliament not in session. Wednesday, 26th, was appointed a National fast day. The farmers were complaining of the dry weather. The Duke of Cambridge, Lord Raglan, and the English staff arrived at Paris on the 11th, and were cordially received by the Parisians. The Emperor gave them a grand review of 25,000 men. The Duke carried a friendly autograph letter from Her Majesty Queen Victoria to the Emperor. The English staff embarked from Marseilles for the East.

On the 10th a farewell dinner was given at the "Trois Freres Proveneaux." Over 100 Americans were present. Consul McRae presided, and Messrs. Corbia, Munroe, Dorr and others acted as Vice Presidents. Mr Mason and other members of the diplomatic corps were invited guests.

Reports from Madrid state that Mr Soule has received instructions to demand reparation for the Black Warrior affair. On the 5th and 6th the Spanish Government made the needful apology, and a pecuniary recompense beside, also censuring the Captain General for his conduct.

The ministerial crisis in Denmark continued. It is telegraphed from Italy that Prince Demonaco and his aid-de camp have been imprisoned in the Fort of Villa Franchа at Nice.—Several arrests have been made at Menton, arising from the recent revolt. The trial of the assassins of Count Rossi is terminated. Col. Grandoni and three others are condemned to death.

From Bombay it is said that Dost Mahomed has offered an Affghan alliance against Russia and Persia. News from Burmah is unfavorable. An insurrection had broken out at Bassin. Japan is said to have been opened to foreign trade by the Russians. The American fleet had not yet reached Nagasaki. Gold has been discovered in Ceylon. There is nothing of material importance from China. The markets in England are favorably reported of.

Latest.

Later from Europe. By the Pacific, at New York, yesterday, we have seven days later intelligence from Europe,—dates to the 19th ult. It will be seen by the following telegraphic despatch, that the allied fleets are about to attack Sebastopol—that the Russian forces have entered the heretofore neutral territory of Servia—that Sir Charles Napier is making preparations for a grand attack on the Russian ports in the Baltic—that all Russia is in a state of blockade—and that no great battle has yet occurred on the Danube.

A large Russian force was said to have entered Servia. All the Russian ports were reported to be blockaded. Admiral Napier's whole fleet had gone Eastward to attack the Russian fleet. Navigation was open in the Black Sea, and the allied fleets had sailed direct with the intention of attacking Sebastopol.

By advices of the 6th of April, it is understood that sanguinary skirmishes occurred daily on the Danube. Omer Pasha was said to be waiting the arrival of the allied armies before he would make a general attack.

The reports of the Austrians having entered Servia are not confirmed. England and France have entered into a treaty "offensive and defensive." The recall of the Prussian Minister from London was on personal, not political grounds.

Appleton, April 4, 1854.

I rejoice and praise God that I have been made acquainted with those to whom it is the Fathers good pleasure to give the kingdom—the believers in the speedy coming of the Lord. The fire of devotion and love to God was kindled to a flame in my soul. I rejoice that error and superstition is vanishing away before the light of eternal truth. Glory to God, the day of the Lord will come, when this polluted earth will be purified, and brought back to its original beauty as it came from the hand of its Maker. Then Christ will be glorified in all his saints. The children of light will then stand on the fair plains of Paradise, in the kihdom prepared for all that believe in, and love His appearing. I expect then to join the happy throng who have been washed and purified by the blood of the Lamb, there to raise our hearts and voices in tuneful melody, to chant the songs of angels. Glory to God in the highest. O I praise God this world is not my home. O what is all this world to me? Soon the hopes of earth will disappear before the light of eternal certainty. We shall then be delivered from the cares and troubles of this earthly life. Glory to God, while I write I do believe and feel it in my soul that soon we shall be made equal to the Angels in heaven. Jesus will give us life and immortality, and then we shall die no more. But where, O where will the ungodly and the unbelievers appear? They cannot, they will not have a resurrection to life and immortality. It cannot be said they die no more; but they must suffer the second death, must be destroyed with an everlasting destruction.

That we may be in readiness when the Lord comes to be admired by all them that believe, O may the truth so shine into our hearts that we may love the doctrines of Christ, and rejoice in the prospect of God's coming kingdom, when His will will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Then and not till then, will the prayers of all the saints be answered, the last enemy destroyed, and the kingdom given to the saints to possess it forever and ever. May the Lord assist us, and sanctify the Church, that it may be presented to the Father holy and without spot. O how happy I have been since I have been interested in these great and important truths. I feel that I am ready and willing to give up all and follow Christ. O that all might be enlightened in the great truths of the gospel. Blessed be God, the light is shining; may the true light shine in all our hearts, that we may grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

The Eastern War. The following is an extract of a letter from an American citizen now in Europe, received by a gentleman in this city by the last steamer.—[National Intelligencer.

Paris, March 28, 1854. I have seen a letter from Constantinople giving a most deplorable account of Turkey, her finances, &c. "She is dying," as the Emperor Nicholas truly said, and cannot survive much longer. The very treaty made with France and England granting many privileges to the Greeks, if no other cause existed, would be enough to cause her dissolution. The long encampment of the Moslems in Europe is to be broken up, and if Russia does not now succeed five years will gradually accomplish it. If peace took place, the disbanding of two or three hundred thousrnd troops (mere Arabs) would cause universal wretchedness. They will be scattered and have to return without pay, nearly naked; will plunder the Christians and cause general insurrections. The latter number eleven millions of people of different religion to their Moslem masters, who are only three millions. Be assured that Nicholas has not made this leap without looking before him, and secrets of State will soon be divulged which will astonish Europe.

You cannot over-estimate the deplorable condition of Turkey. The vile hound slavery and degredation of the once great Greek empire is worse than anything ever heard of in history. Italy, during the invasion of Alaric, "the Scourge of God;" Rome, whilst in the possession of the terrible Genseric, by murder, plunder and desolations of every kind, never suffered worse than the miserable Greeks, under the iron rule of their Moslem masters, for the last four hundred years. Recollect the capture and massacre of Scio, so late as 1822, and the treatment of men, women, and children on that occasion, and hear the Greek ladies, as I recently have, tell of what they as children then witnessed. The tocsin of vengeance, however, about being sounded, the soil of Turkey will be manured by the blood both of the Greek and the Moslem; but the latter must decamp.

It will be war of religion, and the Turks will flock to the standard of the Prophet. Agriculture is totally neglected; even simple as they live, there will be no culture of the earth, and all will go to certain destruction. The Russians will beat them as easily as we did the Mexicans, with one fourth the number of disciplined troops contending with a comparatively unarmed rabble calling on Mahomet in the hour of battle. The English and French troops may garrison the Balkan mountains, Constantinople, and all strong places, so as to prevent them from falling into the hands of the Russians, though it would not surprise me if these dear friends should fall out even before the conflict is over, and still more probable after it is closed. I look upon the situation of England as critical. She has much to dread and but little to hope for from the present war, in the way of permanent success. She may do great injury to Russia, but it will soon be repaired under her wonderful emperor, but the recollection and result will in the end prove injurious to England.

The Armies in Turkey. War has already sounded her deadly clarion, and soon the soldiery of the three most formidable European nations are to meet on the absurdly called, "field of glory." This combination of two great European nationalities against the Russians offers rather fearful odds, not to count the numerous volunteers of other western races filling the Turkish camp.

It is now for the first time that the Russian is to exchange blows with the Englishman. Both of them have some common characteristics. Steady, stubborn, quiet and cool under the deadliest fire, neither runs forward at the start with the furious impetus which characterizes the French, Poles or Italians, but both English and Russians persevere to the last, whether in success, or whether the tables are turned against them, and almost never disband in utter rout and confusion. The English corps is formed of choice men of colossal frame and of great bodily strength—all qualities to tell fearfully in a close contest. The English soldiers are furnished with the best quality of fire-arms, and their artillery is efficient and well served.

The English army, so far at least as the common soldier is concerned, represents most completely the ancient spirit common to European armies. They do not inquire about the moral value of the cause for which they are to fight, and are therefore not roused by it to enthusiasm; but they loyally go into the fire for the honor of their Sovereign, their standard, the delusion of military honor, from the habit of discipline, and finally, in obedience to the will of the nation, communicated to them by the order of the day.

The Russian Soldiers, on the other hand, are brought into this war in a state of excitement, either genuine or artificial, but nevertheless existing. In their minds it is a national and religious question; and the unsuccessful beginning of the Danubian campaign, has, we may be sure, only irritated them most violently. The Russians, generally, people as well as soldiers, are incited even more by defeats suffered than by victories won. Disaster awakens their slumbering spirit more than triumph.

The Russian army has the worst of equipments, and especially of arms, compared with the two others, but the artillery is well provided for. The muskets are on the old principle, and some of them even have the old flint locks, though the recent inventions are now being introduced in the Guards and the corps of grenadiers who are to defend the Baltic shores. The Russian Generals are most of them too old, and some are not fit for the posts which they occupy. Luders and Liprandi, however, distinguished themselves in the Polish campaign, and there may be among the inferior grades some men of capacity who will break through and become eminent in the course of the war. Schilder, who belongs to the new men, some time ago gained a prominent position. But the Russian Army of the Danube will possess, at least in the beginning of the campaign, a numerous and well appointed cavalry, outnumbering by far that of the allies. It will also have the advantage of unity of command, so absolutely necessary for any success whatever in military undertakings, and the attainment of which will very likely be the cause of serious difficulty in the opposite camp. There the question is still to be decided whether Omer Pasha or the French Marshal is to be the Generalissimo. And then the directing influence of the combined diplomacy, with that of rivalries between nationalities and chiefs, is likely to weaken rather than to strengthen the energy which can alone give an impulse to decisive operations.

Behold the Bridegroom cometh!

Hark! what sound is this I'm hearing;
Peace and joy it brings to me;
On the breeze it comes so cheering,
That it causes grief to flee.
Soon he comes—the cry is speeding.
And it gives a certain sound;
Now the household it is feeding,
While the scoffer walks around.

While he says my Lord's delaying,
The good servant feeds his sheep
With the truth that God has spoken,
(And his word he sure will keep,)
Saying to the world around him,
Now "Behold the Bridegroom come,"
Soon in Glory you will meet him,
While the sinner meets his doom.

I will speed thee—news so cheering
That it makes me now rejoice—
I will go, and nothing fearing,
'Till I hear the Savior's voice,
Saying to me come up higher,
Enter in and be at rest.
Then I'll shout above the fire,
And sit down with all the blest.

George L. Teeple.

Bethel, Feb. 17, 1854.

More Destructive Engines of War. A writer in a New York paper speaks of a new kind of bomb which has been invented by a Scotch engineer, and which, if it answers the high expectations entertained of it, will prove a most efficient engine of destruction in the war with the Russians. In ordinary cases the bomb is put into the mortar. In the new invention the mortar is put into the bomb; that is to say, the mortar is capped with a cylindric bomb, in the same manner as one would cover his finger with a thimble. In this way the mortar can throw a bomb as heavy as itself for a considerable distance. These enormous projectiles, which are pointed at the outer end, always fall upon the point and explode by percussion, upon striking the object at which they are aimed. It is estimated that a single bomb of this description will be sufficient to blow up a magazine or destroy a man-of-war. In one instance, where one of them was fired by way of experiment, it tore a cavity in the earth where it alighted, fourteen feet in depth by twenty feet in diameter. Many of those implements are now being constructed for the English ships, although none were completed in time to be sent to the Black Sea with the fleets.

The same writer states that electricity will be converted into a powerful agent for carrying on the war. Large cylinders filled with explosive substances have been prepared, which will be buried in evacuated fortresses, or left on board of ships which in a time of danger, have been abandoned by the crew. The last party leaving the ship, or fortress, carry with them a metallic wire, covered with gutta percha, one end of which is attached to the cylinder of powder, and while the enemy are exulting in their triumph, a spark from an electric batterry is shot along the wire and a terrible explosion follows, blowing the lifeless bodies of the enemy high into the air.

☞ Letters from the seat of war represent the Russian force on the Danube as amounting to 200,000 men. The Turkish strength is about half this amount.

Special Notice.

Providence, April 29, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—We have a good work going on in the name of the Lord we trust. From two, our numbers have been augmented to fifty, or more; several were baptised by Brother Mathewson last Sabbath, and several more are to be baptised soon. Oh, bless the Lord, all ye his people for so good and so great a work as He has done and is still doing for us in this place.

Wishing to put all obstacles out of the way of our ministering Brethren visiting this place, to preach to us as the Lord may direct, we have appointed Dr. C. O. Town as Corresponding Secretary. For the Brethren,

J. M. Waters.

If the brethren abroad, who are not favored with much preaching, will inform me where they live, I will bring them the bread of life if the Lord will

My P. O. address is Bridgewater, Vt.

S. B. Munn.

The new edition of Advent Hymn Book are now ready for sale. Those in want of Hymn Books, will please send in their orders.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige and save us immense labor and perplexity if they will strictly adhere to the following rules:

1. Over all communications designed to be published write, For the World's Crisis.
2. Over all communications not designed for the public write, Private.

☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞

3. At the head of all letters write the date, never failing to give the STATE, and also County, if written from the Middle, Western or Southern States.

☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞

4. Write all orders for the paper or for books on a page by itself, beginning thus, Order for the Crisis, or, Order for books, as the case may be.
5. At the close of each letter containing money write the amount, and to whom it is to be credited.
6. Be careful to write names and P. O. addresses in a legible hand.
7. In returning papers write on the paper the name and P. O. address of the person to whom it had been sent.
8. In preparing matter for the Crisis we hope our correspondents will adopt, as the most important and indispensable of all rules, the practice of commending the subject to God, praying fervently for light to be reflected on the pathway of the Church, and for heavenly manna to feed and nurture the little flock unto eternal life, also that sinners may be induced to flee from impending wrath, and take refuge in the ark before the deluge takes them all away.
9. Let the letters and communications be carefully read over, corrected, and, if need be re-written, punctuated and prepared for the press, so far as the writer has ability so to do. If, however, the writer does not understand punctuation, &c., the Editor is just as willing, and if possible more so, to serve the humblest member of the flock in bringing his or her sentiments and feelings before the public, as those who have been favored with higher educational advantages, provided only they write under the influence of the Spirit of God.

In sending out nearly nine thousand papers, it would not be strange if some mistakes should be attributable to us, others, it may be, to the Post Offices, and others still to the neglect of subscribers to give their proper Post Office address. We hope in such cases brethren will exercise a little patience, and write us, if necessary, so that we may rectify all mistakes which it will ever afford us pleasure to do. tf

All letters of business in relation to the World's Crisis, or to books sold at the office of the Crisis, or letters containing payment for "the grand crisis in human affairs" and "the Advent Hymn-book," must in future be directed to Jonas Merriam, Editor of the World's Crisis.

Wm. B. Rose's P. O. address is Southwick, Mass.

Bro. Merriam, will you please say to Bro. Grant, through the Crisis, that we will expect to see an appointment for this place (Newark) from him as soon as possible.

John Brown, for the Brethren.

If the Lord will, there will be a Grove Meeting at Union Mills, LaPort Co., Indiana, to commence on the 25th of May at 10 o'clock, A. M., and continue over the Sabbath, and as much longer as may be thought best. Brethren F. H. Berick, J. Couch, and J. C. Bywater are expected to be present to preach the word. All who wish to hear on the time of our Lord's coming we hope will avail themselves of this opportunity. A general invitation is given to ministering and lay brethren scattered abroad throughout Southern Indiana, Michigan, Illinois. Come up, brethren, in the name of the Lord and hear for yourselves, then judge.

Brethren coming from east or west via Michigan Central Road, will take the New Albany and Salem Road and stop at Haskel's corner, 7 miles to the meeting. For the World's Crisis.

"The path of the just shineth more and more unto the perfect day."—[Prov. 4: 18.
"But evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse."—[2 Tim. 3: 13.

Earnest, more earnest, the Christian is praying,
O come, blessed Jesus, come quickly and save
Thy poor scattered exiles in banishment straying,
And loved ones that slumber within the deep grave.

Closer, still closer, God's children are clinging,
To the dear blessed Bible, the unerring guide;
Its depths they are sounding, its bright jewels gleaning,
And dare not, and will not, its righteous tests hide.

Colder, still colder, old time's winds are blowing,
And shud'ring we pass through the world's chilling throng;
Though strong in our bosom the life-flame is glowing,
The flesh oft recoils, while the heart is still warm.

Brighter, still brighter, the pure word is shining;
The lamp, sure prophetical lamp, is lit up;
Its garlands of truth 'round the holy are twining,
And bright'ning their pathway, all radiant with hope.

Faith and Obedience.

Continued.

As we trace the history of Christ, we are struck with the oft repeated expression, "That the Scriptures might be fulfilled," showing conclusively that "the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." A study of the prophecies was therefore needful in order to understand their development in the life of Christ, and no one, well instructed in these, could have failed in their application. The manner and place of his birth—the time of his manifestation to the world—the miracles which he wrought—his entrance into Jerusalem riding upon a colt—his betrayal by one of his own disciples—the king under whose reign he would be crucified—the piercing of his hands and feet, and side—the offering him vinegar to drink mingled with gall—the division of his garments, and casting lots for his vesture—the crucifixion of the thieves with him—his burial in Joseph's tomb—his resurrection on the third day—and ascension into heaven, all, ALL had been distinctly marked, and was literally accomplished.

But who believed all this evidence?—Who heard him gladly? The pious Pharisees, who made "broad their philacteries," by the number of the passages of the law which they had attached to their garments? Those who made long prayers at the corners of the streets, that they might be heard of men, and sounded a trumpet before them when they gave alms, that they might be seen of men? Those who wore close hoods or bonnets with which to cover their faces, lest they be contaminated by beholding the wickedness around them? Those who loved greetings in the markets, and chose the highest seats in the synagogues, and to be called of men Rabbi? Those who compassed sea and land to make one proselyte to their religion—paid tithes of mint, anise and cummin, but omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy and faith? Those who made clean the outside of the cup and the platter, while within they were full of uncleanness? Those who builded the tombs of the prophets and garnished the sepulchres of the righteous, saying, "If we had lived in the days of our fathers we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets," and yet when God sent unto them wise men, prophets and scribes, yea, and his own Son, they scourged, crucified, stoned and persecuted them from city to city? Were these the men who received the doctrines of Christ? No, they made them void by their tradition. Were these the men who become his disciples? No, they said "we be Moses' disciples, and these men who know not the law are accursed." Were these the men who were convinced by his miracles? No, they said, "He casteth out devils by Beelzebub, the prince of devils. Were these the men who shouted "Hosanna to the Son of David!" when he rode into Jerusalem? No, they said, "We will not have this man to reign over us." Were these the men who endeavored to deliver him from death? No, they said, "Let his blood be on us and on our children."

Were these the men who were convinced by his resurrection? No, they bribed the soldiers to say, "His disciples came by night and stole him away," and then persuaded the governor to believe the [illegible], and secured the life of the soldiers. We [illegible] the question, Who believed his [illegible]? We reply, A few fishermen. Who heard him gladly? "The common people."

Who were they that with great power gave witness to his resurrection? One of them was called [illegible], who, only a few days before, was heard denying with oaths and curses that he was ever a disciple of the dispised Nazarene. "Poor fellow, at one time he had so much confidence in himself, and his faith was so strong in Jesus of Nazareth being the Son of God, that he strongly affirmed that though all men should forsake him, yet he would prove faithful to him. And at another time he thought he had faith enough to walk on the water; but he soon found he was mistaken; for he began to sink, and would have been drowned for his presumption, if some one had not rescued him. And he was so sure that that Nazarene was the King of the Jews that he went all through the country prebching that the kingdom was at hand, but when that impostor was put to death for his blasphemy, like an honest man he gave it up, and went back to his fishing boat, and that was the best place for him and his brother-fishermen, who, ignoramuses as they were, pretended to know all about the prophecies and the prophetic periods, but it is evident now that they were wise above what was written, for it has all proved a failure, and we were right after all."

Thus we might suppose the haughty Scribes and Pharisees reasoned when they saw Jesus securely laid in the tomb, and the government seal placed upon it; and judge how great must have been their surprise and indignation when the sound reached their ears that Peter, with the rest of the disciples, had again given up their fishing-boats and were engaged in preaching that Christ was alive again, and they had seen and been with him forty days, and that he then went up into heaven.—"Why," say they, to quell the excited feelings of the people, "the very idea is absurd—and have not the soldiers themselves testified that the disciples came at night, when they were asleep, and stole away his body; and now, to conceal their mortification, instead of making an humble confession of their mistake, they have fixed up this fine story about His coming to life, and that He told them before he died that He should be raised from the dead the third day; but they had quite forgotten it until since his resurrection. They will have it that David referred to that when he said, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption;" but it is all perversion—the Psalmist meant himself, for he says expressly, "my soul." This trying to shield themselves from mortification, and cover up their mistakes by taking refuge under prophecy, is extremely inconsistent; and they are so uncharitable too; they accuse us of being the betrayers and murderers of the Son of God, and say that we cannot be saved unless we repent and acknowledge all they have preached to be true. It is very strange that if their Master was raised from the dead and has been with them for forty days that none of us have seen him.—Why, I should have thought that he would have come to us the very first thing, and thus convinced us that he was indeed the Christ. I do not wonder they got up the story that he had gone off into heaven; for they must needs see that we could not admit, for a moment, that he was still on the earth and nobody know anything about it but his followers. We know that God spake unto Moses—we know that he gave us the law from heaven amid the thunderings and lightnings of Sinai—we know that he led our fathers through the wilderness by a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night, and gave them possession of the land of Canaan. We know that God has wrought many miracles for us and given us great victories, and caused us to have a name far above all the nations of the earth. He has promised us a King to reign on David's throne forever in great glory and splendor, and that all the heathen should bow down before us and be our servants. When Christ comes he will do all this for us, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." We think we do not come very far short of the truth, when we suppose that those unbelieving Jews thus reasoned among themselves and endeavored to lead the minds of the people away from those great truths which the disciples were engaged in proclaiming.

PROPHETIC PERIODS.—1260, 1290, 1335 Years of Daniel and John.

The daily sacrifice taken away, and the Abomination of Desolation set up, and the Saints given unto the hand of the Little Horn.......519.

1260 years of tribulation.—Rev. 11: 2, 3, and 12: 6, 14, and 13: 5. The sun darkened May 19, 1780, to show its termination. — 1779.

1290 years, or time times and the dividing of time—or time times and a part, in which the TIMES and LAWS are in the hands of the Little Horn. — Napoleon takes away the civil power of the Little Horn. 1809. — Fall of the Stars 1833.

1335 years, reaching from the setting up of the Abomination of Desolation, or the time when the Saints' times and laws were given into the hand of the Little Horn, to the end, when Daniel with all the Saints will stand in their lot.......1854. — THE END.

☞ The above Diagram is designed to illustrate the measurement of time from the rise of the little horn, with eyes and a mouth (the civil power of the Greek Empire, or Eastern Rome incorporated with the Ecclesiastical Power of the Papacy.—Dan. 7: 8) until the coming of Christ at the resurrection of the saints.

The 1290 years, or time, times and the dividing of time, (Dan. 7: 25) measure the period during which the saints, times and laws were to be given into his hand—The period of the saint's tribulation, we understand, were shortened to 1260 years, (Rev. 12: 6, 14—11: 2 and 13: 5); but times and laws were to remain in his hand during 1290 years, extending 30 years beyond the 1260. "But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion to consume and destroy unto the end." 45 years from the close of the 1290 make 1335 years, when Daniel will stand in his lot, which must be at the resurrection of the saints.

Christ, speaking of this desolating power—the papacy—says, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened,"—which marks a point previous to which the saints were taken out of the hands of the little horn power. Thus we perceive that 1260 years of the 1335 ended prior to the 19th of May, 1780, when the sun was darkened. Add 75 years to 1260 and you have 1335 years, which must end before May 19th, 1855, according to the evidence from the darkening of the sun. But we have abundant historical evidence that the papal power, i. e. the abomination that maketh desolate, was set up in 519, hence the 1335 days (years) end in 1854, which brings the coming of the Lord and the resurrection of the saints the present year.

SAMUEL PAGE.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW LEBANON, N. H.

Brother Merriam:—Being separated from my brothers and sisters of the like precious faith, who are looking for that same blessed hope, the glorious appearing of our Savior; it cheers my heart—it brightens my pathway to hear from the little flock scattered up and down in the world, living in the midst of a proud church and surrounded by a wicked world. I feel to thank God for the "Crisis." To me it is like a fountain of water in a dry and thirsty land. I feel like the prophet, that I am surrounded with briers and dwelling in the midst of scorpions, yet I fear no evil; for he that "hath his way in the whirlwind" will not leave nor forsake me till I see him whom my soul loves. Oh, children of the living God, press onwards; we are nearing home—the home of the redeemed, the home of saints and angels. Oh, I long to be there. Cheer up, waiting pilgrim, "the morning cometh and also the night." Yes, the resurrection morning, with its bright glories, is near at hand: "it hasteth greatly." Then those, who now sleep in Jesus, will come forth from their dusty beds;—and we, together with them, shall be caught up to meet the Lord in the air.

But a long dark night awaits the ungodly—a night that knows no morn—no sparkling stars will cheer that gloomy night—no rising sun dispel the darkness. Oh, sinner! if you will not have this man, Christ Jesus, to reign over you, you must die to live no more forever.

Oh, may we, who profess to love the appearing of Christ, be "preserved blameless unto his coming and kingdom."

Your brother, looking for
Jesus this year,
HARRISON M. CULLOCK.

CHARLEMONT, MASS, April 19, 1854.

Bro. Merriam:—It is a solemn thought, that we have entered the last year of time, and faith in God's word, (time given in Daniel) says, this year the sleepers in Christ, must be redeemed from the bondage of the grave; and we that are alive (as St. Paul, has written) be changed.—Yes, this year "we have not followed cunningly devised fables," but the word of God; and we know that will stand: not one jot or tittle of it will fail till all be fulfilled. The kingdoms of this world are numbered, and almost finished; their glory has departed; they are weighed in the balances of truth, and found wanting. The vision is unsealed, and they are now accountable for its light. This Edom (the red land,) is dyed with the blood of Prophets, and Apostles, which has long since cried (like Abel's) from the ground; and their blood will soon be disclosed, and earth no longer cover her slain. And when the dead are raised, great Babylon must come into remembrance, that the Lord may reward her double according to her works; for, "she is drunken with the blood of saints, and the blood of the martyrs of Jesus, and God will give her blood to drink." But the nations of the earth do not know, they will not consider; their visions of peace, and their day dreams of aggrandizement have lulled them into a sleep, from which they will never awake; yea, "they will drink and swallow down, and be as though they had not been." They are already inventing instruments for their own destruction; and as this war will embrace the great mass of mankind, their weapons must be accordingly made for wholesale murder; the shroud must be large enough for a winding sheet for a world. O how would God's children now tremble at the prospect of bloodshed that is before them, were it not for the word; but praise God, we can go to the testimony and read the destiny of this nation, and all the nations of the earth; that a thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee.—"Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the reward of the wicked." And thus we are kept in perfect peace, whose hearts are stayed on God in these perilous times. The position of the church now is truly one of deep interest; it is a trying one, but thank God it is safe. Millions are now looking upon Zion, saying, "let her be defiled, that our eye may look upon Zion." Yea, they watch for our halting. The disappointment of '44 makes them bold; and the snare is set, and their willful blindness will hide it, for "in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird;" but ah they see not that the scripture's cannot be broken. There must be a tarrying time; bless God, there is but one.—The vision will speak; it will not lie. The Church hold's on to the promise with a trembling hand; but it is the grasp of faith, unyielding faith. She will rise to sink no more. O who would not be a wise virgin in 1854? She will realize her inheritance this year, and the earth will be fitted up, a home for the redeemed. There has been a general rising and trimming of lamps; and the Church are being purified, and made white and tried. I see it, I feel it, knowledge is increasing, and the watchmen will soon be found seeing eye to eye. The Lord will bring again Zion, as on the day of penticost; and it will be here; there will be no need of watchmen in glory, for it shall be a peaceable habitation; "not one of her stakes shall ever be removed;" nothing shall enter into it "that defileth, or maketh a lie;" no slave ship with oars will sail on that peaceful river, but the redeemed shall walk there. Hallelujah—A few months in the past, I could (like one that was healed gradually, in olden time) see men as trees walking; but while I have searched the scriptures, they have been opened to my understanding; while I have mused the fire has burned, and I can no longer, hold my peace. I must speak that I may be refreshed. I would not ask a clearer position; I would not ask a more sure word of prophecy, How can I stumble with such light? The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him. Now, Brethren, we have tasted of the good word of God, and a little of the power of the world to come; and if we should fall away, we could not be renewed; we should be justly damned. May God help his children, for "the godly man ceaseth, the faithful fail from among the children of men." I know God has done all for his vineyard, that could be done; he is waiting to be gracious; his locks are wet with the dews of the night. He is the way, the truth, and the life." "I pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God."

I still feel thankful to God for the Crisis. O how glad I have been, as I have watched, fearing I should see something hard, cruel, some bitter retort; but thank God, I have watched invain. All is love, the brethren have a mind to work, (not quarrel,) and the wall will be builded. It seems they court peace, by one common consent. As my eye rested on Bro. H. Pratt's article, and many others, I could not help exclaiming,

Welcome, thrice welcome, thou truth-freighted paper,
Which points to a Crisis that surely will come;
A steady flame burns on this love-lighted taper;
Thrice welcome, bright star, to my heart and my home.

From your unworthy sister,
looking for redemption this
year according to the word,
VESTA N. CUDWORTH.

DEEDS CREEK, KOSCIUSKO CO., IND., March 26, 1854.

BRO. MERRIAM:—Your little sheet, entitled "The World's Crisis," has been kindly sent to my address; and I thank you for the favor of perusing some of the evidences of the Lord's near approach. In the fall of, '44, I confidently expected the coming of the Bridegroom on the 10th day of the 7th month, but, with many others, was sadly disappointed. Since that time, I have been trying to investigate the word of the Lord, and to preach, as I learned from that great source of truth. I have given considerable more attention to the doctrine of life and immortality through Christ alone, than to the study of historical prophecy of late; so that a definite announcement with regard to the coming of the Messiah, demands a careful investigation on my part, with reference to the evidences relied upon for proof. I thought that we could come to no more definite conclusions, than the fulfilment of remaining prophecies, item by item, would warrant; but I have no disposition to oppose my brethren who look for the Lord this year. Indeed, the more I reflect, the more the conclusion impresses me that the Lord is soon to come. In Rev. 16: 12—15, we have events demonstrative of the near approach of our Lord. The waters of the mystical Euphrates have been evaporating for years, and seem now upon the very point of drying up under the scorching influences now exerted upon them. And the unclean spirits too are gathering the Kings of the earth and of the whole world to the battle of that great day of God Almighty. What voice is addressed to the children of God when these predictions are fulfilling? Let us hear with solemn attention. "Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame." History, Chronology, and signs in both heaven and earth, proclaim with emphasis, "Behold He cometh!" If we survey the professed church, what a spectacle! How like the inspired description See 2 Tim. 3: 1—8. How much iniquity cloaked under a form of godliness! Where then are we! In the last days! What an effort to become rich, and live in pleasure upon the earth. See James 5: 1—8. Where then are we? In the last days! The coming of the Lord draweth nigh! The Judge standeth at the door! What scoffing at the doctrine of Christ's second coming. See 2 Pet. 3: 3, 4.—Where then are we? In the last days! No place is assigned in the "sure word" for the ascendency of democratic principles, that fond delusion of worldly men.—God has given Republicanism a fair trial in these United States. And can any one claim that this form of government, should it become universal, is calculated to meet the necessities of the world? Alas, the iniquities of this government send up a cry like the grievous sins of the cities of the plain for speedy divine intervention! Gen. 18, 19 chs. Wo to our legislators for their iniquitous compromises in that day. No place is found, on the other hand, for another despotism to sway an universal sceptre, and oppress the nations, as the Monarch of the North anticipates. No, a whirlwind sweep over certain countries, into the glorious land, and he falls before him whose right it is to reign. Glory to God, the fifth universal government is not another earthly despotism, not a slave-holding republic, but a glorious Theocracy under the administration of God's Anointed Son. But when does this power stalk with such strides over opposing lands to the glorious holy mountain? At the time of the end, just before Michael stands up, and the resurrection occurs! What days end here? 1335! O glorious hope of the child of God. The dead, who have died in the Lord, now come forth, changed from corruption to incorruption, from mortality to immortality, from weakness to power, from deformity to glory, and from the image of the earthy to the image of the heavenly; while those who are alive and remain, or wait and come to the 1335 days, are changed in a moment, and caught up with them to meet the Lord in the air, to be forever with the Lord. Are the brethren, who send forth the Crisis, correct in adjusting their days viz 1260, 1290, and 1335 to the historical eras of 519, 1779, 1809, and 1854? If so, may we all understand and prepare to meet our Lord in peace, and be found of him, without spot, and blameless. I intend to carefully investigate this subject, and watch the course of events.

Yours, for the Kingdom,
S. A. CHAPLIN.

DIGEDEQUASH, Charlotte Co., Prov. of N. B.

Through the mercy of God, we still live, and are striving to give the last note of warning, as opportunity affords. We spent Sat. Feb. 18th, and Sunday 19th, and Monday 20th, with the friends in Oldtown, Me. We left Oldtown Tuesday 21st for Brewer, where we tried to preach to a small congregation in the evening; next day in company with Elder Reed we held meetings three times. It was truly a solemn and profitable season. On the morrow, Thursday 23d, we left for Hermon in one of the severest snow storms I ever rode in. But through the goodness and mercy of our heavenly Father we arrived in safety at the Pilgrim home of Bro. and Sr. Geo. Brackett. Seldom if ever, more thankful to sit by a comfortable fire side, than on this occasion, and we were glad to rest for one evening. On friday evening we held a prayer meeting in the new Chapel. Saturday the next day, in the afternoon, we preached the first sermon in the Chapel. And on Monday, after trying to break the bread of life to the dear saints twice on Saturday, and three times on Lord's day, we left on Monday afternoon for the Province of New Brunswick.

On Thursday morning somewhat rested, we again set forth, when after a drive of 30 miles we reached Upper Milltown, on the St. Croix river. Crossing over the bridge, we put up for the night on the English side, in Queen Victoria's dominion. The next night we tried to preach in the Bethel meeting house, on the Restitution. The next day, Saturday, March 24, we held a meeting beneath the roof of Malcom M'Farlin, father of Bro. Duncan M'Farlin, of Oldtown, Me. On Sunday, March 5th, we were enabled to set forth the reasons of our hope to an interesting congregation, in the morning, afternoon and evening, also last night in the Baptist meeting house, at the rolling dam on the Digedequash river. Here is a great field, and an open door. The Macedonian Cry is being raised in every direction. O that God in mercy would raise up, qualify and thrust out into the field faithful laborers, in this last moment of time. Thanks and adoration to God; we are nearly through. Every day brings us nearer and nearer the haven of eternal repose. O rest—sweet, sweet rest—never did the lines of Montgomery the poet, breathe a sweeter fulness to my longing heart than now:

"While in this body pent, absent from thee I roam;
Yet nightly pitch my moving tent, a day's march nearer home."

Ere I close I wish to say a few words concerning the church at North Hermon. Their number increased to such an extent within a few months, the school house would not contain the congregation. A request was made to the town for the privilege of enlarging it at the expense of the church, which was disregarded, when they concluded to put up a temporary building: and in 17 days from the time they commenced framing the building, they had a house 32 by 40 feet, enclosed, plastered and seated, with two stoves placed therein.

The language of Nehemiah vi: 16th, came forcibly to my mind, also the latter part of the 6th verse of the iv chapter.—I was forced to the conclusion, at the close of the Lord's day, Feb. 26th, that if they never have the privilege of holding another conference ere they shall be called to their reward, the precious season enjoyed, and the large attentive congregation that had the privilege of hearing on that occasion, were sufficient to amply repay them for their labors of love, in erecting that house. Thus an opportunity of hearing was afforded, which otherwise they never could have enjoyed. God bless them and all the saints scattered abroad, Amen.

Thy Bro. in glorious hope,
S. S. BREWER.

March 7, 1854, the year of Jubilee.

BATH, N. H., March 24, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—I am much interested in the "Crisis," and when I have received one number, I can hardly wait for the next. Ever since the first received, I have felt a desire to write for its columns. I am well aware that I possess but one talent, and that a small one. Duty prompting me, I dare not like that "slothful servant, dig and hide in the earth" that which I have received from God. I bless God, that the sound of the "Midnight Cry" has ever saluted my ears. And my prayer is, that it may be wafted on every breeze; that as many as can, may hear the good news and glad tidings of our coming Lord.—Thanks be to God; "He is nigh, even at the door." Soon He will come in the "clouds of Heaven," and we shall see Him as He is. O, glorious day! O, blessed hope to the saints! My heart bounds with joy when I think that the children of God will soon get home to their Fathers house, to part no more.

We have a little band of Advent believers here in this place; not more than six or eight of us at the most. We have to struggle hard, but the God of Daniel is on our side; and we are not discouraged.—We are looking for better days; and most earnestly pray, that some of the faithful watchmen of Zion may come this way and help us. Brethren, our case is an urgent one. We want to see sinners converted, and backsliders reclaimed. Brother E. Burnham was here last fall; and the bread that was then thrown out upon the waters, we think with an extra effort, might be gathered in.

Any of the brethren coming this way, will please to make a stop at swift-water, Village.

Yours, expecting immortality and never ending rest, in the kingdom of our God,
L. M. COLLINS.

LOUIS NAPOLEON, it seems, is preparing to pounce on Austria in earnest. The Washington Star has private advices which say that Louis Napoleon has distinctly notified the Emperor of Austria, that if he shows the slightest disposition to side with Russia in the war, he (the French Emperor) will raise the standard of revolt in Hungary and Lombardy.

The Great Anti-Christian Power,

AS REPRESENTED BY

DANIEL, CHRIST, PAUL AND JOHN:

BY J. COUCH

"When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand:)"—Matt. 24: 15.

As symbols are used in Daniel to represent the governments and powers presented in his visions, it will be necessary, in order to ascertain what people are presented as the persecuting organization, to have an interpretation of the symbols.

The four Beasts are declared to be four kings or kingdoms; therefore they represent the people associated in four secular governments. The fourth Beast is interpreted to represent the fourth kingdom; consequently it must be the last in the order of time. These governments are evidently Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece and Rome. As the Roman Beast appears with ten horns, the horns are evidently symbols of something connected with its history. The Angel interprets these horns to represent ten kings (kingdoms) out of this kingdom.

These are represented as existing, not consecutively, but simultaneously; therefore the Roman Empire must be divided into ten contemporary kingdoms. As in the 8th of Dan. the Grecian Beast is represented as having one horn, and this horn is explained to be the first king; this shows that the entire empire was under one government; but when this was "broken, four came up for it," at which time the empire was divided into four governments.—Therefore when the Roman Beast has ten horns, it must be divided into ten governments. But Daniel saw in vision another horn coming up among the ten. From this it appears, that the Roman Empire must be divided into eleven governments. The eleventh horn he represents as being the persecuting power under consideration. From these facts we learn, that the Roman government connected with those "that forsake the holy covenant" in the eleventh of Daniel, was one of the divisions of the Roman Empire, and NOT THE ROMAN EMPIRE IN ITS UNDIVIDED STATE.

As the ten horns represent ten kingdoms, the eleventh horn must also represent a kingdom; for the Angel says, "the ten horns are ten kings, and another shall rise after them." The word, "another," shows that the eleventh is classed with the ten. If I were speaking of beasts, and should say there were ten sheep and another, the eleventh must be of same class with the ten, and therefore a sheep.—Therefore, as the Angel says, "the ten horns are ten kings (kingdoms) and another shall rise after them," the eleventh must be of the same class, and consequently a king, or kingdom.

Therefore it appears, that the eleventh horn must represent the same kind of government represented by the other ten.—Although the prophecy shows it is like the other ten in respect to its class, or kind, yet it is also possessed of distinctive peculiarities. The distinctive characteristics of this symbol are, 1. It appeared more stout (or stronger) than the others. 2. It had organs of vision which the others had not. 3. It had "a mouth speaking great things," which the others had not. 4. It plucked up three of the first horns by the roots. 5. It made war on the saints and wore them out. 6. He shall think to change times and laws.

We now inquire, where did these kingdoms exist?

The horns came out of the fourth Beast, which represents the Roman Empire; consequently the kingdoms must have arisen on the Roman territory. Therefore we may expect to find a kingdom, corresponding to the description of the prophecy, upon the Roman territory, after ten others had arisen.

We learn from history, that as early as the latter part of the fifth century, ten kingdoms had arisen on the territory of Rome. These ten kingdoms, as given by Mede, are 1 Britons, 2 Saxons, 3 Franks, 4 Burgundians, 5 Wisigoths, 6 Sueves, 7 Vandals, 8 Alemanes, 9 Ostrogoths, 10 Greeks.

But the prophecy shows us there would be eleven kingdoms. On turning to history, we find that Dacia was a province of the Roman Empire, and that its territory, at this time, was not occupied by either of the above named governments, but by the Gepidœ, as an independent kingdom.—This completes the number given by the prophet. The principal objection to this arrangement of the ten kingdoms have been adduced in reference to the Alemanni. The objection to considering the Alemanni one of the ten kingdoms is, that they did not retain their kingly form of government and independence sufficiently late in their history to constitute them one of the ten. We do not deny that they had been humbled by the Franks, and that they did not retain their independence as formerly; but still we understand they enjoyed their own government, administered by their own rulers, and were a distinct people until the middle of the sixth century.

Says Gibbon: "But the spirit of a martial people outstripped the timid counsels of the Court; two brothers, Lothaire and Baccelin, (Leutharius and Batilinas), the dukes of the Alemanni, stood forth as the leaders of the Italian war; and seventy-five thousand Germans descended in the autumn from the Rhetian Alps into the plain of Milan." (Gib. v. 4, p. 276).—Again: "They followed the coast of the Mediterranean and the Adriatic as far as Regium and Otranto, and the extreme lands of Italy were the term of their destructive progress. Buccelin was actuated by ambition, and Lothaire by avarice.—The former aspired to restore the Gothic kingdom; the latter, after a promise to his brother of speedy succors, returned by the same road to deposit his treasure beyond the Alps." (p. 277).

"Baccelin and the greatest part of his army perished on the field of battle in the waters of the Vulturnus, or by the hands of the enraged peasants; but it may seem incredible, that a victory, which no more than five of the Alemanni survived, could be purchased with the loss of fourscore Romans." (p. 279). This battle was fought in A. D. 554.

"The Gallic territories, which were possessed by the Alemanni, became the prize of their conqueror; and the haughty nation, invincible, or rebellious, to the arms of Rome, acknowledged the sovereignty of the Merovingian kings, who graciously permitted them to enjoy their peculiar manners and institutions, under the government of official and at length hereditary dukes. (Gib. v. 3, p. 573).

Says Bishop Newton, in his comments on the kingdoms symbolized in Daniel's prophecy: "By kingdom meaning any government, state or polity in the world, whether monarchy, or Republic, or what form soever."

Taking Bishop Newton's definition of a kingdom, we inquire whether the Alemanni were a kingdom in the first half of the sixth century? Gibbon says: "after they were conquered by Clovis, they enjoyed their own peculiar institutions under the government of official and at length of hereditary dukes." Howell says: "IN THEIR CIVIL GOVERNMENT they conformed themselves much to that of the Franks." Again, speaking of two of their rulers, he says: "they were of vast authority and power amongst the Franks, WHOM INDEED THEY GOVERNED. With these facts before us, can we dispute the idea that they had a government?—Not, unless we dispute the testimony of historians. Therefore Newton could call them a kingdom.

Many learned Expositors contend, that the ten kingdoms symbolized by the ten horns, were the first ten which did arise in the Roman territory after the Imperial government was broken. Mede maintains that they had arisen as early as A. D. 456. Newton, in commenting on this prophecy, and quoting from Mede, remarks, that he was so correct in his interpretations, that some supposed him divinely inspired.—Bishop Newton maintained that these ten kingdoms might be found at different periods in the Roman history subsequently to their first developement; therefore he quotes Mede to show that they existed in the fifth century; he shows himself also that they existed in the ninth century, and quotes other authorities to show that they were in existence at still later periods.

Our next object will be to ascertain which of the eleven kingdoms was the kingdom identified in the prophecy as making war on the saints for "a time, times and the dividing of time." We have before alluded to the distinctive characteristics of this little horn, viz.: 1. It is more stout (or strong) than his fellows. 2. It had organs of vision. 3. It had a mouth speaking great things. 4. It plucks up three of the first horns by the roots. 5. It makes war on the saints. 6. It shall think to change times and laws. We now look for these several characteristics; and if we can find one of these eleven kingdoms on the Roman territory, having each and all of the characteristics clearly developed, by which we identify the little horn, it must be the kingdom represented by the symbol: for inasmuch as these distinctive marks are given by the prophet on purpose to designate the power, it follows of course, that there can be no other one possessing those peculiar features, otherwise the distinguishing marks given by the prophet are of no avail. If two of the horns should be found possessing the same characteristics as brought to view by the prophet, the prophetic delineation could be no guide to us in our researches after truth on this subject. Again as this horn is to be stouter than his fellows, i. e. this kingdom stronger than either of the others, it is absolutely impossible that more than one of the kingdoms can correspond to the prophetic description. We therefore conclude, that if we can find which of the eleven was the most powerful kingdom, we can identify the government symbolized by the little horn.

In reference to this point, all history teaches, and those who are informed on the subject admit the fact, that the Grecian kingdom was far more powerful in its fleets and armies, and more extended in its territory, than either of the other kingdoms. But if the Grecian kingdom be the one presented in the prophecy, it follows, by consequence, that it must have all the other characteristics described; and we proceed to inquire, secondly, whether it had properties symbolized by the eyes of the little horn.

2. The term "eyes" in scripture is used in a figurative sense to denote the perception of the mind. As the visual organ gives a distinct idea of the form, colour, magnitude and other properties of objects around us, so the spiritual perceptions of the mind give us a definite idea of the objects pesented in the word of God. Ps. 19: 8, "The commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes." From this passage it appears, that the commandments of God enable us to perceive the various duties devolving on us in the different relations of life. Eph. 1: 18, "The eyes of your understanding being enlightened, that ye may know" (clearly perceive, understand) "what is the hope of His calling; and what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints."—The term "eyes" in this passage denotes the perception of the mind, enabling us through the medium of the word, to obtain a clear and distinctive idea of the objects and blessings of the saints' inheritance. We therefore conclude that God presents "eyes" as a symbol to represent the spiritual discernment which is a prominent characteristic of the Church.

John, in his prophetic visions, saw four beasts representing the Church in four different stages of her history, "full of eyes before and behind," and "within."—As these beasts were full of eyes before and behind and within, eyes represent a prominent characteristic of the Church.—It appears, therefore, that the Church will have a clear understanding of the dealings of God with her in the past, and will perceive the dangers and blessings pointed out on the prophetic chart in the future, and the duties and responsibilities connected with the developement of present truth. Therefore we may expect to find the government referred to professing to understand spiritual things, and establishing them by its government acts. The Greek government not only professed thus to understand spiritual things, (i. e. the faith of the Church,) but also ENFORCED THE SAME UNDERSTANDING (CREED) upon the subjects of the government by legislative enactments.

3. We now inquire what is represented by "a mouth?" We understand it to be a symbol of the instrumentality through which God speaks, or conveys instruction to man. By a reference to Ex. 4: 16, we find, that God declares, that Aaron should be "mouth" for Moses, and Moses should be in the place of God to Aaron; because Aaron became the instrument through which Moses spake to Pharaoh and the people. Therefore any man, or association of men, that speaks for God, may be said to be mouth for God. In accordance with this view, the Lord says to Jeremiah; "If thou take forth the precious from the vile, thou shalt be as my mouth." But when the mouth of this horn speaks, instead of speaking for God, and in harmony with the plan of heaven, it will speak against God, or contrary to the divine economy; i. e. it will teach unscriptural doctrines contrary to the Gospel, which will be established by the enactments of this government; because all the acts presented in the symbol must be governmental acts. On turning to history we find the Greek kingdom, professing to understand the doctrines of the Church, DID ESTABLISH THOSE DOCTRINES AS A RELIGIOUS CREED BY LAW.

4. What is intended by the little horn's plucking up three of the first horns by the roots? The Angel says, by way of explanation, "he shall subdue three kings." Observe, the prophet does not assert, that the three horns shall be broken, which might imply a reduction of their power to a tributary condition, but that they should be "PLUCKED UP BY THE ROOTS," which teaches an entire overthrow and annihilation of the three kingdoms, so that they would not be like the kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar, which had its roots left "with a band of iron and brass," giving an opportunity for a growth and developement of the same power again. By examining history we learn, that the Greek government did subdue three of the ten kingdoms according to the representation of the prophecy: viz.: the Vandals in A. D. 534, the Goths in A. D. 553, and the Alemanni in A. D. 554. The Greek Emperor effected an entire subjugation of those nations, and an extinction of those governments according to the prophecy.

5. This power is to make war on the saints. Any government that wages war on another government, or class of people, does so from the fact that they will not submit to terms of its dictation. As the class of people warred against are Christians, the war is made on them as such, and consequently it must be a religious war waged by an intolerant government. Having already shown that the government, being represented as having eyes and a mouth, would profess to understand divine things, and teach them as the Church of Christ, it is evident it must be an politico-ecclesiastical government. We learn from history, that the Greek government did nationalize the creed of one Church, which it deemed orthodox, incorporating the same into the laws of the empire to the exclusion of all others—that it did throw its shield of protection over one denomination of Christians, as legal worshippers, to the exclusion of other sects upon whom it waged a war of extermination.

6. "He shall think to change times and laws." In what respect does this government change times and laws differently from the others, so that it would become a distinguishing characteristic of the government? By Reference to what has been said above respecting the eyes and mouth of the little horn, it will be seen that this government will profess to understand ecclesiastical affairs, and to establish the same by law; therefore we may expect to find this government changing ecclesiastical laws for the government of the Church by which they changed the times and seasons of worship. We find that the translators of the Septuagint rendered the term, which is translated laws, in the singular number, "law," instead of "laws;" and Prof. Stewart, who was a distinguished Hebraist, explains it as having reference to the divine law. Hence if we can show that the Greek government changed the law of Christ for the government of the Church, it will exactly correspond to the representation of the prophecy. By a reference to 2 Thess. 2, we find, that the "man of sin," (little horn), sitteth in the TEMPLE OF GOD, showing himself that he is God; i. e. he assumes the divine prerogative to legislate for the Church in the place of God. That the Greek kingdom perfectly fulfilled this point in the prophecy we shall prove from history hereafter.

Having ascertained what civil government it was that had intelligence with a class of men who had forsaken the holy covenant, (i. e. an apostate Church,) we now proceed to inquire what particular ecclesiastical organization or Church was referred to in the prophecy. By a reference to Rev. ch. 13, we find a power presented to John symbolized by a Beast coming up out of the sea. We recognize this as the same power presented in the 7th of Daniel under an emblem of the little horn. We so understand it because its characteristics are the same.

1. "There was given unto him a mouth speaking great things." It was not the mouth of a lion, because that has not the organs of speech; but of a man, therefore he says "there was given unto him a mouth." The little horn also had a mouth.

2. The Beast spake "great things"—the horn spake "great things."

3. The Beast spake "blasphemy against God"—the horn spake "great words against the Most High."

4. The Beast "made war with the saints"—the horn "made war with the saints."

5. The Beast overcame the saints—the horn prevailed against them (the saints).

6. The Beast makes war forty and two months—the saints were given into his hand (i. e. they were to be persecuted by the little horn) for time, times and the dividing of time. These characteristics being the same in both, clearly show the identity of the Beast and little horn.

Again in the vision of the 17th chapter of Rev. the same Beast is presented to the eye of John. That this Beast represents the same power is evident from the following considerations:—It was "full of the names of blasphemy"—that of the 13th chapter, "opened his mouth in blasphemy"—it had seven heads and ten horns as had the Beast of the 13th chapter:—it "was drunken with the blood of the saints," while that of the 13th chapter "made war on the saints."

But it may be said the Beast of the 13th chapter "had a mouth given unto it" with which it could speak, while no such thing is affirmed of the beast presented in the 17th chapter. We however find that a Woman was seated upon this Beast possessing both the organs of vision and of speech.

We have found that eyes and a mouth represent prominent characteristics of the Church; we now inquire what is symbolized by the Woman? By reference to the 12th chapter we learn, that the symbol of a Woman is used as an emblem of the Church; therefore we conclude that the Woman seated upon the Beast in the 17th chapter is the same as the "mouth" given to the Beast in the 13th chapter, and the same as the "eyes and mouth" in the little horn of Dan. 7th.

☞ Having read with interest the following excellent tract from the pen of Bro. J. Cummings, and felt my own spirit refreshed by it, I thought, if it were inserted in the Crisis, it would be meat in due season to the household.—ED.

Geo. Storrs' Flat Rock.

A short time ago while I was at Suncook, I had an opportunity of looking over Bro. Paine's old Advent papers, which are so valuable and profitable to examine in these times of peril, while so many are departing from the faith. Among those papers, I found a little sheet, published at New York, Oct. 4, 1844, from which I extract the following, from the pen of Geo. Storrs. Too high an estimate cannot be put upon it. The principles are correct. It is just the position the church must stand upon, when the Master comes. The passing of the time has nothing to do with the position the Church must be found in when the Lord does appear.

If it was necessary that the people of God should stand out with such confidence in 1844, providing the Lord had come, it certainly will be necessary that they stand in such confidence when he does come.—The position cannot be denied; and may the good Master strengthen us to leave all for Christ and his kingdom. Here is the extract:

"How shall we be ready for that day? Believe God's truth, and venture out upon it, by a strong faith that gives glory to God. We must have the same state of mind that we would have if we knew we were to die on that day—the same entire consecration to God, and deadness to the world.

I cannot better illustrate what I mean than to suppose a large flat rock in the midst of the ocean. A promise is made by a glorious and mighty prince, that at a given time he will send a splendid steamer to carry all persons whom he shall find there, with the evidence that they fully credited his word, to a glorious country. Many venture out to the rock. Some, when they are safe on the rock, cut the rope, and their craft with which they came there, drifts away from them, and they look after them no more, but are watching for the arrival of the steam ship. They have no doubt of the truth of the promise, and risk all upon it. Others, who come there, think it is enough that they are on the rock. But they would be "wise and prudent," so they make their craft, or boats, fast to the rock, because, "If the steamer don't come, we shall be without any thing to get to land." Hence, they are going to be prudent, and not to run too great a risk. "According to thy faith be it unto thee," had been sounded before the time the steamer was expected. The day arrives. The prudent ones, it may be, intend to cut their boats loose, and let them float off, if they see the steamer coming. It appears in sight; but now it is too late to let go their boats without their being discovered: and besides, the same prudence would dictate now that they do not let their boats float away till they are certain that they are not mistaken in the approaching vessel. Now it comes so near, they cannot possibly cut loose without being discovered. What is the evidence that you had implicit confidence in the promise of the arrival of the steamer? Our boats are cut loose, and have floated away from us, so that we could not possibly get to land, and must have perished, if the steamer had not arrived, for it is a rock where no other vessel ever passes. 'This is enough,' cries the Commander of the steam vessel; 'come on board; such confidence shall not be disappointed.' Those who had kept their boats made fast to the rock, now crowd round, and strive to get on board the steamer. The Commander asks, 'What mean these boats I see made fast to the rock yonder, or whose boats have only been cut since I arrived in sight?' They answer, 'we thought we would be prudent, so that if the steamer did not arrive, we might have something to get back to land with.' 'You made provision for the flesh, then,' cries the Commander, 'did you, and so doubted my word? According to thy faith be it unto thee. The evidence is against you. You made provision to return, and now you must reap the fruit of your unbelief.'—'SO THEY COULD NOT ENTER IN, BECAUSE OF UNBELIEF!'—Oh, awful state of despair!

Cut your ropes, now, brethren · let your boats float off out of sight;—yea, make haste before the 'sign of the Son of Man appear.' Then it will be too late. Venture now—and venture all. Oh, my heart is pained for you, while I see you hesitate. Oh, make haste, I beseech you—don't dally—push off that boat, or you are lost; for, 'WHOSOEVER SHALL SEEK TO SAVE HIS LIFE SHALL LOSE IT.' So saith Jesus Christ, our Lord and Judge. Make haste then, once more I entreat you, O MAKE HASTE—let go every boat by which you are now calculating to escape to land 'IF it don't come.' That 'IF' will ruin you. It is now the last trial and temptation. Do as our Lord did with the last temptation of the devil—'Get thee hence, Satan,' said he. 'Then the devil leaveth him, and behold angels came and ministered unto him.' So it will be with you, when you have gained this triumph.

One word to those who would escape with their lives and be received of their Lord when he comes. Stop not to contend with those who hate this doctrine, and wish to reason you out of it. You can do them no good, and they may do you eternal injury. If you find those who are honestly inquiring on the subject, treat them kindly, but especially direct them to God, who only can help them in this late hour. Pray always, and watch continually. The Lord will come and WILL NOT TARRY. My faith is a thousand fold stronger than it was two weeks ago. I feel that it would

The Great Anti-Christian Power,

AS REPRESENTED BY
DANIEL, CHRIST, PAUL AND JOHN:
BY J. COUCH

"When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand:)"—Matt. 24: 15.

As symbols are used in Daniel to represent the governments and powers presented in his visions, it will be necessary, in order to ascertain what people are presented as the persecuting organization, to have an interpretation of the symbols.

The four Beasts are declared to be four kings or kingdoms; therefore they represent the people associated in four secular governments. The fourth Beast is interpreted to represent the fourth kingdom; consequently it must be the last in the order of time. These governments are evidently Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece and Rome. As the Roman Beast appears with ten horns, the horns are evidently symbols of something connected with its history. The Angel interprets these horns to represent ten kings (kingdoms) out of this kingdom.

These are represented as existing, not consecutively, but simultaneously; therefore the Roman Empire must be divided into ten contemporary kingdoms. As in the 8th of Dan. the Grecian Beast is represented as having one horn, and this horn is explained to be the first king; this shows that the entire empire was under one government; but when this was "broken, four came up for it," at which time the empire was divided into four governments.—Therefore when the Roman Beast has ten horns, it must be divided into ten governments. But Daniel saw in vision another horn coming up among the ten. From this it appears, that the Roman Empire must be divided into eleven governments. The eleventh horn he represents as being the persecuting power under consideration. From these facts we learn, that the Roman government connected with those "that forsake the holy covenant" in the eleventh of Daniel, was one of the divisions of the Roman Empire, and NOT THE ROMAN EMPIRE IN ITS UNDIVIDED STATE.

As the ten horns represent ten kingdoms, the eleventh horn must also represent a kingdom; for the Angel says, "the ten horns are ten kings, and another shall rise after them." The word, "another," shows that the eleventh is classed with the ten. If I were speaking of beasts, and should say there were ten sheep and another, the eleventh must be of same class with the ten, and therefore a sheep.—Therefore, as the Angel says, "the ten horns are ten kings (kingdoms) and another shall rise after them," the eleventh must be of the same class, and consequently a king, or kingdom.

Therefore it appears, that the eleventh horn must represent the same kind of government represented by the other ten.—Although the prophecy shows it is like the other ten in respect to its class, or kind, yet it is also possessed of distinctive peculiarities. The distinctive characteristics of this symbol are, 1. It appeared more stout (or stronger) than the others. 2. It had organs of vision which the others had not. 3. It had "a mouth speaking great things," which the others had not. 4. It plucked up three of the first horns by the roots. 5. It made war on the saints and wore them out. 6. He shall think to change times and laws.

We now inquire, where did these kingdoms exist?

The horns came out of the fourth Beast, which represents the Roman Empire; consequently the kingdoms must have arisen on the Roman territory. Therefore we may expect to find a kingdom, corresponding to the description of the prophecy, upon the Roman territory, after ten others had arisen.

We learn from history, that as early as the latter part of the fifth century, ten kingdoms had arisen on the territory of Rome. These ten kingdoms, as given by Mede, are 1 Britons, 2 Saxons, 3 Franks, 4 Burgundians, 5 Wisigoths, 6 Sueves, 7 Vandals, 8 Alemanes, 9 Ostrogoths, 10 Greeks.

On turning to history, we find that Dacia was a province of the Roman Empire, and that its territory, at this time, was not occupied by either of the above named governments, but by the Gepidœ, as an independent kingdom.—This completes the number given by the prophet. (Gib. v. 3, p. 573).

Says Bishop Newton, in his comments on the kingdoms symbolized in Daniel's prophecy: "By kingdom meaning any government, state or polity in the world, whether monarchy, or Republic, or what form soever."

Taking Bishop Newton's definition of a kingdom, we inquire whether the Alemanni were a kingdom in the first half of the sixth century? Mede maintains that they had arisen as early as A. D. 456. Newton, in commenting on this prophecy, and quoting from Mede, remarks, that he was so correct in his interpretations, that some supposed him divinely inspired.—Bishop Newton maintained that these ten kingdoms might be found at different periods in the Roman history subsequently to their first developement; therefore he quotes Mede to show that they existed in the fifth century; he shows himself also that they existed in the ninth century, and quotes other authorities to show that they were in existence at still later periods.

Our next object will be to ascertain which of the eleven kingdoms was the kingdom identified in the prophecy as making war on the saints for "a time, times and the dividing of time." We have before alluded to the distinctive characteristics of this little horn, viz.: 1. It is more stout (or strong) than his fellows. 2. It had organs of vision. 3. It had a mouth speaking great things. 4. It plucks up three of the first horns by the roots. 5. It makes war on the saints. 6. It shall think to change times and laws. We now look for these several characteristics; and if we can find one of these eleven kingdoms on the Roman territory, having each and all of the characteristics clearly developed, by which we identify the little horn, it must be the kingdom represented by the symbol: for inasmuch as these distinctive marks are given by the prophet on purpose to designate the power, it follows of course, that there can be no other one possessing those peculiar features, otherwise the distinguishing marks given by the prophet are of no avail. If two of the horns should be found possessing the same characteristics as brought to view by the prophet, the prophetic delineation could be no guide to us in our researches after truth on this subject. Again as this horn is to be stouter than his fellows, i. e. this kingdom stronger than either of the others, it is absolutely impossible that more than one of the kingdoms can correspond to the prophetic description. We therefore conclude, that if we can find which of the eleven was the most powerful kingdom, we can identify the government symbolized by the little horn.

In reference to this point, all history teaches, and those who are informed on the subject admit the fact, that the Grecian kingdom was far more powerful in its fleets and armies, and more extended in its territory, than either of the other kingdoms. But if the Grecian kingdom be the one presented in the prophecy, it follows, by consequence, that it must have all the other characteristics described; and we proceed to inquire, secondly, whether it had properties symbolized by the eyes of the little horn.

2. The term "eyes" in scripture is used in a figurative sense to denote the perception of the mind. As the visual organ gives a distinct idea of the form, colour, magnitude and other properties of objects around us, so the spiritual perceptions of the mind give us a definite idea of the objects pesented in the word of God. Ps. 19: 8, "The commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes." From this passage it appears, that the commandments of God enable us to perceive the various duties devolving on us in the different relations of life. Eph. 1: 18, "The eyes of your understanding being enlightened, that ye may know" (clearly perceive, understand) "what is the hope of His calling; and what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints."—The term "eyes" in this passage denotes the perception of the mind, enabling us through the medium of the word, to obtain a clear and distinctive idea of the objects and blessings of the saints' inheritance. We therefore conclude that God presents "eyes" as a symbol to represent the spiritual discernment which is a prominent characteristic of the Church.

John, in his prophetic visions, saw four beasts representing the Church in four different stages of her history, "full of eyes before and behind," and "within."—As these beasts were full of eyes before and behind and within, eyes represent a prominent characteristic of the Church.—It appears, therefore, that the Church will have a clear understanding of the dealings of God with her in the past, and will perceive the dangers and blessings pointed out on the prophetic chart in the future, and the duties and responsibilities connected with the developement of present truth. Therefore we may expect to find the government referred to professing to understand spiritual things, and establishing them by its government acts. The Greek government not only professed thus to understand spiritual things, (i. e. the faith of the Church,) but also ENFORCED THE SAME UNDERSTANDING (CREED) upon the subjects of the government by legislative enactments.

3. We now inquire what is represented by "a mouth?" We understand it to be a symbol of the instrumentality through which God speaks, or conveys instruction to man. By a reference to Ex. 4: 16, we find, that God declares, that Aaron should be "mouth" for Moses, and Moses should be in the place of God to Aaron; because Aaron became the instrument through which Moses spake to Pharaoh and the people. Therefore any man, or association of men, that speaks for God, may be said to be mouth for God. In accordance with this view, the Lord says to Jeremiah; "If thou take forth the precious from the vile, thou shalt be as my mouth." But when the mouth of this horn speaks, instead of speaking for God, and in harmony with the plan of heaven, it will speak against God, or contrary to the divine economy; i. e. it will teach unscriptural doctrines contrary to the Gospel, which will be established by the enactments of this government; because all the acts presented in the symbol must be governmental acts. On turning to history we find the Greek kingdom, professing to understand the doctrines of the Church, DID ESTABLISH THOSE DOCTRINES AS A RELIGIOUS CREED BY LAW.

4. What is intended by the little horn's plucking up three of the first horns by the roots? The Angel says, by way of explanation, "he shall subdue three kings." Observe, the prophecy does not assert, that the three horns shall be broken, which might imply a reduction of their power to a tributary condition, but that they should be "PLUCKED UP BY THE ROOTS," which teaches an entire overthrow and annihilation of the three kingdoms, so that they would not be like the kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar, which had its roots left "with a band of iron and brass," giving an opportunity for a growth and developement of the same power again. By examining history we learn, that the Greek government did subdue three of the ten kingdoms according to the representation of the prophecy: viz.: the Vandals in A. D. 534, the Goths in A. D. 553, and the Alemanni in A. D. 554. The Greek Emperor effected an entire subjugation of those nations, and an extinction of those governments according to the prophecy.

5. This power is to make war on the saints. Any government that wages war on another government, or class of people, does so from the fact that they will not submit to terms of its dictation. As the class of people warred against are Christians, the war is made on them as such, and consequently it must be a religious war waged by an intolerant government. Having already shown that the government, being represented as having eyes and a mouth, would profess to understand divine things, and teach them as the Church of Christ, it is evident it must be an politico-ecclesiastical government. We learn from history, that the Greek government did nationalize the creed of one Church, which it deemed orthodox, incorporating the same into the laws of the empire to the exclusion of all others—that it did throw its shield of protection over one denomination of Christians, as legal worshippers, to the exclusion of other sects upon whom it waged a war of extermination.

6. "He shall think to change times and laws." In what respect does this government change times and laws differently from the others, so that it would become a distinguishing characteristic of the government? By Reference to what has been said above respecting the eyes and mouth of the little horn, it will be seen that this government will profess to understand ecclesiastical affairs, and to establish the same by law; therefore we may expect to find this government changing ecclesiastical laws for the government of the Church by which they changed the times and seasons of worship. We find that the translators of the Septuagint rendered the term, which is translated laws, in the singular number, "law," instead of "laws;" and Prof. Stewart, who was a distinguished Hebraist, explains it as having reference to the divine law. Hence if we can show that the Greek government changed the law of Christ for the government of the Church, it will exactly correspond to the representation of the prophecy. By a reference to 2 Thess. 2, we find, that the "man of sin," (little horn), sitteth in the TEMPLE OF GOD, showing himself that he is God; i. e. he assumes the divine prerogative to legislate for the Church in the place of God. That the Greek kingdom perfectly fulfilled this point in the prophecy we shall prove from history hereafter.

Having ascertained what civil government it was that had intelligence with a class of men who had forsaken the holy covenant, (i. e. an apostate Church,) we now proceed to inquire what particular ecclesiastical organization or Church was referred to in the prophecy. By a reference to Rev. ch. 13, we find a power presented to John symbolized by a Beast coming up out of the sea. We recognize this as the same power presented in the 7th of Daniel under an emblem of the little horn. We so understand it because its characteristics are the same.

1. "There was given unto him a mouth speaking great things." It was not the mouth of a lion, because that has not the organs of speech; but of a man, therefore he says "there was given unto him a mouth." The little horn also had a mouth.

2. The Beast spake "great things"—the horn spake "great things."

3. The Beast spake "blasphemy against God"—the horn spake "great words against the Most High."

4. The Beast "made war with the saints"—the horn "made war with the saints."

5. The Beast overcame the saints—the horn prevailed against them (the saints).

6. The Beast makes war forty and two months—the saints were given into his hand (i. e. they were to be persecuted by the little horn) for time, times and the dividing of time. These characteristics being the same in both, clearly show the identity of the Beast and little horn.

Again in the vision of the 17th chapter of Rev. the same Beast is presented to the eye of John. That this Beast represents the same power is evident from the following considerations:—It was "full of the names of blasphemy"—that of the 13th chapter, "opened his mouth in blasphemy"—it had seven heads and ten horns as had the Beast of the 13th chapter:—it "was drunken with the blood of the saints," while that of the 13th chapter "made war on the saints."

But it may be said the Beast of the 13th chapter "had a mouth given unto it" with which it could speak, while no such thing is affirmed of the beast presented in the 17th chapter. We however find that a Woman was seated upon this Beast possessing both the organs of vision and of speech.

We have found that eyes and a mouth represent prominent characteristics of the Church; we now inquire what is symbolized by the Woman? By reference to the 12th chapter we learn, that the symbol of a Woman is used as an emblem of the Church; therefore we conclude that the Woman seated upon the Beast in the 17th chapter is the same as the "mouth" given to the Beast in the 13th chapter, and the same as the "eyes and mouth" in the little horn of Dan. 7th.

☞ Having read with interest the following excellent tract from the pen of Bro. J. Cummings, and felt my own spirit refreshed by it, I thought, if it were inserted in the Crisis, it would be meat in due season to the household.—ED.

Geo. Storrs' Flat Rock.

A short time ago while I was at Suncook, I had an opportunity of looking over Bro. Paine's old Advent papers, which are so valuable and profitable to examine in these times of peril, while so many are departing from the faith. Among those papers, I found a little sheet, published at New York, Oct. 4, 1844, from which I extract the following, from the pen of Geo. Storrs. Too high an estimate cannot be put upon it. The principles are correct. It is just the position the church must stand upon, when the Master comes. The passing of the time has nothing to do with the position the Church must be found in when the Lord does appear.

If it was necessary that the people of God should stand out with such confidence in 1844, providing the Lord had come, it certainly will be necessary that they stand in such confidence when he does come.—The position cannot be denied; and may the good Master strengthen us to leave all for Christ and his kingdom. Here is the extract:

"How shall we be ready for that day? Believe God's truth, and venture out upon it, by a strong faith that gives glory to God. We must have the same state of mind that we would have if we knew we were to die on that day—the same entire consecration to God, and deadness to the world.

I cannot better illustrate what I mean than to suppose a large flat rock in the midst of the ocean. A promise is made by a glorious and mighty prince, that at a given time he will send a splendid steamer to carry all persons whom he shall find there, with the evidence that they fully credited his word, to a glorious country. Many venture out to the rock. Some, when they are safe on the rock, cut the rope, and their craft with which they came there, drifts away from them, and they look after them no more, but are watching for the arrival of the steam ship. They have no doubt of the truth of the promise, and risk all upon it. Others, who come there, think it is enough that they are on the rock. But they would be "wise and prudent," so they make their craft, or boats, fast to the rock, because, "If the steamer don't come, we shall be without any thing to get to land." Hence, they are going to be prudent, and not to run too great a risk. "According to thy faith be it unto thee," had been sounded before the time the steamer was expected. The day arrives. The prudent ones, it may be, intend to cut their boats loose, and let them float off, if they see the steamer coming. It appears in sight; but now it is too late to let go their boats, without their being discovered: and besides, the same prudence would dictate now that they do not let their boats float away till they are certain that they are not mistaken in the approaching vessel. Now it comes so near, they cannot possibly cut loose without being discovered. What is the evidence that you had implicit confidence in the promise of the arrival of the steamer? Our boats are cut loose, and have floated away from us, so that we could not possibly get to land, and must have perished, if the steamer had not arrived, for it is a rock where no other vessel ever passes. 'This is enough,' cries the Commander of the steam vessel; 'come on board; such confidence shall not be disappointed.' Those who had kept their boats made fast to the rock, now crowd round, and strive to get on board the steamer. The Commander asks, 'What mean these boats I see made fast to the rock yonder, or whose boats have only been cut since I arrived in sight?' They answer, 'we thought we would be prudent, so that if the steamer did not arrive, we might have something to get back to land with.' 'You made provision for the flesh, then,' cries the Commander, 'did you, and so doubted my word? According to thy faith be it unto thee. The evidence is against you. You made provision to return, and now you must reap the fruit of your unbelief.'—'SO THEY COULD NOT ENTER IN, BECAUSE OF UNBELIEF!'—Oh, awful state of despair!

Cut your ropes, now, brethren · let your boats float off out of sight;—yea, make haste before the 'sign of the Son of Man appear.' Then it will be too late. Venture now—and venture all. Oh, my heart is pained for you, while I see you hesitate. Oh, make haste, I beseech you—don't dally—push off that boat, or you are lost; for, 'WHOSOEVER SHALL SEEK TO SAVE HIS LIFE SHALL LOSE IT.' So saith Jesus Christ, our Lord and Judge. Make haste then, once more I entreat you, O MAKE HASTE—let go every boat by which you are now calculating to escape to land 'IF it don't come.' That 'IF' will ruin you. It is now the last trial and temptation. Do as our Lord did with the last temptation of the devil—'Get thee hence, Satan,' said he. 'Then the devil leaveth him, and behold angels came and ministered unto him.' So it will be with you, when you have gained this triumph.

One word to those who would escape with their lives and be received of their Lord when he comes. Stop not to contend with those who hate this doctrine, and wish to reason you out of it. You can do them no good, and they may do you eternal injury. If you find those who are honestly inquiring on the subject, treat them kindly, but especially direct them to God, who only can help them in this late hour. Pray always, and watch continually. The Lord will come and WILL NOT TARRY. My faith is a thousand fold stronger than it was two weeks ago. I feel that it would

"But evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse." —2 Tim. 3: 13.

Darker, still darker, the Christian is praying,
O come, blessed Jesus come quickly and save.
Thy poor scattered exiles in banishment straying,
And loved ones that slumber within the deep grave.

Closer, still closer, God's children are clinging,
To the dear blessed Bible, the unerring guide;
Its depths they are sounding, its bright jewels gleaning,
And dare not, and will not, its righteous tests hide.

Colder, still colder, old time's winds are blowing,
And shud'ring we pass through the world's chilling throng;
Though strong in our bosom the life-flame is glowing,
The flesh oft recoils, while the heart is still warm.

Brighter, still brighter, the pure word is shining;
The lamp, sure prophetical lamp, is lit up;
Its garlands of truth 'round the holy are twining,
And brightening their pathway, all radiant with hope.

Faith and Obedience.

Continued.

As we trace the history of Christ, we are struck with the oft repeated expression, "That the Scriptures might be fulfilled," showing conclusively that "the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." A study of the prophecies was therefore needful in order to understand their development in the life of Christ, and no one, well instructed in these, could have failed in their application. The manner and place of his birth—the time of his manifestation to the world—the miracles which he wrought—his entrance into Jerusalem riding upon a colt—his betrayal by one of his own disciples—the king under whose reign he would be crucified—the piercing of his hands and feet, and side—the offering him vinegar to drink mingled with gall—the division of his garments, and casting lots for his vesture—the crucifixion of the thieves with him—his burial in Joseph's tomb—his resurrection on the third day—and ascension into heaven, all, ALL had been distinctly marked, and was literally accomplished.

But who believed all this evidence?—Who heard him gladly? The pious Pharisees, who made "broad their philacteries," by the number of the passages of the law which they had attached to their garments? Those who made long prayers at the corners of the streets, that they might be heard of men, and sounded a trumpet before them when they gave alms, that they might be seen of men? Those who wore close hoods or bonnets with which to cover their faces, lest they be contaminated by beholding the wickedness around them? Those who loved greetings in the markets, and chose the highest seats in the synagogues, and to be called of men Rabbi? Those who compassed sea and land to make one proselyte to their religion—paid tithes of mint, anise and cummin, but omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy and faith? Those who made clean the outside of the cup and the platter, while within they were full of uncleanness? Those who builded the tombs of the prophets and garnished the sepulchres of the righteous, saying, "If we had lived in the days of our fathers we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets," and yet when God sent unto them wise men, prophets and scribes, yea, and his own Son, they scourged, crucified, stoned and persecuted them from city to city? Were these the men who received the doctrines of Christ? No, they made them void by their tradition. Were these the men who become his disciples? No, they said "we be Moses' disciples, and these men who know not the law are accursed." Were these the men who were convinced by his miracles? No, they said, "He casteth out devils by Beelzebub, the prince of devils. Were these the men who shouted "Hosanna to the Son of David!" when he rode into Jerusalem? No, they said, "We will not have this man to reign over us." Were these the men who endeavored to deliver him from death? No, they said, "Let his blood be on us and on our children." Were these the men who were convinced by his resurrection? No, they bribed the soldiers to say, "His disciples came by night, and stole him away," and then persuaded the governor to believe the story, and secured the life of the soldiers. We repeat the question, Who believed his message? We reply, A few fishermen. Who heard him gladly? "The common people."

Who were they that with great power gave witness to his resurrection? One of those so-called Begging fishermen, who, only a few days before, was heard denying with oaths and curses that he was ever a disciple of the dispised Nazarene. "Poor fellow, at one time he had so much confidence in himself, and his faith was so strong in Jesus of Nazareth being the Son of God, that he strongly affirmed that though all men should forsake him, yet he would prove faithful to him. And at another time he thought he had faith enough to walk on the water; but he soon found he was mistaken; for he began to sink, and would have been drowned for his presumption, if some one had not rescued him. And he was so sure that that Nazarene was the King of the Jews that he went all through the country prehching that the kingdom was at hand, but when that impostor was put to death for his blasphemy, like an honest man he gave it up, and went back to his fishing boat, and that was the best place for him and his brother-fishermen, who, ignoramuses as they were, pretended to know all about the prophecies and the prophetic periods, but it is evident now that they were wise above what was written, for it has all proved a failure, and we were right after all."

Thus we might suppose the haughty Scribes and Pharisees reasoned when they saw Jesus securely laid in the tomb, and the government seal placed upon it; and judge how great must have been their surprise and indignation when the sound reached their ears that Peter, with the rest of the disciples, had again given up their fishing-boats and were engaged in preaching that Christ was alive again, and they had seen and been with him forty days, and that he then went up into heaven.—"Why," say they, to quell the excited feelings of the people, "the very idea is absurd—and have not the soldiers themselves testified that the disciples came at night, when they were asleep, and stole away his body; and now, to conceal their mortification, instead of making an humble confession of their mistake, they have fixed up this fine story about His coming to life, and that He told them before he died that He should be raised from the dead the third day; but they had quite forgotten it until since his resurrection. They will have it that David referred to that when he said, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption;" but it is all perversion—the Psalmist meant himself, for he says expressly, "my soul." This trying to shield themselves from mortification, and cover up their mistakes by taking refuge under prophecy, is extremely inconsistent; and they are so uncharitable too; they accuse us of being the betrayers and murderers of the Son of God, and say that we cannot be saved unless we repent and acknowledge all they have preached to be true. It is very strange that if their Master was raised from the dead and has been with them for forty days that none of us have seen him.—Why, I should have thought that he would have come to us the very first thing, and thus convinced us that he was indeed the Christ. I do not wonder they got up the story that he had gone off into heaven; for they must needs see that we could not admit, for a moment, that he was still on the earth and nobody know anything about it but his followers. We know that God spake unto Moses—we know that he gave us the law from heaven amid the thunderings and lightnings of Sinai—we know that he led our fathers through the wilderness by a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night, and gave them possession of the land of Canaan. We know that God has wrought many miracles for us and given us great victories, and caused us to have a name far above all the nations of the earth. He has promised us a King to reign on David's throne forever in great glory and splendor, and that all the heathen should bow down before us and be our servants. When Christ comes he will do all this for us, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." We think we do not come very far short of the truth, when we suppose that those unbelieving Jews thus reasoned among themselves and endeavored to lead the minds of the people away from those great truths which the disciples were engaged in proclaiming.

THE END.

☞ The above Diagram is designed to illustrate the measurement of time from the rise of the little horn, with eyes and a mouth (the civil power of the Greek Empire, or Eastern Rome incorporated with the Ecclesiastical Power of the Papacy.—Dan. 7: 8) until the coming of Christ at the resurrection of the saints.

The 1290 years, or time, times and the dividing of time, (Dan. 7: 25) measure the period during which the saints, times and laws were to be given into his hand—The period of the saint's tribulation, we understand, were shortened to 1260 years, (Rev. 12: 6, 14—11: 2 and 13: 5); but times and laws were to remain in his hand during 1290 years, extending 30 years beyond the 1260. "But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion to consume and destroy unto the end." 45 years from the close of the 1290 make 1335 years, when Daniel will stand in his lot, which must be at the resurrection of the saints.

Christ, speaking of this desolating power—the papacy—says, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened,"—which marks a point previous to which the saints were taken out of the hands of the little horn power. Thus we perceive that 1260 years of the 1335 ended prior to the 19th of May, 1780, when the sun was darkened. Add 75 years to 1260 and you have 1335 years, which must end before May 19th, 1855, according to the evidence from the darkening of the sun. But we have abundant historical evidence that the papal power, i. e. the abomination that maketh desolate, was set up in 519, hence the 1335 days (years) end in 1854, which brings the coming of the Lord and the resurrection of the saints the present year.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW LEBANON, N. H.

Brother Merriam:—Being separated from my brothers and sisters of the like precious faith, who are looking for that same blessed hope, the glorious appearing of our Savior; it cheers my heart—it brightens my pathway to hear from the little flock scattered up and down in the world, living in the midst of a proud church and surrounded by a wicked world. I feel to thank God for the "Crisis." To me it is like a fountain of water in a dry and thirsty land. I feel like the prophet, that I am surrounded with briers and dwelling in the midst of scorpions, yet I fear no evil; for he that "hath his way in the whirlwind" will not leave nor forsake me till I see him whom my soul loves. Oh, children of the living God, press onwards; we are nearing home—the home of the redeemed, the home of saints and angels. Oh, I long to be there. Cheer up, waiting pilgrim, "the morning cometh and also the night." Yes, the resurrection morning, with its bright glories, is near at hand: "it hasteth greatly." Then those, who now sleep in Jesus, will come forth from their dusty beds;—and we, together with them, shall be caught up to meet the Lord in the air.

But a long dark night awaits the ungodly—a night that knows no morn—no sparkling stars will cheer that gloomy night—no rising sun dispel the darkness. Oh, sinner! if you will not have this man, Christ Jesus, to reign over you, you must die to live no more forever.

Oh, may we, who profess to love the appearing of Christ, be "preserved blameless unto his coming and kingdom."

Your brother, looking for
Jesus this year,
HARRISON M. CULLOCK.

CHARLEMONT, MASS, April 19, 1854.

Bro. Merriam:—It is a solemn thought, that we have entered the last year of time, and faith in God's word, (time given in Daniel) says, this year the sleepers in Christ, must be redeemed from the bondage of the grave; and we that are alive (as St. Paul, has written) be changed.—Yes, this year "we have not followed cunningly devised fables," but the word of God; and we know that will stand: not one jot or tittle of it will fail till all be fulfilled. The kingdoms of this world are numbered, and almost finished; their glory has departed; they are weighed in the balances of truth, and found wanting. The vision is unsealed, and they are now accountable for its light. This Edom (the red land,) is dyed with the blood of Prophets, and Apostles, which has long since cried (like Abel's) from the ground; and their blood will soon be disclosed, and earth no longer cover her slain. And when the dead are raised, great Babylon must come into remembrance, that the Lord may reward her double according to her works; for, "she is drunken with the blood of saints, and the blood of the martyrs of Jesus, and God will give her blood to drink." But the nations of the earth do not know, they will not consider; their visions of peace, and their day dreams of aggrandizement have lulled them into a sleep, from which they will never awake; yea, "they will drink and swallow down, and be as though they had not been." They are already inventing instruments for their own destruction; and as this war will embrace the great mass of mankind, their weapons must be accordingly made for wholesale murder; the shroud must be large enough for a winding sheet for a world. O how would God's children now tremble at the prospect of bloodshed that is before them, were it not for the word; but praise God, we can go to the testimony and read the destiny of this nation, and all the nations of the earth; that a thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee.—"Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the reward of the wicked." And thus we are kept in perfect peace, whose hearts are stayed on God in these perilous times. The position of the church now is truly one of deep interest; it is a trying one, but thank God, it is safe. Millions are now looking upon Zion, saying, "let her be defiled, that our eye may look upon Zion." Yea, they watch for our halting. The disappointment of '44 makes them bold; and the snare is set, and their willful blindness will hide it, for "in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird;" but ah they see not that the scripture's cannot be broken. There must be a tarrying time; bless God, there is but one.—The vision will speak; it will not lie. The Church hold's on to the promise with a trembling hand; but it is the grasp of faith, unyielding faith. She will rise to sink no more. O who would not be a wise vivgin in 1854? She will realize her inheritance this year, and the earth will be fitted up, a home for the redeemed. There has been a general rising and trimming of lamps; and the Church are being purified, and made white and tried. I see it, I feel it, knowledge is increasing, and the watchmen will soon be found seeing eye to eye. The Lord will bring again Zion, as on the day of penticost; and it will be here; there will be no need of watchmen in glory, for it shall be a peaceable habitation; "not one of her stakes shall ever be removed;" nothing shall enter into it "that defileth, or maketh a lie;" no slave ship with oars will sail on that peaceful river, but the redeemed shall walk there. Hallelujah—A few months in the past, I could (like one that was healed gradually, in olden time) see men as trees walking; but while I have searched the scriptures, they have been opened to my understanding; while I have mused the fire has burned, and I can no longer, hold my peace. I must speak that I may be refreshed. I would not ask a clearer position; I would not ask a more sure word of prophecy. How can I stumble with such light? The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him. Now, Brethren, we have tasted of the good word of God, and a little of the power of the world to come; and if we should fall away, we could not be renewed; we should be justly damned. May God help his children, for "the godly man ceaseth, the faithful fail from among the children of men." I know God has done all for his vineyard, that could be done; he is waiting to be gracious; his locks are wet with the dews of the night. He is the way, the truth, and the life." "I pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God."

I still feel thankful to God for the Crisis. O how glad I have been, as I have watched, fearing I should see something hard, cruel, some bitter retort; but thank God, I have watched invain. All is love, the brethren have a mind to work, (not quarrell,) and the wall will be builded. It seems they court peace, by one common consent. As my eye rested on Bro. H. Pratt's article, and many others, I could not help exclaiming,

Welcome, thrice welcome, thou truth-freighted paper,
Which points to a Crisis that surely will come;
A steady flame burns on this love-lighted taper;
Thrice welcome, bright star, to my heart and my home.

From your unworthy sister,
looking for redemption this
year according to the word,
VESTA N. CUDWORTH.

DEEDS CREEK, KOSCIUSKO CO., IND., March 26, 1854.

BRO. MERRIAM:—Your little sheet, entitled "The World's Crisis," has been kindly sent to my address; and I thank you for the favor of perusing some of the evidences of the Lord's near approach. In the fall of, '44, I confidenly expected the coming of the Bridegroom on the 10th day of the 7th month, but, with many others, was sadly disappointed. Since that time, I have been trying to investigate the word of the Lord, and to preach, as I learned from that great source of truth. I have given considerable more attention to the doctrine of life and immortality through Christ alone, than to the study of historical prophecy of late; so that a definite announcement with regard to the coming of the Messiah, demands a careful investigation on my part, with reference to the evidences relied upon for proof. I thought that we could come to no more definite conclusions, than the fulfilment of remaining prophecies, item by item, would warrant; but, I have no disposition to oppose my brethren who look for the Lord this year. Indeed, the more I reflect, the more the conclusion impresses me that the Lord is soon to come. In Rev. 16: 12—15, we have events demonstrative of the near approach of our Lord. The waters of the mystical Euphrates have been evaporating for years, and seem now upon the very point of drying up under the scorching influences now exerted upon them. And the unclean spirits too are gathering the Kings of the earth and of the whole world to the battle of that great day of God Almighty. What voice is addressed to the children of God when these predictions are fulfilling? Let us hear with solemn attention. "Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame." History, Chronology, and signs in both heaven and earth, proclaim with emphasis, "Behold He cometh!" If we survey the professed church, what a spectacle! How like the inspired description See 2 Tim. 3: 1—8. How much iniquity cloaked under a form of godliness! Where then are we! In the last days! What an effort to become rich, and live in pleasure upon the earth. See James 5; 1—8. Where then are we? In the last days! The coming of the Lord draweth nigh! The Judge standeth at the door! What scoffing at the doctrine of Christ's second coming. See 2 Pet. 3. 3, 4.—Where then are we? In the last days! No place is assigned in the "sure word" for the ascendency of democratic principles, that fond delusion of worldly men.—God has given Republicanism a fair trial in these United States. And can any one claim that this form of government, should it become universal, is calculated to meet the necessities of the world? Alas, the iniquities of this government send up a cry like the grievous sins of the cities of the plain for speedy divine intervention! Gen. 18, 19 chs. Wo to our legislators for their iniquitous compromises in that day. No place is found, on the other hand, for another despotism to sway an universal sceptre, and oppress the nations, as the Monarch of the North anticipates. No, a whirlwind sweep over certain countries, into the glorious land, and he falls before him whose right it is to reign. Glory to God, the fifth universal government is not another earthly despotism, not a slave-holding republic, but a glorious Theocracy under the administration of God's Anointed Son. But when does this power stalk with such strides over opposing lands to the glorious holy mountain? At the time of the end, just before Michael stands up, and the resurrection occurs! What days end here? 1335! O glorious hope of the child of God. The dead, who have died in the Lord, now come forth, changed from corruption to incorruption, from mortality to immortality, from weakness to power, from deformity to glory, and from the image of the earthy to the image of the heavenly; while those who are alive and remain, or wait and come to the 1335 days, are changed in a moment, and caught up with them to meet the Lord in the air, to be forever with the Lord. Are the brethren, who send forth the Crisis, correct in adjusting their days viz 1260, 1290, and 1335 to the historical eras of 519, 1779, 1809, and 1854? If so, may we all understand and prepare to meet our Lord in peace, and be found of him, without spot, and blameless. I intend to carefully investigate this subject, and watch the course of events.

Yours, for the Kingdom,
S. A. CHAPLIN.

DIGEDEQUASH, Charlotte Co., Prov. of N. B.

Through the mercy of God, we still live, and are striving to give the last note of warning, as opportunity affords. We spent Sat. Feb. 18th, and Sunday 19th, and Monday 20th, with the friends in Oldtown, Me. We left Oldtown Tuesday 21st for Brewer, where we tried to preach to a small congregation in the evening; next day in company with Elder Reed we held meetings three times. It was truly a solemn and profitable season. On the morrow, Thursday 23d, we left for Hermon in one of the severest snow storms I ever rode in. But through the goodness and mercy of our heavenly Father we arrived in safety at the Pilgrim home of Bro. and Sr. Geo. Brackett. Seldom if ever, more thankful to sit by a comfortable fire side, than on this occasion, and we were glad to rest for one evening. On friday evening we held a prayer meeting in the new Chapel. Saturday the next day, in the afternoon, we preached the first sermon in the Chapel. And on Monday, after trying to break the bread of life to the dear saints twice on Saturday, and three times on Lord's day, we left on Monday afternoon for the Province of New Brunswick.

On Thursday morning somewhat rested, we again set forth, when after a drive of 30 miles we reached Upper Milltown, on the St. Croix river. Crossing over the bridge, we put up for the night on the English side, in Queen Victoria's dominion. The next night we tried to preach in the Bethel meeting house, on the Restitution. The next day, Saturday, March 24, we held a meeting beneath the roof of Malcom M'Farlin, father of Bro. Duncan M'Farlin, of Oldtown, Me. On Sunday, March 5th, we were enabled to set forth the reasons of our hope to an interesting congregation, in the morning, afternoon and evening, also last night in the Baptist meeting house, at the rolling dam on the Digedequash river. Here is a great field, and an open door. The Macedonian Cry is being raised in every direction. O that God in mercy would raise up, qualify and thrust out into the field faithful laborers, in this last moment of time. Thanks and adoration to God; we are nearly through. Every day brings us nearer and nearer the haven of eternal repose. O rest—sweet, sweet rest—never did the lines of Montgomery the poet, breathe a sweeter fulness to my longing heart than now:

"While in this body pent, absent from thee I roam;
Yet nightly pitch my moving tent, a day's march nearer home."

Ere I close I wish to say a few words concerning the church at North Hermon. Their number increased to such an extent within a few months, the school house would not contain the congregation. A request was made to the town for the privilege of enlarging it at the expense of the church, which was disregarded, when they concluded to put up a temporary building; and in 17 days from the time they commenced framing the building, they had a house 32 by 40 feet, enclosed, plastered and seated, with two stoves placed therein.

The language of Nehemiah vi: 16th, came forcibly to my mind, also the latter part of the 6th verse of the iv chapter.—I was forced to the conclusion, at the close of the Lord's day, Feb. 26th, that if they never have the privilege of holding another conference ere they shall be called to their reward, the precious season enjoyed, and the large attentive congregation that had the privilege of hearing on that occasion, were sufficient to amply repay them for their labors of love, in erecting that house. Thus an opportunity of hearing was afforded, which otherwise they never could have enjoyed. God bless them and all the saints scattered abroad, Amen.

Thy Bro. in glorious hope,
S. S. BREWER.

BATH, N. H., March 24, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—I am much interested in the "Crisis," and when I have received one number, I can hardly wait for the next. Ever since the first received, I have felt a desire to write for its columns. I am well aware that I possess but one talent, and that a small one. Duty prompting me, I dare not like that "slothful servant, dig and hide in the earth" that which I have received from God. I bless God, that the sound of the "Midnight Cry" has ever saluted my ears. And my prayer is, that it may be wafted on every breeze; that as many as can, may hear the good news and glad tidings of our coming Lord.—Thanks be to God; "He is nigh, even at the door." Soon He will come in the "clouds of Heaven," and we shall see Him as He is. O, glorious day! O, blessed hope to the saints! My heart bounds with joy when I think that the children of God will soon get home to their Fathers house, to part no more.

We have a little band of Advent believers here in this place; not more than six or eight of us at the most. We have to struggle hard, but the God of Daniel is on our side; and we are not discouraged.—We are looking for better days; and most earnestly pray, that some of the faithful watchmen of Zion may come this way and help us. Brethren, our case is an urgent one. We want to see sinners converted, and backsliders reclaimed. Brother E. Burnham was here last fall; and the bread that was then thrown out upon the waters, we think with an extra effort, might be gathered in.

Any of the brethren coming this way, will please to make a stop at swift-water, Village.

Yours, expecting immortality and never ending rest, in the kingdom of our God,
L. M. COLLINS.

LOUIS NAPOLEON, it seems, is preparing to pounce on Austria in earnest. The Washington Star has private advices which say that Louis Napoleon has distinctly notified the Emperor of Austria, that if he shows the slightest disposition to side with Russia in the war, he (the French Emperor) will raise the standard of revolt in Hungary and Lombardy.

The Great Anti-Christian Power,

AS REPRESENTED BY

DANIEL, CHRIST, PAUL AND JOHN:

BY J. GOUCH

"When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand:)"—Matt. 24: 15.

As symbols are used in Daniel to represent the governments and powers presented in his visions, it will be necessary, in order to ascertain what people are presented as the persecuting organization, to have an interpretation of the symbols.

The four Beasts are declared to be four kings or kingdoms; therefore they represent the people associated in four secular governments. The fourth Beast is interpreted to represent the fourth kingdom; consequently it must be the last in the order of time. These governments are evidently Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece and Rome. As the Roman Beast appears with ten horns, the horns are evidently symbols of something connected with its history. The Angel interprets these horns to represent ten kings (kingdoms) out of this kingdom.

These are represented as existing, not consecutively, but simultaneously; therefore the Roman Empire must be divided into ten contemporary kingdoms. As in the 8th of Dan. the Grecian Beast is represented as having one horn, and this horn is explained to be the first king; this shows that the entire empire was under one government; but when this was "broken, four came up for it," at which time the empire was divided into four governments.—Therefore when the Roman Beast has ten horns, it must be divided into ten governments. But Daniel saw in vision another horn coming up among the ten. From this it appears, that the Roman Empire must be divided into eleven governments. The eleventh horn he represents as being the persecuting power under consideration. From these facts we learn, that the Roman government connected with those "that forsake the holy covenant" in the eleventh of Daniel, was one of the divisions of the Roman Empire, and NOT THE ROMAN EMPIRE IN ITS UNDIVIDED STATE.

As the ten horns represent ten kingdoms, the eleventh horn must also represent a kingdom; for the Angel says, "the ten horns are ten kings, and another shall rise after them." The word, "another," shows that the eleventh is classed with the ten. If I were speaking of beasts, and should say there were ten sheep and another, the eleventh must be of same class with the ten, and therefore a sheep.—Therefore, as the Angel says, "the ten horns are ten kings (kingdoms) and another shall rise after them," the eleventh must be of the same class, and consequently a king, or kingdom.

Therefore it appears, that the eleventh horn must represent the same kind of government represented by the other ten.—Although the prophecy shows it is like the other ten in respect to its class, or kind, yet it is also possessed of distinctive peculiarities. The distinctive characteristics of this symbol are, 1. It appeared more stout (or stronger) than the others. 2. It had organs of vision which the others had not. 3. It had "a mouth speaking great things," which the others had not. 4. It plucked up three of the first horns by the roots. 5. It made war on the saints and wore them out. 6. He shall think to change times and laws.

We now inquire, where did these kingdoms exist?

The horns came out of the fourth Beast, which represents the Roman Empire; consequently the kingdoms must have arisen on the Roman territory. Therefore we may expect to find a kingdom, corresponding to the description of the prophecy, upon the Roman territory, after ten others had arisen.

We learn from history, that as early as the latter part of the fifth century, ten kingdoms had arisen on the territory of Rome. These ten kingdoms, as given by Mede, are 1 Britons, 2 Saxons, 3 Franks, 4 Burgundians, 5 Wisigoths, 6 Sueves, 7 Vandals, 8 Alemanes, 9 Ostrogoths, 10 Greeks.

But the prophecy shows us there would be eleven kingdoms. On turning to history, we find that Dacia was a province of the Roman Empire, and that its territory, at this time, was not occupied by either of the above named governments, but by the Gepidœ, as an independent kingdom.—This completes the number given by the prophet. The principal objection to this arrangement of the ten kingdoms have been adduced in reference to the Alemanni. The objection to considering the Alemanni one of the ten kingdoms is, that they did not retain their kingly form of government and independence sufficiently late in their history to constitute them one of the ten. We do not deny that they had been humbled by the Franks, and that they did not retain their independence as formerly; but still we understand they enjoyed their own government, administered by their own rulers, and were a distinct people until the middle of the sixth century.

Says Gibbon: "But the spirit of a mastial people outstripped the timid counsels of the Court; two brothers, Lothaire and Baccelin, (Leutharius and Batilinas), the dukes of the Alemanni, stood forth as the leaders of the Italian war; and seventy-five thousand Germans descended in the autumn from the Rhetian Alps into the plain of Milan." (Gib. v. 4, p. 276).—Again: "They followed the coast of the Mediterranean and the Adriatic as far as Regium and Otranto, and the extreme lands of Italy were the term of their destructive progress. Buccelin was actuated by ambition, and Lothaire by avarice.—The former aspired to restore the Gothic kingdom; the latter, after a promise to his brother of speedy succors, returned by the same road to deposit his treasure beyond the Alps." (p. 277).

"Baccelin and the greatest part of his army perished on the field of battle in the waters of the Vulturnus, or by the hands of the enraged peasants; but it may seem incredible, that a victory, which no more than five of the Alemanni survived, could be purchased with the loss of fourscore Romans." (p. 279). This battle was fought in A. D. 554.

"The Gallic territories, which were possessed by the Alemanni, became the prize of their conqueror; and the haughty nation, invincible, or rebellious, to the arms of Rome, acknowledged the sovereignty of the Merovingian kings, who graciously permitted them to enjoy their peculiar manners and institutions, under the government of official and at length hereditary dukes. (Gib. v. 3, p. 573).

Says Bishop Newton, in his comments on the kingdoms symbolized in Daniel's prophecy: "By kingdom meaning any government, state or polity in the world, whether monarchy, or Republic, or what form soever."

Taking Bishop Newton's definition of a kingdom, we inquire whether the Alemanni were a kingdom in the first half of the sixth century? Gibbon says: "after they were conquered by Clovis, they enjoyed their own peculiar institutions under the government of official and at length of hereditary dukes." Howell says: "IN THEIR CIVIL GOVERNMENT they conformed themselves much to that of the Franks." Again, speaking of two of their rulers, he says: "they were of vast authority and power amongst the Franks, WHOM INDEED THEY GOVERNED. With these facts before us, can we dispute the idea that they had a government?—Not unless we dispute the testimony of historians. Therefore Newton could call them a kingdom.

Many learned Expositors contend, that the ten kingdoms symbolized by the ten horns, were the first ten which did arise in the Roman territory after the Imperial government was broken. Mede maintains that they had arisen as early as A. D. 456. Newton, in commenting on this prophecy, and quoting from Mede, remarks, that he was so correct in his interpretations, that some supposed him divinely inspired.—Bishop Newton maintained that these ten kingdoms might be found at different periods in the Roman history subsequently to their first developement; therefore he quotes Mede to show that they existed in the fifth century; he shows himself also that they existed in the ninth century, and quotes other authorities to show that they were in existence at still later periods.

Our next object will be to ascertain which of the eleven kingdoms was the kingdom identified in the prophecy as making war on the saints for "a time, times and the dividing of time." We have before alluded to the distinctive characteristics of this little horn, viz.: 1. It is more stout (or strong) than his fellows. 2. It had organs of vision. 3. It had a mouth speaking great things. 4. It plucks up three of the first horns by the roots. 5. It makes war on the saints. 6. It shall think to change times and laws. We now look for these several characteristics; and if we can find one of these eleven kingdoms on the Roman territory, having each and all of the characteristics clearly developed, by which we identify the little horn, it must be the kingdom represented by the symbol: for inasmuch as these distinctive marks are given by the prophet on purpose to designate the power, it follows of course, that there can be no other one possessing those peculiar features, otherwise the distinguishing marks given by the prophet are of no avail. If two of the horns should be found possessing the same characteristics as brought to view by the prophet, the prophetic delineation could be no guide to us in our researches after truth on this subject. Again as this horn is to be stouter than his fellows, i. e. this kingdom stronger than either of the others, it is absolutely impossible that more than one of the kingdoms can correspond to the prophetic description. We therefore conclude, that if we can find which of the eleven was the most powerful kingdom, we can identify the government symbolized by the little horn.

In reference to this point, all history teaches, and those who are informed on the subject admit the fact, that the Grecian kingdom was far more powerful in its fleets and armies, and more extended in its territory, than either of the other kingdoms. But if the Grecian kingdom be the one presented in the prophecy, it follows, by consequence, that it must have all the other characteristics described; and we proceed to inquire, secondly, whether it had properties symbolized by the eyes of the little horn.

2. The term "eyes" in scripture is used in a figurative sense to denote the perception of the mind. As the visual organ gives a distinct idea of the form, colour, magnitude and other properties of objects around us, so the spiritual perceptions of the mind give us a definite idea of the objects pesented in the word of God. Ps. 19: 8, "The commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes." From this passage it appears, that the commandments of God enable us to perceive the various duties devolving on us in the different relations of life. Eph. 1: 18, "The eyes of your understanding being enlightened, that ye may know" (clearly perceive, understand) "what is the hope of His calling; and what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints."—The term "eyes" in this passage denotes the perception of the mind, enabling us through the medium of the word, to obtain a clear and distinctive idea of the objects and blessings of the saints' inheritance. We therefore conclude that God presents "eyes" as a symbol to represent the spiritual discernment which is a prominent characteristic of the Church.

John, in his prophetic visions, saw four beasts representing the Church in four different stages of her history, "full of eyes before and behind," and "within."—As these beasts were full of eyes before and behind and within, eyes represent a prominent characteristic of the Church.—It appears, therefore, that the Church will have a clear understanding of the dealings of God with her in the past, and will perceive the dangers and blessings pointed out on the prophetic chart in the future, and the duties and responsibilities connected with the developement of present truth. Therefore we may expect to find the government referred to professing to understand spiritual things, and establishing them by its government acts. The Greek government not only professed thus to understand spiritual things, (i. e. the faith of the Church,) but also ENFORCED THE SAME UNDERSTANDING (CREED) upon the subjects of the government by legislative enactments.

3. We now inquire what is represented by "a mouth?" We understand it to be a symbol of the instrumentality through which God speaks, or conveys instruction to man. By a reference to Ex. 4: 16, we find, that God declares, that Aaron should be "mouth" for Moses, and Moses should be in the place of God to Aaron; because Aaron became the instrument through which Moses spake to Pharaoh and the people. Therefore any man, or association of men, that speaks for God, may be said to be mouth for God. In accordance with this view, the Lord says to Jeremiah; "If thou take forth the precious from the vile, thou shalt be as my mouth." But when the mouth of this horn speaks, instead of speaking for God, and in harmony with the plan of heaven, it will speak against God, or contrary to the divine economy; i. e. it will teach unscriptural doctrines contrary to the Gospel, which will be established by the enactments of this government; because all the acts presented in the symbol must be governmental acts. On turning to history we find the Greek kingdom, professing to understand the doctrines of the Church, DID ESTABLISH THOSE DOCTRINES AS A RELIGIOUS CREED BY LAW.

4. What is intended by the little horn's plucking up three of the first horns by the roots? The Angel says, by way of explanation, "he shall subdue three kings." Observe, the prophet does not assert, that the three horns shall be broken, which might imply a reduction of their power to a tributary condition, but that they should be "PLUCKED UP BY THE ROOTS," which teaches an entire overthrow and annihilation of the three kingdoms, so that they would not be like the kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar, which had its roots left "with a band of iron and brass," giving an opportunity for a growth and developement of the same power again. By examining history we learn, that the Greek government did subdue three of the ten kingdoms according to the representation of the prophecy: viz.: the Vandals in A. D. 534, the Goths in A. D. 553, and the Alemanni in A. D. 554. The Greek Emperor effected an entire subjugation of those nations, and an extinction of those governments according to the prophecy.

5. This power is to make war on the saints. Any government that wages war on another government, or class of people, does so from the fact that they will not submit to terms of its dictation. As the class of people warred against are Christians, the war is made on them as such, and consequently it must be a religious war waged by an intolerant government. Having already shown that the government, being represented as having eyes and a mouth, would profess to understand divine things, and teach them as the Church of Christ, it is evident it must be an politico-ecclesiastical government. We learn from history, that the Greek government did nationalize the creed of one Church, which it deemed orthodox, incorporating the same into the laws of the empire to the exclusion of all others—that it did throw its shield of protection over one denomination of Christians, as legal worshippers, to the exclusion of other sects upon whom it waged a war of extermination.

6. "He shall think to change times and laws." In what respect does this government change times and laws differently from the others, so that it would become a distinguishing characteristic of the government? By Reference to what has been said above respecting the eyes and mouth of the little horn, it will be seen that this government will profess to understand ecclesiastical affairs, and to establish the same by law; therefore we may expect to find this government changing ecclesiastical laws for the government of the Church by which they changed the times and seasons of worship. We find that the translators of the Septuagint rendered the term, which is translated laws, in the singular number, "law," instead of "laws;" and Prof. Stewart, who was a distinguished Hebraist, explains it as having reference to the divine law. Hence if we can show that the Greek government changed the law of Christ for the government of the Church, it will exactly correspond to the representation of the prophecy. By a reference to 2 Thess. 2, we find, that the "man of sin," (little horn), sitteth in the TEMPLE OF GOD, showing himself that he is God; i. e. he assumes the divine prerogative to legislate for the Church in the place of God. That the Greek kingdom perfectly fulfilled this point in the prophecy we shall prove from history hereafter.

Having ascertained what civil government it was that had intelligence with a class of men who had forsaken the holy covenant, (i. e. an apostate Church,) we now proceed to inquire what particular ecclesiastical organization or Church was referred to in the prophecy. By a reference to Rev. ch. 13, we find a power presented to John symbolized by a Beast coming up out of the sea. We recognize this as the same power presented in the 7th of Daniel under an emblem of the little horn. We so understand it because its characteristics are the same.

1. "There was given unto him a mouth speaking great things." It was not the mouth of a lion, because that has not the organs of speech; but of a man, therefore he says "there was given unto him a mouth." The little horn also had a mouth.

2. The Beast spake "great things"—the horn spake "great things."

3. The Beast spake "blasphemy against God"—the horn spake "great words against the Most High."

4. The Beast "made war with the saints"—the horn "made war with the saints."

5. The Beast overcame the saints—the horn prevailed against them (the saints).

6. The Beast makes war forty and two months—the saints were given into his hand (i. e. they were to be persecuted by the little horn) for time, times and the dividing of time. These characteristics being the same in both, clearly show the identity of the Beast and little horn.

Again in the vision of the 17th chapter of Rev. the same Beast is presented to the eye of John. That this Beast represents the same power is evident from the following considerations:—It was "full of the names of blasphemy"—that of the 13th chapter, "opened his mouth in blasphemy"—it had seven heads and ten horns as had the Beast of the 13th chapter:—it "was drunken with the blood of the saints," while that of the 13th chapter "made war on the saints."

But it may be said the Beast of the 13th chapter "had a mouth given unto it" with which it could speak, while no such thing is affirmed of the beast presented in the 17th chapter. We however find that a Woman was seated upon this Beast possessing both the organs of vision and of speech.

We have found that eyes and a mouth represent prominent characteristics of the Church; we now inquire what is symbolized by the Woman? By reference to the 12th chapter we learn, that the symbol of a Woman is used as an emblem of the Church; therefore we conclude that the Woman seated upon the Beast in the 17th chapter is the same as the "mouth" given to the Beast in the 13th chapter, and the same as the "eyes and mouth" in the little horn of Dan. 7th.

☞ Having read with interest the following excellent tract from the pen of Bro. J. Cummings, and felt my own spirit refreshed by it, I thought, if it were inserted in the Crisis, it would be meat in due season to the household.—ED.

Geo. Storrs' Flat Rock.

A short time ago while I was at Suncook, I had an opportunity of looking over Bro. Paine's old Advent papers, which are so valuable and profitable to examine in these times of peril, while so many are departing from the faith. Among those papers, I found a little sheet, published at New York, Oct. 4, 1844, from which I extract the following, from the pen of Geo. Storrs. Too high an estimate cannot be put upon it. The principles are correct. It is just the position the church must stand upon, when the Master comes. The passing of the time has nothing to do with the position the Church must be found in when the Lord does appear.

If it was necessary that the people of God should stand out with such confidence in 1844, providing the Lord had come, it certainly will be necessary that they stand in such confidence when he does come.—The position cannot be denied; and may the good Master strengthen us to leave all for Christ and his kingdom. Here is the extract:

"How shall we be ready for that day? Believe God's truth, and venture out upon it, by a strong faith that gives glory to God. We must have the same state of mind that we would have if we knew we were to die on that day—the same entire consecration to God, and deadness to the world.

I cannot better illustrate what I mean than to suppose a large flat rock in the midst of the ocean. A promise is made by a glorious and mighty prince, that at a given time he will send a splendid steamer to carry all persons whom he shall find there, with the evidence that they fully credited his word, to a glorious country. Many venture out to the rock. Some, when they are safe on the rock, cut the rope, and their craft with which they came there, drifts away from them, and they look after them no more, but are watching for the arrival of the steam ship. They have no doubt of the truth of the promise, and risk all upon it. Others, who come there, think it is enough that they are on the rock. But they would be "wise and prudent," so they make their craft, or boats, fast to the rock, because, "If the steamer don't come, we shall be without any thing to get to land." Hence, they are going to be prudent, and not to run too great a risk. "According to thy faith be it unto thee," had been sounded before the time the steamer was expected. The day arrives. The prudent ones, it may be, intend to cut their boats loose, and let them float off, if they see the steamer coming. It appears in sight; but now it is too late to let go their boats, without their being discovered: and besides, the same prudence would dictate now that they do not let their boats float away till they are certain that they are not mistaken in the approaching vessel. Now it comes so near, they cannot possibly cut loose without being discovered. What is the evidence that you had implicit confidence in the promise of the arrival of the steamer? Our boats are cut loose, and have floated away from us, so that we could not possibly get to land, and must have perished, if the steamer had not arrived, for it is a rock where no other vessel ever passes. 'This is enough,' cries the Commander of the steam vessel; 'come on board; such confidence shall not be disappointed.' Those who had kept their boats made fast to the rock, now crowd round, and strive to get on board the steamer. The Commander asks, 'What mean these boats I see made fast to the rock yonder, or whose boats have only been cut since I arrived in sight?' They answer, 'we thought we would be prudent, so that if the steamer did not arrive, we might have something to get back to land with.' 'You made provision for the flesh, then,' cries the Commander, 'did you, and so doubted my word? According to thy faith be it unto thee. The evidence is against you. You made provision to return, and now you must reap the fruit of your unbelief.'—'SO THEY COULD NOT ENTER IN, BECAUSE OF UNBELIEF!'—Oh, awful state of despair!

Cut your ropes, now, brethren: let your boats float off out of sight;—yea, make haste before the 'sign of the Son of Man appear.' Then it will be too late. Venture now—and venture all. Oh, my heart is pained for you, while I see you hesitate. Oh, make haste, I beseech you—don't dally—push off that boat, or you are lost; for, 'WHOSOEVER SHALL SEEK TO SAVE HIS LIFE SHALL LOSE IT.' So saith Jesus Christ, our Lord and Judge. Make haste then, once more I entreat you, O MAKE HASTE—let go every boat by which you are now calculating to escape to land 'IF it don't come.' That 'IF' will ruin you. It is now the last trial and temptation. Do as our Lord did with the last temptation of the devil—'Get thee hence, Satan,' said he. 'Then the devil leaveth him, and behold angels came and ministered unto him.' So it will be with you, when you have gained this triumph.

One word to those who would escape with their lives and be received of their Lord when he comes. Stop not to contend with those who hate this doctrine, and wish to reason you out of it. You can do them no good, and they may do you eternal injury. If you find those who are honestly inquiring on the subject, treat them kindly, but especially direct them to God, who only can help them in this late hour. Pray always, and watch continually. The Lord will come and WILL NOT TARRY. My faith is a thousand fold stronger than it was two weeks ago. I feel that it would be a sin for me to doubt or indulge in an if, for one moment. I am forbidden, by the Spirit of God, to do so. I cannot do this great wickedness and sin against God. I dare not do it.

To God and the word of His grace I commend you. Farewell, till we meet in the kingdom of God."

We intended to give the remainder of this valuable tract, but for want of room must refer our readers to the tract itself.

The World's Crisis.

LOWELL, MAY 10, 1854.

Exposition of Rev. 10.

Concluded.

In giving an exposition of this ch. it has been necessary to take in a part of the succeeding ch. in order to trace the subject through. I now proceed to remark in reference to the worship brought to view in 1 and 2 vs. of the 11th ch.

If under the old dispensation the daily sacrifice was the temple-worship, we inquire next what it is under the new dispensation? As we are under a new economy, the mode of worship is entirely changed. Henceforth we have not the mosaic ritual, the daily offerings of lambs, and of bullocks, and of goats; the various ordinances of the temple-service have given place to those religious ordinances of God's house which have respect to the hidden life, and the affairs of the heart. The services of the priesthood are exchanged for the ministrations of the sanctuary of a spiritual nature — the offerings on the brazen altar are made powerless by the offering of the one great antetypical sacrifice, and henceforth they are superceded by the spiritual sacrifices of God's people. Says Jesus: "The hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem worship the Father." Again, "the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth," (John 4: 21, 23). The former sanctuary upon mount Moriah is no longer a place of concentration for the worship of Jehovah; but wherever men possess the spirit of the living God, there the worship of God is maintained.

The Levitical priesthood has passed away; and "the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law;" and the law or covenant being changed, the rites and ceremonies of the Mosaic ritual are changed, and thus the whole economy undergoes an entire transition. Our great High-priest has "not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true, but into heaven itself; now to appear in the presence of God for us." The common priests do not present their sacrifices on the brazen altar, but, says Peter: "Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." Again: "For we have an altar whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle."

Says the Apostle, (Heb. 13: 15, 16), "By him therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips giving thanks to his name. But to do good and to communicate forget not: for with such sacrifices God is well pleased." Says Barnes in reference to the changing of times and laws, by the "little horn," "The kind of jurisdiction, therefore, referred to in this place, would be that which would pertain to the laws and institutions of religion." Therefore as under the new covenant God puts His laws into the minds of His people, and writes them in their hearts, instead of requiring those outward ceremonies and offerings which were instituted under the Jewish economy, it follows, that when the little horn power changes "the institutions of religion," i. e. the law of God for the government of the Church, "the daily sacrifice" is "taken away."

It is evident from these passages that under the Christian dispensation a new order of priesthood arises, the temple has no longer a definite and permanent locality, the altar is changed, the sacrifices are changed, and an entirely different system of religious worship is introduced; so that taking away the daily sacrifice, is a suppression of divine worship, as it is instituted in the Gospel age.

Once more: "Arms shall stand on his part, (an host was given him against the daily sacrifice,) and they shall POLLUTE the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice." Thus by the arms, or military power of this desolating government, the daily sacrifice was to be taken away. Can any one believe that the arms of Rome polluted the metropolis of the Empire by the abolition of heathen sacrifices, and the introduction of Christianity? The whole representation of this subject is so entirely contrary to the idea of the daily sacrifice being heathen worship, that I hardly know how it could have been entertained, for a moment, except that the Lord would have His word fulfilled by the tarrying of the vision. There must be some occasion of the mistake when the virgins go forth to meet the Bridegroom; and this seems to be the very point in respect to which Bro. Miller's eyes were holden from seeing the truth. Had he regarded the daily sacrifice as the true worship of God, it is difficult to conceive how he could have reckoned the 2300 days from the 7th of Artaxerxes, B. C. 457. But understanding the daily, as we now do, to be the true worship of God, which was put down by law in A. D. 519, we take the decree issued in the 20th of Artaxerxes.

In measuring the second time, the Angel gives specific direction to John, who personates the Church, how to measure. He also teaches him to avoid the error of measuring false worship instead of the true. The first command is to "rise."— This is not inappropriate to the sleepy condition of the virgins. "Then all those virgins arose and trimmed their lamps"— searched the word to find the measurement of the prophetic periods. The Angel then directs John to "measure the TEMPLE OF GOD" Bro. Miller measured from the time that the sacrifices of heathen temples were abolished; but the Angel gives specific instruction to John, at the second prophesying, to "measure the temple of God, and the altar, and them that worship therein;" or more literally, the altar, and the worshippers in it, i. e. in the temple. The altar, therefore, where the daily sacrifice is to be found, is in the temple of God, instead of the temples of the heathen, and the worshippers are not pagans, but genuine worshippers. How remarkably the Angel points out the distinction to be made on the second movement by the Advent host, between true and false worship, or between Christianity and idolatry; as if it were not enough to give the appropriate directions, he proceeds to point out the error of the former calculation.

V. 2. "But the court, which is without the temple, leave out, (Greek, throw out, reject) implying, it would seem, that it had been measured, but now must be rejected. "For it is given unto the Gentiles," (idolatrous worshippers,) "and the HOLY CITY shall they tread under foot forty and two months." It was not the treading down or polluting pagan Rome; but the treading down of the true Church by an apostate Church incorporated with the state, for forty and two months, or 1260 days, (years). Thus we are cautioned not to measure the abolition of pagan worship, but of the true worship of God—not the taking away of heathen sacrifices, but of Christian sacrifices—not the polluting or treading down of pagan Rome, but THE HOLY CITY, or Church of Christ.

Whether the fact be admitted or not, that the second movement of the Adventists, as they are now going out to meet the Bridgroom in 1854, is shadowed forth by these symbols of Rev. it is certainly an undeniable fact, that the movement corresponds to the scenic representation of the 10th and 11th chapters of Rev. Bro. Miller commenced his measurement of time in reference to the rise of the little horn of Dan. 9th with the overthrow of paganism, as preparing the way for the rise of papacy; but we now reckon from the suppression of Christian worship under Justin;—he measured from the time the sanctuary of Rome was polluted, we measure from the time when the temple of God (the Church) was polluted by idolatrous or Catholic worship—he measured from the treading down of paganism in heathen Rome, we measure from the treading down of evangelical truth and pure Christian worship in the holy city or Church.

Now, if we have the right idea of the daily sacrifice, it is perfectly obvious, that when true Christian worship is suppressed, "the abomination that maketh desolate" stands in the holy place, or in other words, when evangelical sects were persecuted by the Catholic power, the man of sin had taken his seat in the temple of God, and the Woman, that was to be drunken with the blood of the saints and the martyrs of Jesus, was already seated on the Beast.— The very act of placing the abomination that maketh desolate, displaces the daily sacrifice, or genuine worship of God; therefore there can be no period of time between the taking away of the daily sacrifice and the establishment of the abomination; the two events are necessarily synchronous, dating from one and the same point.

Who can but adore the wisdom of the infinite God? "O the depths of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out!"— The world by human wisdom knew not God. Said Jesus, "I thank thee, Father, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent," (of this world) "and hast revealed them unto babes," (in Christ). Such are the principles of the divine economy that the depths of infinite wisdom are not to be fathomed by the lead and line of human knowledge; it requires a divine cord to take soundings in such a boundless ocean. It is God alone that unfolds to view the glories of the divine administration; and as the heavenly panorama opens to the enraptured vision of the saints, how bright it shines! how resplendent with heaven's wisdom! what boundless riches of grace! what overflowing fulness of love! O glory to our heavenly King. It is all of grace. Grace laid the foundation —grace reared the pillars—and grace will raise the top-stone. But O what surpassing grace, that the humblest worms of the dust should be honored with His confidence, and initiated into the secrets of His government—into the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven. Yes, that pure, exalted, glorious kingdom of God—that the poor of this life—the outcasts of this world should be thus exalted to a near and hallowed relation—to a blessed and intimate communion with the King of kings, and the Lord of lords. All glory to Immanuel —ever blessed be the name of the Prince of peace. Before the outburst of that sacred anthem from the entire company of the redeemed, let us now begin to sing triumphant songs, to raise high our hallelujahs of thanksgiving and praise unto Him who hath redeemed us by His own blood, and "made us kings and priests unto God."

And O, beloved Brethren and Sisters, the soul thrilling thought, that the opening glories of that day are so soon to be realized! How blessed to think that we have had the privilege of foreseeing the dawn of that day—that we are identified with the little flock, the humble few that are fulfilling the word, and walking out on present truth, and depending on God for wisdom to understand.

Let us forever have done with all harsh, acrimonious, or denunciatory feeling, possessing the meekness of the dove, the tenderness of the lamb, the humility of the child; that our enemies, having no evil thing to say of us, may be constrained to say, Jesus' spirit is our spirit—that Israel's God is our God—that the gospel code is our law—and that Heaven's glory is our prospective inheritance. Let us in meekness instruct those who oppose themselves against us, that they may be won by our conversation and attracted by our Christlike deportment. It is true some need the rod of admonition, but that too should be administered with a tearful eye and a feeling heart.

We have seen the signs that were to appear in the last generation of the gospel age—the darkening of the sun and moon —the falling of the stars, &c., which were to be the immediate precursors of His coming and kingdom. We have seen the four Angels holding the four winds of war, that the heaving billows of the political ocean might sink into a calm, and rest while the seal of heaven is placed on the radiant brow of the saints, while they receive the impress of the kingdom as heirs of the eternal inheritance. While thus the record on high of "the Church of the first born" has been filling up, the record on earth of those who have their portion in a burning world has also been filling up; and now as the four Angels are about letting go, and the earth's legions are arming for the conflict, and marching to the scene of action, and some of them are already wheeling into line of battle, O who can sing loud enough the praises of Him who has opened our eyes to see the gathering for the great day, as the eyes of the prophet's servant was opened to see the horses and chariots of fire with which the mountain was filled. Just at this critical moment—this season of peril to the Church—this hour of temptation that has come on all the world to try them—to have the pillar of light point the way to Canaan—to hear the voice of the good Shepherd, who cares for the flock, saying unto us, "this is the way; walk ye in it," O who can be sufficiently grateful for such distinguishing favors of heaven? Who can estimate the value of that grace that enables us to prophesy, as it were, "concerning many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings."

Not only have we felt the movement of the nations, but also the movement of the virgins. There has been a spirit somewhat like that which actuated the prophets when they searched diligently—applied all the powers of their being to understand "what, or what manner of time, the spirit which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory which should follow."— There has been a trimming of lamps, an investigation of the word in relation to the time of the Redeemer's coming; and we believe in regard to the prophetic periods, it may be said, the wise understand. We We are now applying the measuring rod agreeably to the instructions of the Angel; and if so, the calculations cannot fail. At the end the vision will speak, and not lie. "In your days, O rebellious house, will I say the word, and will perform it, with the Lord of hosts." If we have been through the tarrying of the vision, and this announcement is, as we believe, the midnight cry, there can be no farther delay of the Bridegroom; and if this is the second time of prophesying, there can be no failure again. The scripture has been fulfilled, the disappointment and delay have come, the proverb that the days are prolonged has prevailed throughout the land of Israel, and now the voice of God is heard in thunder tones among the nations, "the Lord of hosts mustereth the host of the battle." God speaks—the nations move —the Shepherd's voice is heard by the flock—the virgins cry aloud, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh." Let us, dear readers, go out to meet Him by faith and submission to His will. "Prepare to meet thy God."

Ptolemy's Canon.

As an appendage to the article on the Prophetic periods, it may be remarked that inspiration has given us a Chronology from the Creation, to the end of the Babylonish captivity; and it has been so fully illustrated by distinguished Chronologers, that there is but little doubt of the accuracy of it; but when we arrive at the restoration of Judah and Jerusalem, inspiration almost wholly fails us, and the most knowing inquirers, (says Mr Prince,) "were in perpetual strife till A. D. 1613, when the mathematical Canon of Claudius Ptolemy was happily discovered entire, in England; (which was drawn from the records of the Chaldean and Egyptian historians, and astronomers,) which was received with great joy by the learned world; and soon became the decisive umpire among Chronologers; to which they have therefore almost ever since appealed, as to an uncontested oracle." "It begins with the reign of Nabonnassar, king of Babylon, Feb. 26th, B. C., 747, accounts by Egyptian years of 365 days continually, without intercallations, reaches down through the reigns of the Babylonian, Persian, Grecian, Egyptian, and Roman monarchs, to the reign of Adrian, A. D. 137." Such is the description which Mr Prince gave of the Canon of Ptolemy, and we find a similar description of it by all Chronologers, who adopt it as a test to which all things must bow. As the Canon is, and has been, for more than 200 years, the standard on which our Chronologers have based their computations of the reigns of the Persian kings, and as the foregoing article on the Periods, has in one point, (viz., the 20th year of Artaxerxes,) deviated from that standard, it will be expected that some reasons will be given why a subject founded on mathematical principles, should be rejected to give place to a more favorite view of the subject, unless it can be substantiated by a presentation of facts, that are capable of supporting it; and if such facts exist, the public are entitled to them. I am aware that the learned world are generally satisfied with the accuracy of Ptolemy's Canon; I have never seen but one man who doubted it, and that man was a graduate of Harvard University, and has for more than twenty years been a teacher of the liberal sciences. This man had doubts, but he never, to my knowledge, expressed wherein. I knew the Periods of Daniel's vision of 2300 days could never have been fulfilled, according to our translation, if the Canon of Ptolemy was right; and this led me to search with untiring effort, to find wherein it was false; and by the grace and assistance of a holy God, I have found it.

I would not differ from such men as Archbishop Usher, Sir Isaac Newton, Calvisius, Petavius, Marsham, Prideaux, Cary, Whiston, Gregory, Clark, Hales, and a host of other illustrious Chronologers, both ancient and modern; I say I would not differ from the views of those great men, did not truth present itself in such glowing colors, that I cannot resist it.

I feel like nothing before these men, whom I esteem as some of the greatest the world ever produced; and had I not truth, and God himself, to support me, I should quail before such men as these: but God is able to wield His truth, even through unskilful hands, to the conviction of even such men as these; and make it subservient to his glory: and though truth requires me to present what those great men overlooked, all will see that a state of antagonism with such men, is far from being a desirable position; for if they have passed off this stage of action, their characters live, not only in the memory of friends, and the records of nations, but in their successors.

In presenting the facts which sustain the position that we have taken against the integrity, and validity of the canon of Ptolemy, it must be expected that we shall descend to niceties, which to a careless observer would perhaps look trivial: but we shall endeavor to present them in the most simple and undisguised manner, that all capacities may have the clearest light possible to discern that Ptolemy has crowded his computations with one superfluous year, between the seventh year of Cambyses, B. C., 523: and the thirteenth year of Darius Nothus, B. C. 412: and although it is supposed to be mathematical, it is "falsely so called." I shall have occasion to refer to, and quote from, "Prince's Chronology of New England;" and "Bliss' Analysis of Sacred Chronology," and perhaps others. I shall first shew by astronomical records, that at the end of thirty-two years, he overreached his mark, which was only a part of a year at the first bound; second, that it became a year too much, at the second bound, forty-five years afterwards; third, that it continued a year ahead, thirty-four years. These are our bounds: the 1st is the 7th year of Cambyses, when an eclipse occurred July 17th, B. C. 523: 2d, at another eclipse in the thirty-first year of Darius Hystaspes, April 25th, B. C. 491; 3d, the 20th year of Artaxerxes, which Ptolemy calls B. C. 445, which I think I shall be able to shew is one whole year ahead of the true date; and that inspiration will enlighten us some, at this date; and 4th, the thirteenth year of Darius Nothus, which Ptolemy says commenced B. C. 411, I shall shew by History, and historic synchronisms, that it began in the summer of B. C. 412: and then shew that prophecy requires that limits be fixed at these dates. It has been asserted that "the 20th year of Artaxerxes was fixed in B. C. 445, by the concurrence of more than 20 eclipses;" but by these very eclipses, we can prove that the 20th year of Artaxerxes nearly synchronized with B. C. 446; and that it began in the latter part of B. C. 447. The learned world have supposed that Claudius Ptolemy, (being a mathematician of great celebrity,) was undoubtedly right; it was indeed considered as a self-evident fact, on which no doubts were even allowed to be admitted. In the prosecution of this question the one sole object of our heart is to elicit truth, and let the world know that the prophecies of God, especially the vision of Daniel, can at each Period be fulfilled, in the exact order which unalterable prophecy has arranged them; without a deviation from our present translation.

It is known by all men who have common intellect, that any particular remarkable record made in a given year of any king's reign, marks that identical year of his reign. The question is not what year B. C. or A. D. an eclipse of such description did occur, for that can be ascertained at any time, astronomically: but it is what year of a king's reign, did an eclipse occur, of such and such quantities of digits eclipsed, what months, and days of the month, and whether Solar, or Lunar?— Such a description of an eclipse truthfully recorded, would fix the date of that year of any king's reign, with absolute certainty: there would be no room left for one doubt about it; but it must come within the given year, (which it marks) of that king's personal reign. For instance, Should a remarkable celestial phenomenon, such as a total eclipse of the sun, transpire in the fifth year of the reign of Queen Victoria, on the 1st day of May, we have only to ascertain by the calculations of Astronomy, what year of the Era, or of the world, that eclipse happened; and we should instantly see when she began to reign. But if the reign of a predecessor however short, should be added, and computed with the years of her reign, all must see at once, that it would disarrange the years of her personal reign: and this is the foundation of our argument against the canon of Ptolemy; he has put the reigns of three Monarchs together, the two former of which were so short, that by compounding them together, and commencing them precisely at the date which the latter began to reign, of course the eclipses, (as the whole reign is ascribed to the latter,) would fall in the same years of the component reign, as they are recorded in the personal reign, and this is the reason why the fallacy of this Canon has not been discovered. All must see too, that the Era is overcarried just as much time as is allowed to the two preceding monarchs; for if their time is no more than six months, as it is begun at the true date of the latter monarch's personal reign, it must be carried six months beyond the end of his personal reign; thus adding six months at the end, which ought to have been put in before the beginning. So much for overdriving. I shall now proceed to give a table of each of the years as they are reckened in the canon of Ptolemy, from the seventh year of Cambyses, B. C. 523, to the thirteenth year of Darius Nothus, which he calls B. C. 411, and shew its faults; after reducing the Nabonnasarian years, to solar years; which after the first reduction it will be necessary to do at the beginning of each king's reign; but first give a quotation or two, from Prince, and Bliss, both of whom invariably follow the canon of Ptolemy.

Prince says, "Cambyses reigned eight years," (Page 35th, Chron. New Eng.) Bliss says, (page 143, Anal. Sac. Chron.) "In the Canon of Ptolemy eight years are allowed for the reign of Cambyses; but according to Herodotus, they included the seven months of his successor, Smerdis Magus; of which no account is made in the canon.

On the same page he says, "Smerdis was succeeded by two conspirators, Maraphis, and Artaphrenes, who continued but about six months, which is included in the reign of Darius Hystaspes, the next Persian king.

Jan. 2d, B. C. 523, Cambyses' seventh year began, and there is a Lunar eclipse recorded, which occurred July 17th, same year. (Bliss' Anal.) Jan. 2, B. C. 522, Cambyses' eighth year, (according to Ptolemy) begins. Jan. 1st, B. C. 521, Maraphis and Artaphrenes, the two conspirators begin to reign, who are slain at the end of six months, and Darius Hystaspes succeeds, who, says, Ptolemy, with the conspirators, reigned 36 years. Now it will be seen that Ptolemy begins to crowd his computations; for Jan. 1st is the true date where Darius began personally to reign, as will soon be seen; but here, where the six months ought to end, Ptolemy begins them; and thus carries the beginning of his sole reign, to July 1st, B. C. 521.

Darius Hystaspes 36 years.
Jan. 1, Conspirators begin.
July 1, Darius personal.

411.	13,	Here Aug. 7th Darius' 13th year begins.

I shall now make a few more quotations from Bliss, (Anal. Sac. Chron.) On page 152 he says, "Artaxerxes Longimanus, according to Prideaux, was succeeded by his son Xerxes, who was murdered at the end of forty-five days by his brother Sogdianus, who in turn was put to death by his brother Ochus, having reigned but six months and fifteen days. The two brothers having reigned less than a year, their time is included in Ptolemy's Canon, in that of Ochus. This prince changed his name to Darius, and is called by historians, Darius Nothus. His reign, including that of his brothers, according to the Canon of Ptolemy, continued 19 years, "to B. C. 404."

Again I quote from pages 24th and 25th, (Anal. Sac. Chron.) 1. 'Thucydides, b. 8, had preserved a curious original document, in the third treaty of peace between Tissaphernes and Peloponnesians, beginning with its date: 'In the 13th year of the reign of Darius (11. Nothus) &c. This treaty it appears from history, was made in winter, in the 20th year of the Peloponnesian war, which began in the spring, B. C. 431; and consequently the 20th year in winter, was the beginning of the Julian year, B. C. 410; which added to the 13 years of Darius, or 337th of the era, gives its commencement, B. C. 747." The treaty mentioned above, which was agreed upon by Tissaphernes a lieutenant of the king of Persia, and the Peloponnessians, is likewise mentioned by Sir W. Raleigh, who also says it was made in the 20th year of the Peloponnessian war.—Now it will be seen that if this treaty was made in the 20th year of the Peloponnessian war, and 337th of the era of Nabonassar, it could not (as Ptolemy computes years) be made in the 13th year of the personal reign of Darius Nothus: for he begins the reigns of the two brothers, Xerxes and Sogdianus, Dec. 7th, B. C. 423, and consequently after they had reigned eight months, it would carry the beginning of Darius' personal reign, to Aug. 7th, 423 B. C., and the era of Nabonassar falls back to begin with the solar year. In order that all may understand, I will give a table of the years of the Peloponessian war as far as the 20th, and the corresponding years of the era of Nabonassar.

☞ The storm of last week seems to have been very extensive and almost unparalleled for the quantity of rain, violence of the wind, &c., in many places. In the City of New York it rained 66 hours without intermission and much of that time it is said in torrents.

We cut the following items from the Lowell Journal:

The Storm was not confined to this vicinity, but swept over every part of the country which has since been heard from. On Wednesday it was very severe at Washington and Baltimore, and in the latter city a man was killed by lightning. On Wednesday and Thursday a furious gale swept over the great lakes, capsizing and wrecking vessels and destroying life. At Chicago, seven schooners are reported wrecked, with four lives lost. Disasters are also reported at Buffalo and Milwaukie. At Detroit the storm was accompanied with rain and hail, and it is reported as the most severe gale that has visited that section for several years. Mr Nicholas (of the firm of Nicholas & LeFavour) was struck on the head by one of the signs on the store, which was blown down, and his skull was fractured and one of his thighs broken. A despatch from Cincinnati of the 29th states that snow had fallen two inches deep sixty miles north of that city. In Philadelphia the storm is represented as one of the most severe which was ever seen in that region—several buildings were struck by lightning, and many persons were injured. The Hartford papers of Saturday mention a great flood upon the Connecticut, with the prospect that the water would rise as high there as it has ever risen before. In New York several buildings were unroofed and blown down, and many vessels received injury. The roof and upper story of the American candle manufactory in Brooklyn were blown off, and two hands very severely injured.

The Freshet in the Valley of the Connecticut has proved the greatest on record—Hartford being inundated—Colt's pistol factory badly damaged—part of Springfield overflowed—immense damage and distress along the river banks—Windsor Locks washed away—railroad tracks completely destroyed, etc. etc. In Hartford the damage to property is very heavy, involving much suffering to the poor people that have been driven from their homes. The Mayor has ordered the public buildings of the city to be thrown open for their use, and also ordered out boats to rescue such as are in danger.

Foreign.

Additional from Europe. In addition to the foreign intelligence received by the Pacific, which we laid before our readers on yesterday, we have the following items:—The Baltic was opening from ice, and had already become navigable. The French squadron that has sailed from Brest, under Admiral Deschives, to reinforce Napier in the Baltic, is composed of the line-of-battle ships Inflexible, Jemappes, Tage, Breslau, and frigates Darien, Poursuivante and Semillante. Napier's fleet now musters thirty-seven sail, carrying eighteen hundred guns, and over eighteen thousand men. Napier's fleet had taken five Russian prizes with a number of prisoners. The prizes were loaded with sulphur and other articles contraband of war. Napier's fleet had advanced up the Baltic—bound, it is said, for Helsingfors. The Russians had committed great atrocities before leaving Aland.—Seven merchant prizes are in the hands of the British at Kioge Bay. The Danish ministry still remained in power.

Vienna, April 10. The state of siege will be raised in Hungary, the Servian Woywodate, the Branat Galicia, Cracow, and Bukowina, after the 1st of May. This is official. It is rumored, in well-informed quarters, that Austria proposes to Prussia to consider the passage of the Danube a casus belli.

One mode of defending the entrance of Cronstadt is new and dangerous. Strong iron chests, charged with powder and other combustible materials, are sunk in the channel, and connected by wires to a galvanic battery.—Above the chests is some machinery, which, on being touched by the keel of a passing vessel, completes the galvanic circuit, and explodes the mine. A hundred of these dangerous inventions are sunk in the narrow entrance to Cronstadt.

The War on the Danube.—Vienna, April 13. The late accounts state that numerous skirmishes of a very sanguinary character take place along the line of the Danube. The national antipathies have reached their extreme point. Prince Gortschakoff is about to move from Bucharest, on the Danube.

Vienna, April 14. The Russians are entrenching themseves at Hirsova. As Omar Pasha has issued orders to the troops occupying the second or Balkan line of defence, to begin their march towards the Danube on the 10th, it is supposed tha some positive assurances relative to the arrival of the allies must have reached him.

Orsova, April 9. Extreme activity prevails among the Turks, and it is believed that important events will occur about the 20th. 8000 Russians attempted to storm Rassova, but were repulsed. On April 2d the attack was renewed. 7500 men had been landed to reinforce Varna. It was further rumored that the Turks had taken Turna, and advancing in rear of the Russians.

Victory in the Caucasus. The English steamer Sampson, which had been surveying on the coast of Circassia, returned to Constantinople March 21st, bringing tidings of a complete victory gained by the Circassians over the Russians. The Circassian coast is at present free from the enemy.

Constantinople, April 6. The whole fleet is now in the Black Sea. 3000 Greeks have embarked precipitately in order to leave Turkey. Trade is at a stand still.

Odessa, April 8. The combined fleets blockade Odessa. A private despatch states that Odessa was taken on the 14th, but this is doubtful.

Paris, April 18. Advices have been received here by telegraph from Constantinople to the 10th of April. Varna, which was only defended by six thousand men, has asked for reinforcements from the combined fleets.

Kalafat is again full of men, the present garrison numbering 40,000. The Turkish camp was healthy; provisions were abundant. On the 6th April, the Anglo-French declaration of war against Russia was read to the troops at Kalafat, and was saluted with a hundred salvos of artillery and three rounds of musketry. The news of the declaration of war created immense excitement at Bucharest.

Fifteen thousand troops were daily expected at Constantinople from Egypt, who will immediately on arrival be forwarded to Baroum, under the escort of English and French steamers. Some excitement was manifested at Constantinople, and the new Mufti was insulted, April 3d. Lord Stratford had addressed to the British Consuls a circular condemning the Greek insurrection.

The Very Latest.—Liverpool, April 19. It is confirmed that the Russians entered Servia.—A force crossed on the 15th, and entered Turna. The important fortress of Tchaking, in Lower Wallachia, was destroyed by accidental fire, together with all the Russian stores, &c.—The Russians were threatening to cross at a higher point up the river.

LATER—ARRIVAL OF THE AFRICA.

Richardson Bros., agents of the City of Glasgow, say they are not afraid she is lost, that the ship was perfectly efficient, had water for 40 days and a distilling apparatus, with provisions for 65 days. She took out 373 passengers.

A treaty of closer alliance is ratified between France and England.

The expulsion of the Greeks was rigorously enforced. The Greek Insurrection had asumed a shape of guerrilla warfare, but was not formidable. Lord Statford de Redcliffe had published a strong manifesto against the Greek Government for favoring the insurrection. A massacre of the Greeks at Volo was reported, but doubtful.

Accounts are still vague respecting the violation of the Servian territory. Prince Daniel is said to have summoned the Montenegrins to arms against the Turks. The campaign in Asia was expected to be opened about the middle of April. There was no news of any importance in France or England.

Count Nesselrode's circular favors the Greek insurgents.

Berlin, Friday.—Yesterday an alliance offensive and defensive between Austria and Prussia was signed by Baron Mantemet on the one side, and Baron Hess and Count Thune on the other. It is asserted from Copenhagen that Sweden has positively entered into a secret treaty with Russia, by which an obsolete enactment, forbidding more than four ships at one time to enter an harbor, has been restored, and the same extended to Norway.

Paris, Friday.—A despatch from Omar Pacha confirms the previous accounts that the Turks were on three different occasions successful against superior forces at the passage of the Danube. but in obedience to orders they retreated on the line of Karasan. The St. Petersburg papers contain a manifesto in reply to the English and French declaration of war. It throws the responsibility of the war wholly upon France and England.

The correspondent of the London Times, writing from Paris 18th, says that private letters state that the affair of the Black Warrior so far from being settled, has been urged on with extreme violence by Mr Soule, and at the present moment wears a very threatening aspect.

By accounts from Kael of the 16th of April, it was stated that all the Russian ports in the Baltic are under blockade. The number of Russian merchant ships now captured amounts to ten. On the 19th of April the English fleet was telegraphed off Gothland. On the 12th of April eighteen Russian Ships of the line were lying at Hesingfoes; they seemed as if they intended to pass over to Revel. Admiral Plumridge has been watching them, and before this Sir Charles Napier must have come up with his squadron, intending doubtless to attack them. It is stated that a Russian force has violated the Servian territory.

Alarming State of Turkey. The following letter, published in the London Times, gives a disheartening account of Turkish affairs:

The Russians are making as much progress in their march as by their propagandism. On the one hand they repulse the Turks, who begin to be intimidated; on the other, they excite the flame of revolt, having for that object the Hellenes at their beck and service. Omer Pacha has every reason to complain of the present War Minister.

"In vain he asks to have succor sent to him; Riza Pasha does not grant it, but after long delays and against his will.—The generalissimo we are assured, has been obliged to write on the subject directly to the Sultan. The rumor circulates, and not without some probability, that Thessaly is in full revolt, and that Macedonia already feels the effect of it, and the spark is already kindled at Salonica."

Declaration by the Czar. The following "Declaration" is contained in the St. Petersburgh Journal of the 31st of March (13th of April):

"France and Great Britain have now at last undisguisedly departed from the system of concealed hostility which they had previously adopted against Russia, particularly by ordering their fleets to enter the Black sea.

"The tenor of the explanations given by those powers in reference to that proceeding was such, that the cessation of the mutual relations existing between them and the imperial cabinet became a matter of course.

"The latter result was shortly followed by a communication, in which the two cabinets, through the medium of their respective consuls, invited the imperial government to evacuate the Danubian principalities within a given term, which England fixed at the 30th of April, and France, still more peremptorily, at the 15th of that month.

"By what right did the two powers thus pretend to exact everything from one of the two belligerent parties, without demanding anything from the other? This is what they have not thought fit to explain to the imperial cabinet. To evacuate the principalities, without even the shadow of a fulfilment by the Ottoman government of the conditions to which the Emperor made the cessation of that temporary occupation subordinate—to evacuate them from the fear of a war which the latter was the first to declare, while it is actively carrying on offensive operations, when its own troops occupy a fortified point of Russian territory—was in itself a condition inadmissable in substance. The two powers placed the condition in such a shape that it became still more unacceptable.—They fixed a term of six days for the adhesion of the imperial cabinet, at the expiration of which a refusal, or the absence of any reply whatever, was to be by them regarded as equivalent to a declaration of war.

"To a summons so partial in its tenor, as practically inexcusable as it was insulting in its terms, silence was the only reply compatible with the dignity of the Emperor."

Signs of the Times.

We heard but little of organizations like that of the Know-Nothings being formed till the eventful year of 1854. It may be remembered, that the position I have taken in relation to the frog spirits is, that they are influences going forth from the Catholic, Greek and Mohammedan religions embodied in the several governments that sustain them, which will ultimately involve all the kingdoms of the world in war.—The rapid development of one of these influences the present year in America is beyond parallel. As proof, we extract the following from a paper called the Know-Nothing, recently commenced in Boston:

Great Success of the Know-Nothing.—The success of the "Know-Nothing" has far exceeded our most sanguine expectations. The call for it was unexampled in the history and experience of the Boston press. Our first edition of 25,000 copies was at once exhausted, and two days afterwards the second edition of 25,000 was gone to a paper. We thank the public.

We this week issue an edition of 100,000 copies, and have made ample arrangement for such orders as may be sent in.—We send 15,000 copies to New York, 10,000 to Philadelphia, besides thousands to Lowell, Portland, Fall River and other parts of Massachusetts and New England. We ought to be satisfied. We are.

To show the actual development of the spirit now pervading community, we present the following from the Boston Bee, in reference to a riot created by street preaching against the Catholics on Sunday last:

Great Riot at Chelsea—The Catholic Church Partially Demolished.

Murderous assault on a Constable—The Military under Arms—Arrest of five rioters.—The town of Chelsea was the scene of tremendous excitement and riotous proceedings yesterday afternoon and last night. Over a thousand persons here collected, and symptoms of a riot were visible on every side; nor were these without an early fulfilment. In a few moments stones were thrown at the Catholic church, the windows of which crackled merrily. This increased; and before many minutes the windows of the building were entirely demolished.

This was resented on the part of the Catholics, and a general row ensued. Over three hundred persons, as we are informed, took part in it, and the air whirled with stones, brickbats, clubs, &c.

The authorities of the town rallied, but were unable for the time to accomplish much. Constable George Milton was seriously injured, and was conveyed to his residence.

During the heat of the riot the cross upon the Church was pulled down, and fractured into a thousand pieces—an act which exceedingly exasperated the Catholics; a fact which was sufficiently indicated by a renewed and augmented storm of furiously propelled missiles.

Night now came on, and the battle decreased; but not before several attacks were made upon the church.

During the riot the following persons were arrested: Patrick Collins, James Donahoe, Phillip Closky, and his wife Catharine, who fought like a tiger, and Franklin Hurley. Further arrests were in progress during the evening.

Fearing that as midnight approached the riot might be re-commenced, as squads of Irish gathered by hundreds in the public ways, Deputy Sheriff Rugg ordered the Chelsea Light Infantry, Capt. Fellows, to hold themselves in readiness for [illegible] and immediate service. The company were accordingly put under arms, uniformed and equipped with ball cartridges, &c.—The gallant corps responded bravely. At nearly 12 o'clock, when our reporter left, they had not been called upon to suppress any further riotous demonstrations, though from the movements of the bodies of squads, it was expected their services would be put in active requisition before morning.

Orr was conducted to the boat shortly after dark, and came over to the city, unharmed, so far as we learn.

Some fifty Irish men and women were more or less injured.

It is almost a miracle that no person was killed, in view of the ferocity of the riot and the deadly weapons used.

Such demonstrations are significant at the present time, and are suggestive of coming events which it is painful to contemplate.

It was expected that the church would be burnt during the night. A constabulary force had been placed in guard over it, to prevent, if possible, the threatened conflagration.

Some 1500 persons from Boston were present during the evening, as spectators.

The persons arrested were taken to the lockup. The Irish gathered round the building, for the purpose, as is supposed, of liberating the parties within. The appearance of a few uniforms appeared to cower the mob, and it dispersed.

☞ Some of our Brethren have desired a large paper to be published, filled principally with argument on the general subject of the Lord's immediate appearing, for the purpose of distribution; and as we shall be at the expense of enlarging the paper for that week, and striking off 17,000 copies, it is deemed expedient to suspend the publication of the Crisis for one week. 5,000 copies are designed for the West, and 3,000 extra numbers will be left, which any who are desirous of reading or distributing may have by sending in their orders.—Ed.

To the toil-worn pilgrim:—Beloved of God, and bought with the price of Jesus' precious blood. Be of good cheer; for soon—yea very soon, thou shalt join thy voice with all the ransomed of earth, in a song more sweet and blessed than angels ever sung. Only be faithful to thy coming Lord, and soon thy heart shall rejoice with "joy unspeakable and full of glory." Perhaps thy trials may be severe, and thy temptations great; go then immediately to thine own best Friend. Tell Him all the sorrows of thy heart—keep nothing back—ask Him for grace and strength, and He will surely give thee—only ask in faith—his promise is sure; it cannot fail. Then be of good cheer, "endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ," and soon upon thy beauteous brow shall sparkle a crown more bright and beautiful than monarch ever wore—and the Saviour who has "loved thee with an everlasting love," shall say, "come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." O blessed thought—O happy moment—when all the blood-washed millions shall hear the welcome invitation and enter upon a state of eternal blessedness and perfection. Dear Bro. Merriam, God bless thee my brother, and give thee Heavenly wisdom, and the Holy Spirit to guide thee into all truth. The Crisis is a welcome messenger to many lonely pilgrims I can assure you; and while it comes laden with precious, soul-stirring and heart-cheering truth, God will be honored and his cause advanced. I find it is also a very efficient missionary; for while it breathes forth the very spirit of the gospel, it is read with interest by many who have not been identified with us, and the effect has been blessed. In the East, as far as I have traveled, and in places that I have heard from, the cause is prosperous;—thank the good Lord. Then be of good cheer—a crown of glory awaits thee, its lustre shall never grow dim.

Your Bro., waiting for the promise at the ending of the days in 1854. Amen.

Special Notice.

COMMENCEMENT OF THE LAST SERIES OF TENT MEETINGS.

Since the last warm season has arrived, it is thought best to hold a few Tent Meetings. The first will be in Concord, N. H., May 30, 1854. As the last year of the President's administration and the reign of Kings and Emperors has come, and all the governments of earth must now give place to an exceeding great and very greatly to be desired government, surpassing in majesty and power, in loveliness and beauty, anything before seen; the friends—the lovers—the expectants—the loyal subjects of the Most Grand, the Most Illustrious and Glorious King of this Sublime Kingdom, desire to meet to exhort one another to steadfastness as they see the day speedily approaching, and to listen to the tidings of their returning Sovereign, in a Tent prepared for the occasion, in the City of Concord, N. H., Tuesday, May 30th, 1854, at 5 o'clock, P. M., and continue over the following Sabbath. Let those who belong to the household of faith, whether possessors of little or much, living far off or near, come as children of one family, "bearing one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

Ministers of God, to set the subjects contained in this notice before the people, are requested to attend.

In holding this meeting, it is not the design or desire to rebel against the government under which we live, or the city authorities of Concord, and with all due respect for our rulers and nation, we would invite one and all, without distinction, since all earthly governments must now fall, to come and candidly weigh the reasons of our expectation—believe—join us—prepare before it is too late, and be participators in the reign and kingdom of "ANOTHER KING, ONE JESUS," who, in the GRANDEUR OF HIS POWER, WILL SWAY HIS SCEPTER OVER ALL THE EARTH, "AND OF HIS KINGDOM THERE SHALL BE NO END."

In behalf of the cause of the coming King,
J. Cummings.

I shall now make a few more quotations from Bliss, (Anal. Sac. Chron.) On page 152 he says, "Artaxerxes Longimanus, according to Prideaux, was succeeded by his son Xerxes, who was murdered at the end of forty-five days by his brother Sogdianus, who in turn was put to death by his brother Ochus, having reigned but six months and fifteen days. The two brothers having reigned less than a year, their time is included in Ptolemy's Canon, in that of Ochus. This prince changed his name to Darius, and is called by historians, Darius Nothus. His reign, including that of his brothers, according to the Canon of Ptolemy, continued 19 years, "to B. C. 404."

Again I quote from pages 24th and 25th, (Anal. Sac. Chron.) 1. 'Thucydides, b. 8, had preserved a curious original document, in the third treaty of peace between Tissaphernes and Peloponnesians, beginning with its date: 'In the 13th year of the reign of Darius (11. Nothus) &c. This treaty it appears from history, was made in winter, in the 20th year of the Peloponnesian war, which began in the spring, B. C. 431; and consequently the 20th year in winter, was the beginning of the Julian year, B. C. 410; which added to the 13 years of Darius, or 337th of the era, gives its commencement, B. C. 747." The treaty mentioned above, which was agreed upon by Tissaphernes a lieutenant of the king of Persia, and the Peloponnessians, is likewise mentioned by Sir W. Raleigh, who also says it was made in the 20th year of the Peloponnessian war.—Now it will be seen that if this treaty was made in the 20th year of the Peloponnessian war, and 337th of the era of Nabonassar, it could not (as Ptolemy computes years) be made in the 13th year of the personal reign of Darius Nothus: for he begins the reigns of the two brothers, Xerxes and Sogdianus, Dec. 7th, B. C. 423, and consequently after they had reigned eight months, it would carry the beginning of Darius' personal reign, to Aug. 7th, 423 B. C., and the era of Nabonassar falls back to begin with the solar year. In order that all may understand, I will give a table of the years of the Peloponessian war as far as the 20th, and the corresponding years of the era of Nabonassar.

☞ The storm of last week seems to have been very extensive and almost unparalleled for the quantity of rain, violence of the wind, &c., in many places. In the City of New York it rained 66 hours without intermission and much of that time it is said in torrents.

We cut the following items from the Lowell Journal:

THE STORM was not confined to this vicinity, but swept over every part of the country which has since been heard from. On Wednesday it was very severe at Washington and Baltimore, and in the latter city a man was killed by lightning. On Wednesday and Thursday a furious gale swept over the great lakes, capsizing and wrecking vessels and destroying life. At Chicago, seven schooners are reported wrecked, with four lives lost. Disasters are also reported at Buffalo and Milwaukie. At Detroit the storm was accompanied with rain and hail, and it is reported as the most severe gale that has visited that section for several years. Mr Nicholas (of the firm of Nicholas & LeFavour) was struck on the head by one of the signs on the store, which was blown down, and his skull was fractured and one of his thighs broken. A despatch from Cincinnati of the 29th states that snow had fallen two inches deep sixty miles north of that city. In Philadelphia the storm is represented as one of the most severe which was ever seen in that region—several buildings were struck by lightning, and many persons were injured. The Hartford papers of Saturday mention a great flood upon the Connecticut, with the prospect that the water would rise as high there as it has ever risen before. In New York several buildings were unroofed and blown down, and many vessels received injury. The roof and upper story of the American candle manufactory in Brooklyn were blown off, and two hands very severely injured.

THE FRESHET IN THE VALLEY OF THE CONNECTICUT has proved the greatest on record—Hartford being inundated—Colt's pistol factory badly damaged—part of Springfield overflowed—immense damage and distress along the river banks—Windsor Locks washed away—railroad tracks completely destroyed, etc. etc. In Hartford the damage to property is very heavy, involving much suffering to the poor people that have been driven from their homes. The Mayor has ordered the public buildings of the city to be thrown open for their use, and also ordered out boats to rescue such as are in danger.

Foreign.

ADDITIONAL FROM EUROPE. In addition to the foreign intelligence received by the Pacific, which we laid before our readers on yesterday, we have the following items:—The Baltic was opening from ice, and had already become navigable. The French squadron that has sailed from Brest, under Admiral Deschives, to reinforce Napier in the Baltic, is composed of the line-of-battle ships Inflexible, Jemappes, Tage, Breslau, and frigates Darien, Poursuivante and Semillante. Napier's fleet now musters thirty-seven sail, carrying eighteen hundred guns, and over eighteen thousand men. Napier's fleet had taken five Russian prizes with a number of prisoners. The prizes were loaded with sulphur and other articles contraband of war. Napier's fleet had advanced up the Baltic—bound, it is said, for Helsingfors. The Russians had committed great atrocities before leaving Aland.—Seven merchant prizes are in the hands of the British at Kioge Bay. The Danish ministry still remained in power.

Vienna, April 10. The state of siege will be raised in Hungary, the Servian Woywodate, the Branat Galicia, Cracow, and Bukowina, after the 1st of May. This is official. It is rumored, in well-informed quarters, that Austria proposes to Prussia to consider the passage of the Danube a casus belli.

One mode of defending the entrance of Cronstadt is new and dangerous. Strong iron chests, charged with powder and other combustible materials, are sunk in the channel, and connected by wires to a galvanic battery.—Above the chests is some machinery, which, on being touched by the keel of a passing vessel, completes the galvanic circuit, and explodes the mine. A hundred of these dangerous inventions are sunk in the narrow entrance to Cronstadt.

The War on the Danube.—Vienna, April 13. The late accounts state that numerous skirmishes of a very sanguinary character take place along the line of the Danube. The national antipathies have reached their extreme point. Prince Gortschakoff is about to move from Bucharest, on the Danube.

Vienna, April 14. The Russians are entrenching themseves at Hirsova. As Omar Pasha has issued orders to the troops occupying the second or Balkan line of defence, to begin their march towards the Danube on the 10th, it is supposed tha some positive assurances relative to the arrival of the allies must have reached him.

Orsova, April 9. Extreme activity prevails among the Turks, and it is believed that important events will occur about the 20th. 8000 Russians attempted to storm Rassova, but were repulsed. On April 2d the attack was renewed. 7500 men had been landed to reinforce Varna. It was further rumored that the Turks had taken Turna, and advancing in rear of the Russians.

Victory in the Caucasus. The English steamer Sampson, which had been surveying on the coast of Circassia, returned to Constantinople March 21st, bringing tidings of a complete victory gained by the Circassians over the Russians. The Circassian coast is at present free from the enemy.

Constantinople, April 6. The whole fleet is now in the Black Sea. 3000 Greeks have embarked precipitately in order to leave Turkey. Trade is at a stand still.

Odessa, April 8. The combined fleets blockade Odessa. A private despatch states that Odessa was taken on the 14th, but this is doubtful.

Paris, April 18. Advices have been received here by telegraph from Constantinople to the 10th of April. Varna, which was only defended by six thousand men, has asked for reinforcements from the combined fleets.

Kalafat is again full of men, the present garrison numbering 40,000. The Turkish camp was healthy; provisions were abundant. On the 6th April, the Anglo-French declaration of war against Russia was read to the troops at Kalafat, and was saluted with a hundred salvos of artillery and three rounds of musketry. The news of the declaration of war created immense excitement at Bucharest.

Fifteen thousand troops were daily expected at Constantinople from Egypt, who will immediately on arrival be forwarded to Baroum, under the escort of English and French steamers. Some excitement was manifested at Constantinople, and the new Mufti was insulted, April 3d. Lord Stratford had addressed to the British Consuls a circular condemning the Greek insurrection.

The Very Latest.—Liverpool, April 19. It is confirmed that the Russians entered Servia.—A force crossed on the 15th, and entered Turna. The important fortress of Tchaking, in Lower Wallachia, was destroyed by accidental fire, together with all the Russian stores, &c.—The Russians were threatening to cross at a higher point up the river.

LATER—ARRIVAL OF THE AFRICA.

Richardson Bros., agents of the City of Glasgow, say they are not afraid she is lost, that the ship was perfectly efficient, had water for 40 days and a distilling apparatus, with provisions for 65 days. She took out 373 passengers.

A treaty of closer alliance is ratified between France and England.

The expulsion of the Greeks was rigorously enforced. The Greek Insurrection had asumed a shape of guerrilla warfare, but was not formidable. Lord Stratford de Redcliffe had published a strong manifesto against the Greek Government for favoring the insurrection. A massacre of the Greeks at Volo was reported, but doubtful.

Accounts are still vague respecting the violation of the Servian territory. Prince Daniel is said to have summoned the Montenegrins to arms against the Turks. The campaign in Asia was expected to be opened abont the middle of April. There was no news of any importance in France or England.

Count Nesselrode's circular favors the Greek insurgents.

Berlin, Friday.—Yesterday an alliance offensive and defensive between Austria and Prussia was signed by Baron Mantemet on the one side, and Baron Hess and Count Thune on the other. It is asserted from Copenhagen that Sweden has positively entered into a secret treaty with Russia, by which an obsolete enactment, forbidding more than four ships at one time to enter an harbor, has been restored, and the same extended to Norway.

Paris, Friday.—A despatch from Omar Pacha confirms the previous accounts that the Turks were on three different occasions successful against superior forces at the passage of the Danube. but in obedience to orders they retreated on the line of Karasan. The St. Petersburg papers contain a manifesto in reply to the English and French declaration of war. It throws the responsibility of the war wholly upon France and England.

The correspondent of the London Times, writing from Paris 18th, says that private letters state that the affair of the Black Warrior so far from being settled, has been urged on with extreme violence by Mr Soule, and at the present moment wears a very threatening aspect.

By accounts from Kael of the 16th of April, it was stated that all the Russian ports in the Baltic are under blockade. The number of Russian merchant ships now captured amounts to ten. On the 19th of April the English fleet was telegraphed off Gothland. On the 12th of April eighteen Russian Ships of the line were lying at Hesingfoes; they seemed as if they intended to pass over to Revel. Admiral Plumridge has been watching them, and before this Sir Charles Napier must have come up with his squadron, intending doubtless to attack them. It is stated that a Russian force has violated the Servian territory.

ALARMING STATE OF TURKEY. The following letter, published in the London Times, gives a disheartening account of Turkish affairs:

The Russians are making as much progress in their march as by their propagandism. On the one hand they repulse the Turks, who begin to be intimidated; on the other, they excite the flame of revolt, having for that object the Hellenes at their beck and service. Omer Pacha has every reason to complain of the present War Minister.

"In vain he asks to have succor sent to him; Riza Pasha does not grant it, but after long delays and against his will.—The generalissimo we are assured, has been obliged to write on the subject directly to the Sultan. The rumor circulates, and not without some probability, that Thessaly is in full revolt, and that Macedonia already feels the effect of it, and the spark is already kindled at Salonica."

DECLARATION BY THE CZAR. The following "Declaration" is contained in the St. Petersburgh Journal of the 31st of March (13th of April):

"France and Great Britain have now at last undisguisedly departed from the system of concealed hostility which they had previously adopted against Russia, particularly by ordering their fleets to enter the Black sea.

"The tenor of the explanations given by those powers in reference to that proceeding was such, that the cessation of the mutual relations existing between them and the imperial cabinet became a matter of course.

"The latter result was shortly followed by a communication, in which the two cabinets, through the medium of their respective consuls, invited the imperial government to evacuate the Danubian principalities within a given term, which England fixed at the 30th of April, and France, still more peremptorily, at the 15th of that month.

"By what right did the two powers thus pretend to exact everything from one of the two belligerent parties, without demanding anything from the other? This is what they have not thought fit to explain to the imperial cabinet. To evacuate the principalities, without even the shadow of a fulfilment by the Ottoman government of the conditions to which the Emperor made the cessation of that temporary occupation subordinate—to evacuate them from the fear of a war which the latter was the first to declare, while it is actively carrying on offensive operations, when its own troops occupy a fortified point of Russian territory—was in itself a condition inadmissable in substance. The two powers placed the condition in such a shape that it became still more unacceptable.—They fixed a term of six days for the adhesion of the imperial cabinet, at the expiration of which a refusal, or the absence of any reply whatever, was to be by them regarded as equivalent to a declaration of war.

"To a summons so partial in its tenor, as practically inexcusable as it was insulting in its terms, silence was the only reply compatible with the dignity of the Emperor."

Signs of the Times.

We heard but little of organizations like that of the Know-Nothings being formed till the eventful year of 1854. It may be remembered, that the position I have taken in relation to the frog spirits is, that they are influences going forth from the Catholic, Greek and Mohammedan religions embodied in the several governments that sustain them, which will ultimately involve all the kingdoms of the world in war.—The rapid development of one of these influences the present year in America is beyond parallel. As proof, we extract the following from a paper called the Know-Nothing, recently commenced in Boston:

Great Success of the Know-Nothing.—The success of the "Know-Nothing" has far exceeded our most sanguine expectations. The call for it was unexampled in the history and experience of the Boston press. Our first edition of 25,000 copies was at once exhausted, and two days afterwards the second edition of 25,000 was gone to a paper. We thank the public.

We this week issue an edition of 100,000 copies, and have made ample arrangement for such orders as may be sent in.—We send 15,000 copies to New York, 10,000 to Philadelphia, besides thousands to Lowell, Portland, Fall River and other parts of Massachusetts and New England. We ought to be satisfied. WE ARE.

To show the actual development of the spirit now pervading community, we present the following from the Boston Bee, in reference to a riot created by street preaching against the Catholics on Sunday last:

Great Riot at Chelsea—The Catholic Church Partially Demolished.

Murderous assault on a Constable—The Military under Arms—Arrest of five rioters.—The town of Chelsea was the scene of tremendous excitement and riotous proceedings yesterday afternoon and last night. Over a thousand persons here collected, and symptoms of a riot were visible on every side; nor were these without an early fulfilment. In a few moments stones were thrown at the Catholic church, the windows of which crackled merrily. This increased; and before many minutes the windows of the building were entirely demolished.

This was resented on the part of the Catholics, and a general row ensued. Over three hundred persons, as we are informed, took part in it, and the air whirled with stones, brickbats, clubs, &c.

The authorities of the town rallied, but were unable for the time to accomplish much. Constable George Milton was seriously injured, and was conveyed to his residence.

During the heat of the riot the cross upon the Church was pulled down, and fractured into a thousand pieces—an act which exceedingly exasperated the Catholics; a fact which was sufficiently indicated by a renewed and augmented storm of furiously propelled missiles.

Night now came on, and the battle decreased; but not before several attacks were made upon the church.

During the riot the following persons were arrested: Patrick Collins, James Donahoe, Phillip Closky, and his wife Catharine, who fought like a tiger, and Franklin Hurley. Further arrests were in progress during the evening.

Fearing that as midnight approached the riot might be re-commenced, as squads of Irish gathered by hundreds in the public ways, Deputy Sheriff Rugg ordered the Chelsea Light Infantry, Capt. Fellows, to hold themselves in readiness for active and immediate service. The company were accordingly put under arms, uniformed and equipped with ball cartridges, &c.—The gallant corps responded bravely. At nearly 12 o'clock, when our reporter left, they had not been called upon to suppress any further riotous demonstrations, though from the movements of the bodies of squads, it was expected their services would be put in active requisition before morning.

Orr was conducted to the boat shortly after dark, and came over to the city, unharmed, so far as we learn.

Some fifty Irish men and women were more or less injured.

It is almost a miracle that no person was killed, in view of the ferocity of the riot and the deadly weapons used.

Such demonstrations are significant at the present time, and are suggestive of coming events which it is painful to contemplate.

It was expected that the church would be burnt during the night. A constabulary force had been placed in guard over it, to prevent, if possible, the threatened conflagration.

Some 1500 persons from Boston were present during the evening, as spectators.

The persons arrested were taken to the lock-up. The Irish gathered round the building, for the purpose, as is supposed, of liberating the parties within. The appearance of a few uniforms appeared to cower the mob, and it dispersed.

☞ Some of our Brethren have desired a large paper to be published, filled principally with argument on the general subject of the Lord's immediate appearing, for the purpose of distribution; and as we shall be at the expense of enlarging the paper for that week, and striking off 17,000 copies, it is deemed expedient to suspend the publication of the Crisis for one week. 5,000 copies are designed for the West, and 3,000 extra numbers will be left, which any who are desirous of reading or distributing may have by sending in their orders.—ED.

To the toil-worn pilgrim:—Beloved of God, and bought with the price of Jesus' precious blood. Be of good cheer; for soon—yea VERY SOON, thou shalt join thy voice with all the ransomed of earth, in a song more sweet and blessed than angels ever sung, Only be faithful to thy coming Lord, and soon thy heart shall rejoice with "joy unspeakable and full of glory." Perhaps thy trials may be severe, and thy temptations great; go then immediately to thine own best Friend. Tell Him all the sorrows of thy heart—keep nothing back—ask Him for grace and strength, and He will surely give thee—only ask in faith—his promise is sure; it cannot fail. Then be of good cheer, "endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ," and soon upon thy beauteous brow shall sparkle a crown more bright and beautiful than monarch ever wore—and the Saviour who has "loved thee with an everlasting love," shall say, "come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." O blessed thought—O happy moment—when all the blood-washed millions shall hear the welcome invitation and enter upon a state of eternal blessedness and perfection. Dear Bro. Merriam, God bless thee my brother, and give thee Heavenly wisdom, and the Holy Spirit to guide thee into all truth. The Crisis is a welcome messenger to many lonely pilgrims I can assure you; and while it comes laden with precious, soul-stirring and heart-cheering truth, God will be honored and his cause advanced. I find it is also a very efficient missionary; for while it breathes forth the very spirit of the gospel, it is read with interest by many who have not been identified with us, and the effect has been blessed. In the East, as far as I have traveled, and in places that I have heard from, the cause is prosperous;—thank the good Lord. Then be of good cheer—a crown of glory awaits thee, its lustre shall never grow dim.

Your Bro., waiting for the promise at the ending of the days in 1854. Amen.

Special Notice.

COMMENCEMENT OF THE LAST SERIES OF TENT MEETINGS.

Since the last warm season has arrived, it is thought best to hold a few Tent Meetings. The first will be IN CONCORD, N. H., MAY 30, 1854. As the last year of the President's administration and the reign of Kings and Emperors has come, and all the governments of earth must now give place to an exceeding great and very greatly to be desired government, surpassing in majesty and power, in loveliness and beauty, anything before seen; the friends—the lovers—the expectants—the loyal subjects of the Most Grand, the Most Illustrious and Glorious King of this Sublime Kingdom, desire to meet to exhort one another to steadfastness as they see the day speedily approaching, and to listen to the tidings of their returning Sovereign, in a Tent prepared for the occasion, in the CITY OF CONCORD, N. H., TUESDAY, MAY 30TH, 1854, AT 5 O'CLOCK, P. M., AND CONTINUE OVER THE FOLLOWING SABBATH. Let those who belong to the household of faith, whether possessors of little or much, living far off or near, come as children of one family, "bearing one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

Ministers of God, to set the subjects contained in this notice before the people, are requested to attend.

In holding this meeting, it is not the design or desire to rebel against the government under which we live, or the city authorities of Concord, and with all due respect for our rulers and nation, we would invite one and all, without distinction, since all earthly governments must now fall, to come and candidly weigh the reasons of our expectation—believe—join us—prepare before it is too late, and be participators in the reign and kingdom of "ANOTHER KING, ONE JESUS," who, in the GRANDEUR OF HIS POWER, WILL SWAY HIS SCEPTER OVER ALL THE EARTH, "AND OF HIS KINGDOM THERE SHALL BE NO END."

In behalf of the cause of the coming King,
J. CUMMINGS.

Faith and Obedience.

Continued.

We find that the Jewish church at the time of the first advent of Christ, could not be justified on any other ground, than that of present truth. It was absolutely necessary for them to adapt their faith and works to the new developements of the divine economy—the clearer revealings of heavenly light, as manifested through the person of Jesus Christ.

Notwithstanding the jeers of the self-righteous Pharisees, the taunts of the multitude, and the persecution of the priesthood, the apostles preached the word with great boldness; God clothed it with power, and confirmed it by signs, and wonders, and gifts of the Holy Ghost. Some there were who searched the Scriptures diligently to see if these things were so. Thus their understanding was enlightened—they were convinced of the truth, and, notwithstanding the reproach connected with it, they became disciples of the despised Nazarene. One brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, and a great persecutor of the saints, became a convert to the truth, and its fearless defender. The doctrine of the cross, and of the resurrection, spread far and wide. This included the entire plan of redemption: freedom from the Jewish yoke of bondage—forgiveness of sin—the return of Christ—the redemption of the body—glorification in the kingdom—and restitution of the earth.

The question now arises, whether new unfoldings of the divine economy were to continue down through the gospel dispensation, or were they confined to the prophetic and apostolic age? Our appeal is to the Word of God for an answer. We are assured by the wise man that "the path of the just is as the shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day." Peter tells us, that the sure word of prophecy is as "a light shining in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in our hearts." Not a new revelation, but the old, the self-same word of prophecy which has cheered the humble saints in ages past. It is only a more brilliant light, shining upon the ancient path. It is increased radiance from prophecy fulfilled. Much light, very much shone around the cross. Never had so much before shone on this benighted earth. But it did not stay there. The day-star had not then risen. The perfect day had not then dawned. While the hope of the condemned sinner centres at the cross, the hope of the justified saint centres in the glorification of Christ at His second Advent and kingdom. While at the cross the sinner finds pardon, it is at the returning of Christ that the saint obtains complete redemption. At the cross the title-deed to the inheritance is received; when the perfect day comes, the purchased possession will be redeemed. The great and glorious restitution can never be accomplished until the Redeemer return again to Zion. The hope thereof, germinated in the garden of Eden, it budded at the cross, but it will not fully bloom, until man is re-instated in Paradise restored. Here all the scattered gleams of glory converge, as to one grand focal point. Here is the full consummation! Here is perfect redemption!—Here is complete glorification! We will not then linger always about the cross; we will not always dwell upon the sufferings of Christ; but sometimes turn our eyes to contemplate the glory which will follow. In order to walk in the increasing light, we must progress in the radiant path; and when we reach the end, we shall find such glory as it never entered into the heart of man to conceive—"a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory;" a glory so surpassingly brilliant, that the rays of the sun, although shining with seven-fold strength, will be completely lost in its overwhelming beams. Abraham caught a glimpse by faith, and cheerfully accounted himself a pilgrim and a stranger. Moses had a view thereof, and for its sake, gladly forsook the honors and wealth of an Egyptian court. Aflicted Job, too: and hear the out-gushings of his heart in language like this. "O that my words were now written! oh that they were printed in a book! that they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock forever!—For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God!" Even the distant view he had of the glory so enraptured his soul, that he wanted the language with which he gave utterance to his feelings "printed in a book," and "graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock forever." Why, if the faint gleams seen "through a glass darkly, inspire thoughts such as these, what will be the result of open vision, and glad fruition? The three disciples on the holy mount were favored with a greater outshining of the glory than any who had gone before, and they were overpowered by the sight. Paul had a view thereof when caught up into Paradise, and he could exclaim with rapture, These light afflictions "are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed."

Now all this is yet future—yet to come. And if the prophets searched and inquired diligently to understand about the "manner of time" when the glory would be manifested, surely we may be permitted to feel an interest in that which so much concerns us, and also to examine that "sure word of prophecy" which reflects its clear light upon the past, the present, and also the future.

If it conflicted not with Paul's determination "to know nothing save Jesus and him crucified," for him to dwell largely upon his second coming; if with him that knowledge embraced the final consummation, likewise the perils which were to precede that blessed era, surely that church may not be considered unorthodox that follows in his footsteps. But perhaps I have digressed too widely from the question, Did specific messages cease in the apostolic age? I think I have already demonstrated the fact from the Scriptures, that there were to be farther unfoldings of the prophetic scroll, even to the end of this dispensation, illuminating "the path of the just," and revealing to them their position on the ocean of time. God has had his scribes in all ages of the world, who were well instructed in the things of the kingdom, and who were able to bring forth from the treasury of his Word, "things new and old," thus giving the church "meat in due season," or in its appropriate time. I will however make this more plain by illustrations from the Scriptures. The Saviour gave to his disciples a history of events which were to transpire from his time, down to his second advent. He spoke to them of Jerusalem's destruction, and told them when they saw the city encompassed with armies to know that the desolation thereof was nigh. What was the duty incumbent on them when convinced of this fact? To flee into the mountains, to depart out of the midst of Judea, and those in the countries not to enter therein, lest they be involved in the destruction which was to come upon that doomed city.

Now all must needs see that those disciples who were in Jerusalem, Judea, and the surrounding countries, would not feel any special interest in those instructions, until the Roman army was seen surrounding the city. Here was a prediction which had specific bearing upon them at that time and no other; it was to them a "present truth," and by believing and obeying that truth, they were saved from the direful calamity which came upon the wicked Jews.

The Saviour likewise foretold a "great tribulation," which was to come upon the elect. In order to enlighten the church respecting it, he refers to the "abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing in the holy place" and bids those who read to understand. The prophet had spoken definitely of this "abomination," and the persecution of the saints, "by flame, captivity and sword," which was to follow its setting up; and had given the time of its continuance, even 1290 days (years). With the knowledge of the establishment of this desolating power, there was also a duty connected.—When ye see the abomination of desolation standing in the holy place, then flee! Was that all? No. Do not come down from the house-top to take anything out of the house—do not turn back from the field to take a garment—flee suddenly, make no delay, you are in danger if you do.—Why this haste? Was it lest the Roman soldiers overtake them in their flight?—O, no, they were far away. There was sufficient time for the disciples to take what they wished from their dwellings—those at work in the field, could return and take their garments. It was when the abomination should be set up; it was when the edicts for the extermination of heretics should be issued, there would be need of sudden flight. Can we find on history's page any account of such a sudden flight? Any account where there was a woe upon the nursing child? Let me record a single instance "While the Arian king was striving by the most just and equitable laws to clear the church of all simony in the west, the catholic emperor was employing the most unjust and unchristian means of clearing her from all heresies in the east, that of persecution, and the most cruel persecution any Christian emperor had yet set on foot, or countenanced. ("Tribulation such as never was," Christ.) For by an edict which he issued, to unite all men in one faith, whether Jews, Gentiles, or Christians, such as did not, in the term of three months, embrace and profess the Catholic faith, were declared infamous, and as such, excluded from all employments, both civil and military, rendered incapable of leaving anything by will, and their estates confiscated, whether real or personal.—These were convincing arguments of the truth of the catholic faith; but many however withstood them; and against such as did, the imperial edict was executed with the utmost rigor. Great numbers were driven from their habitations, with their wives and children, stripped and naked.—Others betook themselves to flight, carrying with them what they could conceal, for their support and maintenance; but they were plundered of the little they had, and many of them inhumanly massacred, by the catholic peasantry, or the soldiery who guarded the passes." This was in 532, and is a clear comment on the language of the Saviour. It was a sudden flight—from a desolating power—many fled "stripped and naked," while those, who, regardless of the instruction "not to take anything out of their house," endeavored to conceal something for their support, were plundered, and many inhumanly massacred." Another historian, speaking of the flight of the church in the winter, says, "Three hundred infants were found frozen to death." "Woe unto them that give suck in those days, and pray ye that your flight be not in winter, (because of the liability to perish with frost,) neither on the Sabbath day, (because then they were particularly watched by the soldiers, and catholic peasantry, as they assembled for worship,) for then there shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be."

Now while I believe it was for the church living at that time to understand in relation to the character of this abomination, I do not for a moment admit that it was for them to understand the period of its continuance, for that, we are expressly told, was closed up and sealed till the time of the end. "It shall be," says the angel, "for a time, times and a half, in accomplishing the dispersion of the sanctified ones, and all these things shall be understood." Septuagint. In the 11th chap. we are told that some of them of understanding shall fall, "even to the time of the end, because it is yet for a time appointed." In the 12th chap. Daniel is told to shut up the words and seal the book: how long?—"To the time of the end." What will then take place? "The dispersion of the sanctified ones," will then have been accomplished—"many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." Then "all these things shall be understood."—"But I wish to know more about this," says Daniel. "It is not for you to understand—the words," says the angel, 'are closed up and sealed till the time of the end, and then the wickedly will do wickedly, and none of them will understand, but the wise shall understand." What will they understand? That "from the time the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days," and "blessed are those who wait (from that time) and come to the 1335 days. Now go thy way Daniel, for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days."

Here we have a most convincing argument for the position taken, that specific messages did not cease in the prophetic age, but there were to be unfoldings of divine truth, adapted to every age of the church, from their day, onward to the consummation of the gospel plan. It is most positively stated that a certain truth connected with an abomination of desolation, should be closed and sealed up, until a certain work had been accomplished, the time for the accomplishment of that work is given, and the assertion made upon oath, that when the "dispersion" or scattering of the "sanctified ones" was finished, and the time of the end arrived, the seals should be loosed—the book opened—many were to run to and fro and instruct in relation to these things, and finally, that the wise shall understand the time. How shall they understand? Says Jesus, "Let him that readeth understand." It is not then by a new revelation from heaven—it is not by an announcement from angels—it is not by a vision or dream, that this truth is to be elicited. No, no! none of these. It is by reading Daniel, and comparing prophecy with history, that the knowledge is acquired.

Daniel was told when this abomination should rise, that it would be when a certain king should have intelligence with those who forsake the holy covenant—there would be a mutual understanding, and they would, by the aid of arms, place the abomination. He was informed how long it would continue, and reliable historians have recorded the fulfilment of those facts which were revealed to the prophet, and now we must read, and carefully compare scripture with scripture, and prophecy with history, in order to arrive at an understanding of this great truth.

Says Peter, "We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place."

Christian Fidelity.

Brethren in Christ:—In following our glorious Master, we should go about doing good; and especially should we labor to save souls. The blessed promise to the wise, and those that turn many to righteousness is, that they "shall shine as the brightness of the firmament and as the stars forever and ever." "He that converteth the sinner from the error of his way, shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multidude of sins." We should converse with them, and try to persuade them to become reconciled to God; and O with what anxiety and earnestness should we plead, knowing that we have but a few days, or months, at most, in which we can be employed in this heavenly enterprize. In order to do it properly we need to have our souls imbued with the grace of God. We must pray with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit. O we do need to have on "the whole armor, of God" and then we shall be able to present the word of God, which is the sword of the spirit; and it is "sharper than any two edged sword," and he saith, "it shall not return unto me void; but it shall accomplish that which I please; and it shall prosper in the thing whereunto I sent it." Those who yield to the influence of divine truth, will be "sealed with that holy spirit of promise," which is "the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession;" which is about to be given to the saints under the whole heaven. Yes, bless the Lord, the day has nearly arrived in which we shall see "the Ancient of days, whose garment is white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool: his throne is like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire."—He will very shortly appear in "flaming fire, taking vengeance" on all those that obey not the Gospel, and "to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe." He is about to appear "in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory;" and "the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air." O what a glorious sight!—"His head and his hairs are white like wool, as white as snow; his eyes are like a flame of fire, his feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace; his voice as the sound of many waters, and his countenance is as the sun shineth in his strength." O what a glorious thought, that "we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." Yes the lovely inhabitants of that glorious land "shall shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father." Then shall "the meek inherit the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace." Then shall the righteous inherit the land, and dwell therein forever. In His days shall the righteous flourish, and abundance of peace, so long as the moon endureth: "and my people shall dwell in peaceable habitations, and in sure dwellings, and in quiet resting places." In this world men have to flee from the drawn sword, and from the bent bow; and from the grievousness of war: and we are now expecting the most terrible war that was ever witnessed; but thank God, the time is nigh even at the doors, when "He will make wars to cease, unto the ends of the earth; and violence shall no more be heard in the land, wasting nor destruction within its borders. The children of wickedness shall not waste them any more, but the inhabitants shall be called holy, even every one that shall be written among the living in Jerusalem." "The ransomed of the Lord shall come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads;" but "there shall in no wise enter into it, any thing that defileth; neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie; but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life." The righteous nation "which keepeth the truth shall enter in."

O we long to be there, where no sorrow or care,
Can disturb that sweet, heavenly rest;
'Twill be joyful and sweet, when salvation's complete,
To unite with the glad ransomed host.

PROPHETIC PERIODS.—1260, 1290, 1335 Years of Daniel and John.

The daily sacrifice taken away, and the Abomination of Desolation set up, or the Saints given unto the hand of the Little Horn. .... 519.

1260 years of tribulation.—Rev. 11: 2, 3, and 12: 6, 14, and 13: 5. The sun darkened May 19, 1780, to show its termination. — 1779.

1290 years, or time times and the dividing of time—or time times and a part, in which the TIMES and LAWS are in the hands of the Little Horn. — 1809. Napoleon takes away the civil power of the Little Horn.

1838. [illegible]

1335 years, reaching from the setting up of the Abomination of Desolation, or the time when the Saints' times and laws were given into the hand of the Little Horn, to the end, when Daniel with all the Saints will stand in their lot..1854.

THE END.

☞ The above Diagram is designed to illustrate the measurement of time from the rise of the little horn, with eyes and a mouth (the civil power of the Greek Empire, or Eastern Rome incorporated with the Ecclesiastical Power of the Papacy.—Dan 7: 8) until the coming of Christ at the resurrection of the saints.

The 1290 years, or time, times and the dividing of time, (Dan. 7: 25) measure the period during which the saints, times and laws were to be given into his hand—The period of the saint's tribulation, we understand, were shortened to 1260 years, (Rev. 12: 6, 14—11: 2 and 13: 5); but times and laws were to remain in his hand during 1290 years, extending 30 years beyond the 1260. "But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion to consume and destroy unto the end." 45 years from the close of the 1290 make 1335 years, when Daniel will stand in his lot, which must be at the resurrection of the saints.

Christ, speaking of this desolating power—the papacy—says, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened,"—which marks a point previous to which the saints were taken out of the hands of the little horn power. Thus we perceive that 1260 years of the 1335 ended prior to the 19th of May, 1780, when the sun was darkened. Add 75 years to 1260 and you have 1335 years, which must end before May 19th, 1855, according to the evidence from the darkening of the sun. But we have abundant historical evidence that the papal power, i. e. the abomination that maketh desolate, was set up in 519, hence the 1335 days (years) end in 1854, which brings the coming of the Lord and the resurrection of the saints the present year.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Corinna, April 19th, 1854.

Dear Brethren scattered throughout the land of distress:—I send you greeting; grace, mercy, and peace and patience be multiplied. Amen.

The Day of God is nearing, and the nearer it comes, the more like Christ I want to be.

I have it to say that the cause of God is prospering in Maine. The work of God is breaking out in different places—souls are believing in Jesus Christ, the son of God, and rejoicing in the truth of Jesus' coming this year. About two weeks ago, I started from my home, went to Levant, and spoke to the people seven times.—Here God had converted a number of precious souls. From thence I went to Hermon, and attenced a funeral—found the saints in that place giving glory to God, in the hope of Redemption soon. From thence I went to Orrington—found the church in the faith, also a number of happy converts brought into the truth under the labors of Bro. John Howell. I held two meetings with them. On the second day, we went to the water and there I buried in baptism 22 happy converts.—Glory to God for His mercy. From thence I went to Newburg—stopped with them over Saturday, Sabbath, and Monday.—Baptized four happy believers in Christ—in the afternoon broke bread to the Church at the Lord's table, and attended to the following example—had a glorious season, and the spirit of reformation increased. On Tuesday I went to Frankfort—held one meeting, and baptized three, while the saints wept and gave glory to God. From thence I returned back through Newburg, attended two more meetings, and was satisfied that God was about to work more in that place. From thence I came to the town of Carmel—met at the house of Bro. Perkins—gave them some of the word of life, and then went to the water and buried in baptism three more, making in all 32 that were baptized on this tour. Returned home—found that God was at work in our place. In some of the most discouraging cases, they are embracing the truth, praise the good Lord, Amen. Had a full Conference on Saturday, Sabbath, and Monday. On Tuesday baptized two, and on Thursday following, I baptized five more. They came out rejoicing in God. Such a day we do not often see in this place. On Friday held a meeting in Greenbush, (in Exeter) where God has been reviving his work—found a good state of things. On Saturday I went to Levant—found the work was going on—preached with them on the Sabbath, and at the close of the meeting went to the water and buried in baptism ten happy souls, making in all that I have baptized since I returned from the west, 89. May the good Lord help them to live for his coming, and be all ready for the solemn day. My heart is made glad to see the work of God, and also to know that redemption is near.—This year will tell the story for the saints. The blessing is on the waiting saints who come to the 1335 days. May God bless you, Brethren, who labor in the Crisis Office; and help you to be humble, and do what you do to the glory of God. Oh Brethren, keep the good of the cause in view, and may the good Lord bless the word spoken through the Crisis to the saving of thousands. I believe He will.—There is new interest breaking out in different places all around us. Praise the Lord, Amen.

I. Damman.

North Wardsboro, Vt., Feb. 21st, 1854.

Bro. Merriam:—I feel to thank the Lord with a sincere heart that He yet remembers His waiting and toil-worn children; and that we are permitted now after so long a time of sleep, to hear the true midnight cry, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet Him!" Since I have had the happiness of perusing the World's Crisis, my mind has been very sensibly affected by seeing the complete verification of the parable of the ten virgins. Early in the year A. D. 1843, a brother came to this place, gave us a course of lectures on the second coming of Christ, and he most earnestly requested the whole congregation to bring their Bibles and follow him day after day, to see if these things are so. It is evident that was the movement the Lord saw would take place at that time. But why did the the Bridegroom tarry? Why because the Bridegroom desired to see how His intended bride would bear the trial of a little disappointment: and moreover to fulfil the prophecies. And can we be disappointed again? No, no, there is not between the lids of the Bible a single text that I know of intimating a second disappointment to the waiting, lonesome and mourning bride. When I view things as they are on one hand, my soul is pained within me; but when I look on the other hand, my soul is filled with "joy unspeakable and full of glory!" Yes I think we have reason to expect the heavenly summons every moment. Glory to God, Hallelujah. Amen.

Yours,
expecting the Lord in 1854,
Stephen Braley.

Edinburgh Centre, March 12, 1854.

Bro. Merriam:—I am glad a Brother has ordered the Crisis to be sent here.—Although poor and unworthy, I praise God for the truth which it contains. It is truly like water to the parched ground. Yea, it is like a stream of water in the desert.—Can it be possible that in a few months Jesus will come, when every eye shall see him? Yea, verily, those who peirced him shall see him. But who shall abide the day of his coming? And who shall stand when he appeareth? May God enable us to be wise as Lot, and escape the fires of the last day.

From your unworthy
Brother in Christ,
H. H. Stoddard.

West Alton, Apirl 25th, 1854.

Bro. Merriam:—Though a stranger to me personally, I recognize you as a brother in the Lord. I wish to give through the Crisis, a little sketch of the revival in this place The Lord has done a great work here. There have been some over thirty turned from dead works to newness of life. There have been fourteen baptized by Bro. D. Levitt, one by Bro. O. G. Smith. But O! we would that some more might flee to Christ ere the storm bursts upon them. The day is not far distant when we must stand before the Judge of all the earth.

O Christian, wake from sleeping,
And let your works abound;
Be watching, praying, weeping,
For soon the trump will sound.

O sinners, hear the warning,
To Jesus quickly fly;
Then you on that blest morning,
May meet him in the sky.

Your brother in belief of speedy deliverance.

Moses G. Blaisdell.

Magog, C. E., March 15th, 1854.

Dear Brethren and Sisters:—It is my prayer to God, that we may live "by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord; and if we do, I believe we shall know the time; for God says, "the wise shall understand;" and if we live on that word, we are prepared to try to understand; but if we believe we cannot understand, or think it is no matter whether we understand or not, we shall not investigate the subject. A man will not humble himself before God, and ask Him to forgive his sins, till he sees the need of it. I want the truth, for I know it is that which will judge me in the last day. It is my prayer to God that we may live like little children, at the foot of the cross; and that it may be more than our meat and drink to live with an eye single to the glory of God.

The Great Anti-Christian Power,

AS REPRESENTED BY

DANIEL, CHRIST, PAUL AND JOHN.

By J. Couch.

"When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand:)"—Matt. 24: 15.

Next we inquire, what is the character of this Woman or Church? She is represented in the visions of John under the character of a HARLOT, and as having unlawful connection with the kings of the earth. From this it appears, that the Church symbolized will have unlawful intercourse with the kings of the earth.

The Church is represented in scripture as being espoused to Christ, to be presented "without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing," before His presence with exceeding joy at His second glorious appearing, when the marriage relation will be consummated in the kingdom of heaven, at what is termed the marriage of the Lamb. Says Paul; "I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ." (2 Cor. 11: 2). During the time of this espousal the Church is represented as being under the control of Christ, governed by his law, and subject in all things to His authority, as the wife is to her husband. Says the Apostle; "Wives submit yourselves unto your own husbands as unto the Lord; for the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the Church, and He is the Savior of the body." (Eph. 5: 22, 23). As the scripture shows the true Church to be in submission to Christ as her legitimate sovereign and Lawgiver in matters of faith and practice, whenever she turns away from her sovereign Head, and submits to the dictation of earthly monarchs, allowing them to control her faith and religious worship, her character becomes changed from virgin purity to pollution. She is no longer the "chaste virgin" espoused to Christ, but the vile "harlot" committing "fornication with the kings of the earth." A distinctive appellation has been given to this Church, in the language of inspiration, which marks the prominent characteristics of this Church; viz.: "MOTHER OF HARLOTS AND ABOMINATIONS of the earth." We learn from the character of the offspring, the character of the Mother, for the term mother expresses a family relation; i. e. an intimate connection, or resemblance between them, both participating the same nature. Thus the mother of a French family is herself one of the French nation. So of an English family—the mother must herself be English. Thus as the daughters of this Woman (Church) are Harlots, and abominations of the earth, so also must the Mother be a Harlot and an abomination. As we have already shown, the Woman is the same with the mouth of the Beast in the 13th ch. and the eyes and mouth of the horn, Dan. 7th, and the abomination of Dan. 11th and 12th, and the abomination to which Christ referred in Matt. 24.

As Christ shows us that the elect (people of God) will suffer great tribulation when the abomination stands in the holy place, Daniel in the 11th ch. shows us that the people that do know their God shall fall by the sword and by flame, by captivity and by spoil, many days; and from the 7th of Dan. it appears, when the horn having eyes and a mouth rules, he shall wear out the saints for "a time, times and the dividing of time;" and John shows in Rev. 13th, that the Beast having a mouth given unto him, shall make war with the saints and shall overcome them; and in the 17th ch. that the Woman while seated upon the Beast is "drunken with the blood of the saints, and the martyrs of Jesus."

Therefore we conclude that this Woman represents the same organization which our Savior referred to as the abomination spoken of by Daniel the prophet.

It appears from the symbols used, in which she is denominated the mother of harlots, that it is the first of the Christian Churches that has had unlawful connection with the governments of earth. As this church is the Mother of Harlots, and consequently the oldest of corrupt churches; others are corrupted through her influence and example; but she could not herself have been thus contaminated through the influence and example of her predecessors; for if there had been any previously existing, she could not have been appropriately designated as the mother of harlots. We therefore conclude, that on her first organization, she received her doctrines of faith, and principles of action from Christ as the Head of the Church; but afterwards apostatized from her high and holy position, and adopted the maxims of worldly policy and self aggrandizement, till she becomes thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the world. She then looks to the governments of earth for royal honors and legislative enactments, that would elevate her to supremacy as mistress of the world. These are the principles of action which constituted her a Harlot; and these acts were the first examples of a Christian Church, whose influence has constituted others Harlots like herself.—That this Church is an apostate is evident from Dan. 11, where he treats upon the same subject, inasmuch as he affirms that they "FORSAKE the holy covenant;" and Paul says, "that day shall not come except there come a FALLING AWAY first, and that man of sin be revealed," showing that the revelation of the "man of sin," was the result of the falling away from the Gospel of Christ.

We now inquire, what particular organization is intended by the Woman seated upon the Beast. This we may learn by the interpretation of the symbols given by the Angel, and the application of those facts to history.

The Woman is presented in the symbols as being seated on a Beast with seven heads. These heads are interpreted by the Angel to represent "seven mountains," and also "seven kings," or kingdoms.—As the interpretation must be literally applied, the mountains must define her geographical position, and the kingdoms her political position. But the Woman is explained to be "THAT GREAT CITY, which reigneth over the kings of the earth." This also being an interpretation of the symbol, must be taken in its literal sense. Therefore we may expect to find the walls and buildings of the city resting upon seven mountains, which are also the residence of its inhabitants. We now inquire if a city can be found whose geographical position corresponds to the prophecy, being located on seven mountains. It is well known that the city of Rome, in Italy has received the classical appellation of "the seven-hilled city;" because it was built on seven mountains viz.

But some one may inquire if this be a literal city, how she can be represented as seated on seven governments. To this we would reply that when a city is spoken of, we refer not only to its walls and buildings, but also to its inhabitants. Therefore we say, a city is burned, meaning its buildings—a city is in distress referring to its inhabitants. To illustrate this subject further we quote from the Savior's remarks, (Luke 19: 41-44) "And when he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it, saying, if thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes. For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side, and shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another; because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation." In speaking of Jerusalem, it is evident Jesus referred to the inhabitants when he said, "if thou hadst known," &c., and to the walls and buildings when he said, "I will lay thee even with the ground." Therefore when the Woman is said to be seated on seven governments, we understand it to signify that the people of Rome, personated by the Woman, are sustained in their civil and ecclesiastical institutions by those seven governments. To this it may be objected, that we have proved the Woman to represent a Church; but no entire Church was resident at Rome. The metropolis of a people, or capital of a government, whether civil or ecclesiastical, is often taken as the representative of the entire people associated in that government, as in Gal. 4: 22-25; "For it is written, that Abraham had two sons, the one by a bondmaid, the other by a freewoman. But he who was of the bondwoman was born after the flesh; but he of the freewoman was by promise. Which things are an allegory; for these are the two covenants; the one from the mount Sinai, which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar. For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia, and answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children." Jerusalem is here referred to as the capital of that people embraced in the first covenant, and includes all the subjects of that covenant whether residents in Jerusalem or elsewhere.

Agreeably to this principle, the head of the Babylonian or Chaldean Empire was always denominated "king of Babylon," because Babylon was the metropolis of that Empire.

The same is true of Rome. Every part and parcel of the Roman Empire, together with its subjects and laws, were all embraced in the term Rome. We find that Paul, although a native of Tarsus, reckoned himself a Roman, and therefore claimed protection of the Roman Government. This fact illustrates the civil organization of Rome in reference to the point in question, and the same principle holds good in reference to its ecclesiastical organization as is seen in the case of Jerusalem. From these facts, in connection with the symbols, it is evident, that Rome is represented as the Capital of an ecclesiastical organization, or Church; and that the Officers of that Church would reside at Rome as the seat of an ecclesiastical government, as the Officers of the Jewish polity resided at Jerusalem.

We now inquire, is Rome the capital of an ecclesiastical government, and the residence of its ruling Officers? It is, as all will admit, the capital of the Roman Catholic Church, and the residence of the Pope and Cardinals, who sustain the highest offices in that Church.

As the heads of this Beast represent not only the geographical location by which we may identify the Church referred to, but also its political position, we learn that this Church is to be sustained in an exalted position by the several governments symbolized by the seven heads. We have already shown that this Beast symbolizes the same power as the Beast in the 13th ch., and the same as the little horn of Dan. 7th, and that that horn represents the Greek kingdom. But why does Daniel give us but one king, (or kingdom), when John presents seven? There is a principle running through the divine economy, that whenever a revelation is made in reference to a given subject, at different times, the clearest light and most full and perfect development is always given last. Therefore Daniel gives a partial development of the truth, and John gives additional light, and a more enlarged view of the same subject. Hence Daniel describes particularly the government with which the apostate Church was first connected, while John delineates the history of the Church in different stages, and in its connection with different governments.

We now inquire, what relation the Church sustains to the civil government, as presented in the symbols.

1. It has eyes to see for the state, therefore it will have spiritual discernment to decide what doctrines shall be believed and [illegible] by the state.

2. It has a mouth to speak for the state; but we have shown that instead of speaking for God, it speaks blasphemies against God; we may therefore expect to find the state legalizing the proclamation of false doctrines by the teachers of that Church.

3. There will be a mutual understanding between this Church and the state on points of religious faith and ecclesiastical government, as expressed in Dan. 11: 30, "He shall return, and have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant."

4. The Woman is represented as being seated on the Beast. This implies that the Church will be sustained in an exalted position by the state—that the civil power will submit to her dictation in matters of faith and worship, and thus enable her to accomplish her own selfish purposes of worldly aggrandizement.

5. This Church represented by the city is to "reign over the kings of the earth," i. e. the ecclesiastical rulers in this Church will claim power above the rulers in the civil governments. The political governments with which the Church is connected, as represented by the symbols, will be under the influence of the Church as far as their legislation affects matters of faith and religious worship, and will be so far controlled as to protect that Church to the exclusion of all others in its peculiar ecclesiastical laws and institutions.

Here it will be seen that the 337th year of the era of Nabonassar begins Dec. 7th, B. C. 411. (Lest some should not understand, I will here say, that Dec. 7th began the Solar year then, as Jan. 1st begins it now.)

Now as we have seen that the 20th year of the the Peloponnesian war did begin in March, B. C. 412, and the Solar year, and the 337th year of the era of Nabonassar, begins Dec. 7th, B. C. 411, we see that Ptolemy has deprived himself of the privilege of making any part of the 13th year of the personal reign of Darius Nothus synchronize with the 20th year of the war; for the 20th year of the war ends in March, B. C. 411, and we have seen that according to Ptolemy, the 13th year of his personal reign did not begin till Aug. 7, B. C. 411, nearly six months after the 20th year of the war ended. So much for the mathematical Canon of Claudius Ptolemy.

It will be seen by the foregoing that Ptolemy has allowed too much time to the reign of Cambyses; and that if he reigned any more than seven years it must have been conjointly with his father; Sir Walter Raleigh intimates that he was associated with his father in the government at home, while his father was abroad, in pursuit of foreign conquests; and that the building of the Temple was hindered by his means, even in his father's life-time. He also says that Cambyses invaded Egypt in the fifth year of his sole reign, which was the third year of the sixty-third Olympiad, or B. C. 525. He likewise says that "Cambyses with the magi reigned eight years." This I believe will be found to be correct, for I think Cambyses' personal reign alone was a little short of seven years; and Smerdis' seven months, and Maraphis, and Artaphrenes six months, to reach to the end of the year B. C. 522.

Now as we have discovered an error in the Canon of Ptolemy, between the eclipse in the seventh year of Cambyses, and that in the 31st of Darius Hystaspes, and as that error covers only a part of a year, we must look ahead very critically to find the other part; for it is as true that there is one whole year, in Ptolemy's computations too much, as that there is a part of one.

We find some historians who put all the magians' time with Cambyses, and some none; some put two or more of them with Darius Hystaspes, and some none; I think it is reasonable to suppose that Darius Hystaspes reigned personally no more than thirty-five years. But we will present a table of the reigns of the Persian kings, far enough to cover the ground which we have taken, against Ptolemy, and present every eclipse in the whole era of the Persian kings, as far as we go, and see how we come out, after fixing Darius Hystaspes' reign at 35 years; but first, I will quote a passage or two, in anticipation of the 20th year of Artaxerxes. "And it came to pass in the month Chisleu, in the 20th year, as I was in Shushan the palace, that Hanani, one of my brethren, came, he and certain men of Judah; and I asked them concerning the Jews that had escaped, which were left of the captivity, and concerning Jerusalem."

"And they said unto me, the remnant that are left of the captivity there in the province, are in great affliction and reproach; the wall of Jerusalem also is broken down, and the gates thereof are burned with fire," Neh. 1: 1, 2, 3.

"And it came to pass in the month Nisan, in the 20th year of Artaxerxes the King," (Neh 2: 1,) that he sent Nehemiah to Jerusalem, with a commandment to build it.

Prince says, (page 36 Chron. N. Eng.) "Ninth month Chisleu, Nehemiah informed of the wretched state of Judea and Jerusalem. First month Nisan, he is appointed to rebuild the city, and made governor of Judea, for twelve years." "By comparing those two articles it seems that Artaxerxes began his reign between Nisan and Chisleu," both are in his 20th year, and Chisleu the ninth passes away first, that is, before the arrival of the first Jewish month. By this it appears that Xerxes was murdered before his 21st year was filled up; for Chisleu nearly answers to our Dec. and Nisan to our Apr. so then between April, and Dec. Artaxerxes began to reign; this we find by inspiration.

We will now give a table of the same years that we have presented; from the seventh year of Cambyses, to the thirteenth year of Darius Nothus; which we feel assured is supported by Inspiration, Astronomy, History, Chronology, and Prophecy.

Jan. 2, B. C. 523, Cambyses 7th year began, and it is marked by a Lunar Eclipse July 17th.

Jan. 1st, 522, Smerdis, Maraphis and Artaphrenes begin, and reign one year.

Jan. 1, Darius Hystaspes begins to reign.

C. 411, Dec. 7th.

The monster is dead! Glory to God! Ptolemy's canon is broken to fragments, and lies bleeding at the foot of the cross of Christ! "So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord." "In all these things we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us."

O my brethren, will you not come up, "to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty?" Will you renew your enlistment in the army of the great King? "Will you fit now and go with Him to the Battle of the Great Day of God Almighty?"

I thank our late lamented brother Prince, and our beloved brother Bliss, for their invaluable services, during this campaign; for they have (though unconsciously,) been spies for us, in the enemy's Camp, and hence rendered us essential aid, by giving us a full and complete description of the whole garrison.

Ask not the question, who wrote this; but reserve that enquiry till we meet.—No glory, no praise to the writer; who seeks not the honor of the world, but the glory of God. As well might the pen of an eminent author, rise up in his hand, and say, "I wrote that;" as for me to say, I did this. But if ever a passage of scripture was wholly fulfilled, it can be found in 1. Cor. 1: 27, 28. But with the help of Mr Great-Heart, and Mr. Valiant, and our great Captain-general at our head, we can accomplish wonders; so much for the encouragement of those who have buckled on the whole armor of God.

It will be seen by comparing the foregoing tables, that in the latter, every eclipse, and every synchronism, adjusts in as natural and as easy a manner, as if it was the ancient register itself; there is nothing forced, nor crowded, nothing drawn out to any extreme length; no variances between the reigns of the kings, and no time, but what is accounted for; all are Solar years; every day is accounted for, and the whole Chronology as far as we have gone, is nailed by eclipses, and synchronisms; and the whole comes together like a box; and there it is fixed, and there is no evading it; and if it is not demonstration as strong as any mathematical certainty can be, then I know not what the science is; and glory to God, I have found the starting point of Daniel's vision, and have followed it by a thread, from period to period, from one end to the other, and less than a whole year will tell the story. O how have I crept, through places so narrow that before I got to them it has often appeared as though I could never get through them; but when I arrived at those places I always found them to be just wide enough for the events to transpire; and the [illegible]

The Great Anti-Christian Power,

AS REPRESENTED BY

DANIEL, CHRIST, PAUL AND JOHN.

By J. Couch.

"When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand:)"—Matt. 24: 15.

Next we inquire, what is the character of this Woman or Church? She is represented in the visions of John under the character of a HARLOT, and as having unlawful connection with the kings of the earth. From this it appears, that the Church symbolized will have unlawful intercourse with the kings of the earth.

The Church is represented in scripture as being espoused to Christ, to be presented "without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing," before His presence with exceeding joy at His second glorious appearing, when the marriage relation will be consummated in the kingdom of heaven, at what is termed the marriage of the Lamb. Says Paul; "I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ." (2 Cor. 11: 2). During the time of this espousal the Church is represented as being under the control of Christ, governed by his law, and subject in all things to His authority, as the wife is to her husband. Says the Apostle; "Wives submit yourselves unto your own husbands as unto the Lord; for the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the Church, and He is the Savior of the body." (Eph. 5: 22, 23). As the scripture shows the true Church to be in submission to Christ as her legitimate sovereign and Lawgiver in matters of faith and practice, whenever she turns away from her sovereign Head, and submits to the dictation of earthly monarchs, allowing them to control her faith and religious worship, her character becomes changed from virgin purity to pollution. She is no longer the "chaste virgin" espoused to Christ, but the vile "harlot" committing "fornication with the kings of the earth." A distinctive appellation has been given to this Church, in the language of inspiration, which marks the prominent characteristics of this Church; viz.: "MOTHER OF HARLOTS AND ABOMINATIONS of the earth." We learn from the character of the offspring, the character of the Mother, for the term mother expresses a family relation; i. e. an intimate connection, or resemblance between them, both participating the same nature. Thus the mother of a French family is herself one of the French nation. So of an English family—the mother must herself be English. Thus as the daughters of this Woman (Church) are Harlots, and abominations of the earth, so also must the Mother be a Harlot and an abomination. As we have already shown, the Woman is the same with the mouth of the Beast in the 13th ch. and the eyes and mouth of the horn, Dan. 7th, and the abomination of Dan. 11th and 12th, and the abomination to which Christ referred in Matt. 24.

As Christ shows us that the elect (people of God) will suffer great tribulation when the abomination stands in the holy place, Daniel in the 11th ch. shows us that the people that do know their God shall fall by the sword and by flame, by captivity and by spoil, many days; and from the 7th of Dan. it appears, when the horn having eyes and a mouth rules, he shall wear out the saints for "a time, times and the dividing of time;" and John shows in Rev. 13th, that the Beast having a mouth given unto him, shall make war with the saints and shall overcome them; and in the 17th ch. that the Woman while seated upon the Beast is "drunken with the blood of the saints, and the martyrs of Jesus."

Therefore we conclude that this Woman represents the same organization which our Savior referred to as the abomination spoken of by Daniel the prophet, which she is denominated the mother of harlots, that it is the first of the Christian Churches that has had unlawful connection with the governments of earth. As this church is the Mother of Harlots, and consequently the oldest of corrupt churches; others are corrupted through her influence and example; but she could not herself have been thus contaminated through the influence and example of her predecessors; for if there had been any previously existing, she could not have been appropriately designated as the mother of harlots. We therefore conclude, that on her first organization, she received her doctrines of faith, and principles of action from Christ as the Head of the Church; but afterwards apostatized from her high and holy position, and adopted the maxims of worldly policy and self aggrandizement, till she becomes thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the world. She then looks to the governments of earth for royal honors and legislative enactments, that would elevate her to supremacy as mistress of the world. These are the principles of action which constituted her a Harlot; and these acts were the first examples of a Christian Church, whose influence has constituted others Harlots like herself.—That this Church is an apostate is evident from Dan. 11, where he treats upon the same subject, inasmuch as he affirms that they "FORSAKE the holy covenant;" and Paul says, "that day shall not come except there come a FALLING AWAY first, and that man of sin be revealed," showing that the revelation of the "man of sin," was the result of the falling away from the Gospel of Christ.

We now inquire, what particular organization is intended by the Woman seated upon the Beast. This we may learn by the interpretation of the symbols given by the Angel, and the application of those facts to history.

The Woman is presented in the symbols as being seated on a Beast with seven heads. These heads are interpreted by the Angel to represent "seven mountains," and also "seven kings," or kingdoms.—As the interpretation must be literally applied, the mountains must define her geographical position, and the kingdoms her political position. But the Woman is explained to be "THAT GREAT CITY, which reigneth over the kings of the earth." This also being an interpretation of the symbol, must be taken in its literal sense. Therefore we may expect to find the walls and buildings of the city resting upon seven mountains, which are also the residence of its inhabitants. We now inquire if a city can be found whose geographical position corresponds to the prophecy, being located on seven mountains. It is well known that the city of Rome, in Italy has received the classical appellation of "the seven-hilled city;" because it was built on seven mountains viz.

But some one may inquire if this be a literal city, how she can be represented as seated on seven governments. To this we would reply that when a city is spoken of, we refer not only to its walls and buildings, but also to its inhabitants. Therefore we say, a city is burned, meaning its buildings—a city is in distress referring to its inhabitants. To illustrate this subject further we quote from the Savior's remarks, (Luke 19: 41-44) "And when he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it, saying, if thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes. For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side, and shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another; because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation." In speaking of Jerusalem, it is evident Jesus referred to the inhabitants when he said, "if thou hadst known," &c., and to the walls and buildings when he said, "I will lay thee even with the ground." Therefore when the Woman is said to be seated on seven governments, we understand it to signify that the people of Rome, personated by the Woman, are sustained in those seven governments. To this it may be objected, that we have proved the Woman to represent a Church; but no entire Church was resident at Rome. The metropolis of a people, or capital of a government, whether civil or ecclesiastical, is often taken as the representative of the entire people associated in that government, as in Gal. 4: 22-25; "For it is written, that Abraham had two sons, the one by a bondmaid, the other by a freewoman. But he who was of the bondwoman was born after the flesh; but he of the freewoman was by promise. Which things are an allegory; for these are the two covenants; the one from the mount Sinai, which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar. For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia, and answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children." Jerusalem is here referred to as the capital of that people embraced in the first covenant, and includes all the subjects of that covenant whether residents in Jerusalem or elsewhere.

Agreeably to this principle, the head of the Babylonian or Chaldean Empire was always denominated "king of Babylon," because Babylon was the metropolis of that Empire.

The same is true of Rome. Every part and parcel of the Roman Empire, together with its subjects and laws, were all embraced in the term Rome. We find that Paul, although a native of Tarsus, reckoned himself a Roman, and therefore claimed protection of the Roman Government. This fact illustrates the civil organization of Rome in reference to the point in question, and the same principle holds good in reference to its ecclesiastical organization as is seen in the case of Jerusalem. From these facts, in connection with the symbols, it is evident, that Rome is represented as the Capital of an ecclesiastical organization, or Church; and that the Officers of that Church would reside at Rome as the seat of an ecclesiastical government, as the Officers of the Jewish polity resided at Jerusalem.

We now inquire, is Rome the capital of an ecclesiastical government, and the residence of its ruling Officers? It is, as all will admit, the capital of the Roman Catholic Church, and the residence of the Pope and Cardinals, who sustain the highest offices in that Church.

As the heads of this Beast represent not only the geographical location by which we may identify the Church referred to, but also its political position, we learn that this Church is to be sustained in an exalted position by the several governments symbolized by the seven heads. We have already shown that this Beast symbolizes the same power as the Beast in the 13th ch., and the same as the little horn of Dan. 7th, and that that horn represents the Greek kingdom. But why does Daniel give us but one king, (or kingdom), when John presents seven? There is a principle running through the divine economy, that whenever a revelation is made in reference to a given subject, at different times, the clearest light and most full and perfect development is always given last. Therefore Daniel gives a partial development of the truth, and John gives additional light, and a more enlarged view of the same subject. Hence Daniel describes particularly the government with which the apostate Church was first connected, while John delineates the history of the Church in different stages, and in its connection with different governments.

We now inquire, what relation the Church sustains to the civil government, as presented in the symbols.

1. It has eyes to see for the state, therefore it will have spiritual discernment to decide what doctrines shall be believed and [illegible] by the state.

2. It has a mouth to speak for the state; but we have shown that instead of speaking for God, it speaks blasphemies against God; we may therefore expect to find the state legalizing the proclamation of false doctrines by the teachers of that Church.

3. There will be a mutual understanding between this Church and the state on points of religious faith and ecclesiastical government, as expressed in Dan. 11: 30. "He shall return, and have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant."

4. The Woman is represented as being seated on the Beast. This implies that the Church will be sustained in an exalted position by the state—that the civil power will submit to her dictation in matters of faith and worship, and thus enable her to accomplish her own selfish purposes of worldly aggrandizement.

5. This Church represented by the city is to "reign over the kings of the earth," i. e. the ecclesiastical rulers in this Church will claim power above the rulers in the civil governments. The political governments with which the Church is connected, as represented by the symbols, will be under the influence of the Church as far as their legislation affects matters of faith and religious worship, and will be so far controlled as to protect that Church to the exclusion of all others in its peculiar ecclesiastical laws and institutions.

Here it will be seen that the 337th year of the era of Nabonassar begins Dec. 7th, B. C. 411. (Lest some should not understand, I will here say, that Dec. 7th began the Solar year then, as Jan. 1st begins it now.)

Now as we have seen that the 20th year of the the Peloponnesian war did begin in March, B. C. 412, and the Solar year, and the 337th year of the era of Nabonassar, begins Dec. 7th, B. C. 411, we see that Ptolemy has deprived himself of the privilege of making any part of the 13th year of the personal reign of Darius Nothus synchronize with the 20th year of the war; for the 20th year of the war ends in March, B. C. 411, and we have seen that according to Ptolemy, the 13th year of his personal reign did not begin till Aug. 7, B. C. 411, nearly six months after the 20th year of the war ended. So much for the mathematical Canon of Claudius Ptolemy.

It will be seen by the foregoing that Ptolemy has allowed too much time to the reign of Cambyses; and that if he reigned any more than seven years it must have been conjointly with his father; Sir Walter Raleigh intimates that he was associated with his father in the government at home, while his father was abroad, in pursuit of foreign conquests; and that the building of the Temple was hindered by his means, even in his father's life-time. He also says that Cambyses invaded Egypt in the fifth year of his sole reign, which was the third year of the sixty-third Olympiad, or B. C. 525. He likewise says that "Cambyses with the magi reigned eight years." This I believe will be found to be correct, for I think Cambyses' personal reign alone was a little short of seven years; and Smerdis' seven months, and Maraphis, and Artaphrenes six months, to reach to the end of the year B. C. 522.

Now as we have discovered an error in the Canon of Ptolemy, between the eclipse in the seventh year of Cambyses, and that in the 31st of Darius Hystaspes, and as that error covers only a part of a year, we must look ahead very critically to find the other part; for it is as true that there is one whole year, in Ptolemy's computations too much, as that there is a part of one.

We find some historians who put all the magians' time with Cambyses, and some none; some put two or more of them with Darius Hystaspes, and some none; I think it is reasonable to suppose that Darius Hystaspes reigned personally no more than thirty-five years. But we will present a table of the reigns of the Persian kings, far enough to cover the ground which we have taken against Ptolemy, and present every eclipse in this whole era of the Persian kings, as far as we go, and see how we come out, after fixing Darius Hystaspes' reign at 35 years; but first, I will quote a passage or two, in anticipation of the 20th year of Artaxerxes. "And it came to pass in the month Chisleu, in the 20th year, as I was in Shushan the palace, that Hanani, one of my brethren, came, he and certain men of Judah; and I asked them concerning the Jews that had escaped, which were left of the captivity, and concerning Jerusalem."

"And they said unto me, the remnant that are left of the captivity there in the province; are in great affliction and reproach; the wall of Jerusalem also is broken down, and the gates thereof are burned with fire," Neh. 1: 1, 2, 3.

"And it came to pass in the month Nisan, in the 20th year of Artaxerxes the King," (Neh 2: 1,) that he sent Nehemiah to Jerusalem, with a commandment to build it.

Prince says, (page 36 Chron. N. Eng.) "Ninth month Chisleu, Nehemiah informed of the wretched state of Judea and Jerusalem. First month Nisan, he is appointed to rebuild the city, and made governor of Judea, for twelve years." "By comparing those two articles it seems that Artaxerxes began his reign between Nisan and Chisleu," both are in his 20th year, and Chisleu the ninth passes away first, that is, before the arrival of the first Jewish month. By this it appears that Xerxes was murdered before his 21st year was filled up; for Chisleu nearly answers to our Dec. and Nisan to our Apr. so then between April, and Dec. Artaxerxes began to reign; this we find by inspiration.

We will now give a table of the same years that we have presented; from the seventh year of Cambyses, to the thirteenth year of Darius Nothus; which we feel assured is supported by Inspiration, Astronomy, History, Chronology, and Prophecy.

Jan. 2, B. C. 523, Cambyses 7th year began, and it is marked by a Lunar Eclipse July 17th.

Jan. 1st, 522, Smerdis, Maraphis and Artaphrenes begin, and reign one year.

Jan. 1, Darius Hystaspes begins to reign.

It will be seen by the foregoing tables, that the 20th year of the Peloponnesian war began in March B. C. 412; and that the 13th year of Darius Nothus began Aug. 7th, B. C. 412; and that both fall into B. C. 411 in Dec. after, so that the Persian lieutenant, Tissaphernes, and the Peloponnesians had ample time all the following winter, to execute their treaty, in the 20th year of the war; and in the 13th year of Darius Nothus; and in the 337th of the era of Nabonassar; for that year of the era began with the Solar year, B. C. 411, Dec. 7th.

The monster is dead! Glory to God! Ptolemy's canon is broken to fragments, and lies bleeding at the foot of the cross of Christ! "So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord."—"In all these things we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us."

O my brethren will you not come up, to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty? Will you renew your enlistment in the army of the great King? "Will you fit now and go with Him to the Battle of the Great Day of God Almighty?"

I thank our late lamented brother Prince, and our beloved brother Bliss, for their invaluable services, during this campaign; for they have (though unconsciously) been spies for us, in the enemy's Camp, and hence rendered us essential aid, by giving us a full and complete description of the whole garrison.

Ask not the question, who wrote this? but reserve that enquiry till we meet.—No glory, no praise to the writer; who seeks not the honor of the world, but the glory of God. As well might the pen of an eminent author, rise up in his hand, and say "I wrote that;" as for me, to say, I did this. But if ever a passage of scripture was wholly fulfilled, it can be found in 1. Cor. 1: 27, 28. But with the help of Mr Great-Heart, and Mr. Valiant, and our great Captain-general at our head, we can accomplish wonders; so much for the encouragement of those who have buckled on the whole armor of God.

It will be seen by comparing the foregoing tables, that in the latter, every eclipse, and every synchronism, adjusts in as natural and as easy a manner, as if it was the ancient register itself; there is nothing forced, nor crowded, nothing drawn out to any extreme length; no variances between the reigns of the kings, and no time, but what is accounted for; all are Solar years; every day is accounted for, and the whole Chronology as far as we have gone, is nailed by eclipses, and synchronisms; and the whole comes together like a box; and there it is fixed, and there is no evading it; and if it is not demonstrated as strong as any mathematical certainty can be, then I know not what the science is; and glory to God, I have found the starting point of Daniel's vision, and have followed it by a thread, from period to period, from one end to the other, and less than a whole year will tell the story. O, how have I crept, through places so narrow that before I got to them it has often appeared as though I could never get through them; but when I arrived at those places, I always found them to be just wide enough for the [illegible] en, which I discovered on the cross, I shall never forget.

"O Earth, Earth, EARTH," Hear the word of the Lord; "unto two thousand, and three hundred days; then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed." "At the time appointed, the End shall be;" "At the time of the End, shall be the vision." From the last commandment to restore and build Jerusalem, in the 20th year of Artaxerxes, which I have proved to have been in 446 B. C., in the first Jewish month; (Neh. 2: 1,) the 2300 days reach to the first Jewish month of 1855, when the Sanctuary will be cleansed." "The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout; with the voice of the Archangel, and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ, shall rise first;" "we shall not all sleep, but we shall be changed:" "In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible and we shall be changed." "Then we which are alive, shall be caught up together to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord." "And the Kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the Kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the most high: whose Kingdom is an everlasting Kingdom; and all dominions shall serve and obey Him."

The World's Crisis.

LOWELL, MAY 31, 1854.

The New Birth.

We often receive communications, such as the following, requesting light on particular subjects, which we respond to soon as practicable:

Brother Merriam:—I wish you would inform your readers whether the new birth is at conversion, or the resurrection.—There are many opinions about it. I want to know the truth. Please publish it immediately. Yours in love,

A Friend.

Some Brethren have taken the ground, that in this life the Christian is appropriately spoken of, as being begotten by the word of God; but that the new birth is consummated at the resurrection of the just. On such points, not involving vital principles of the Gospel, we should never indulge a spirit of contention, but express our understanding of the word in meekness and simplicity of heart. I do not feel in the least dogmatical on the subject; but as my views are requested, I feel bound to present the truth agreeably to my understanding of Bible teaching.

In the first place let me say, figures are not to be regarded in the same light as literal facts. If the Scripture should present the history of a literal fact, e. g. a wedding, wherever a reference was made to that nuptial ceremony, the parties would be invariably the same—the bridegroom, bride, friend of the bridegroom, servants, virgins going forth to meet the bridal pair, must, in each case, be the same individuals. Neither the persons nor the circumstances could at all change—the whole scene would be the same, wherever alluded to in scripture, because it is a literal occurrence. But it is sometimes the case, that figures change. Hence in Matt. 25, where the marriage of the Lamb is alluded to, the Church is represented by ten Virgins. In Luke 12: 36, the Church are represented by "servants that wait for their Lord when He will return from the wedding, that when He cometh and knocketh, they may open unto Him immediately." Here let me remark, that much error and confusion was introduced into our ranks in years past, in consequence of Brethren not understanding the proper distinction between figures and facts; and taking this representation as if it were a literal occurrence, they believed the marriage of the Lamb must be consummated prior to His return to earth. Whereas it is merely an emblem taken from the vigilance of servants in ancient times, to give their master a ready reception, to present the duty of watchfulness on the part of the Church, that they may be ready to welcome their returning Lord when He shall come in the glory of His kingdom.

Again, John the Baptist, who was identified with the Church of Christ, is represented (John 3: 29) as "the friend of the Bridegroom." Once more in 2 Cor. 11: 2, and in Rev. 19: 8, 9, the Church is represented as the Bride of Christ; for inasmuch as the Bride is here said to be "arrayed in fine linen, clean and white; for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints," it is evident the saints, or the Church, is the Bride of Christ. So that the people of God are presented under various emblems in connection with the marriage of the Lamb, viz.: as Virgins, Servants, Friend of the Bridegroom and Bride. Thus by a variety of the most beautiful and striking symbols language could furnish, the position of the Church is presented, and the duties devolving on her are enforced. But the moment we regard such figurative descriptions as fixed facts, as the politicians say, we are in danger of imbibing false notions of scripture truth, and plunging into fanciful ideas that lead to a wrong construction of the word.

Now in regard to the point in question, it is clear, that the passage in Is. 66: 8 refers to a birth of the saints at the resurrection. But the passage in Titus 3: 4–7 cannot refer to the resurrection. It reads thus: "But after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man appeared, not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost; which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour; that being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life." This regeneration, i. e. new birth, brings the child of God into a state of justification by grace, and constitutes him, not a proprietor, but an heir to the inheritance among the saints in light.—This washing of regeneration, or renewing of the Holy Ghost, then shed on the Church abundantly, can be no other than conversion to Christ. In 1 Pet. 1: 3, we read: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." The regeneration here referred to, is not conversion in the ordinary acceptation of the terms, but simply a renewing or reviving of their hope.

I am not aware that the New Testament any where speaks of the new birth, or regeneration, as having reference to the resurrection of the dead. The idea generally conveyed by it is, according to my apprehension, the same as that conveyed by the adoption into the family of God.—Says the Apostle, "And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father. Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ." Gal. 4: 6, 7).—And again, "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." (Rom. 8: 14–16). It is the same as the new creature of which the Apostle speaks, "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature." (Gal. 6: 15). It beautifully illustrates the idea of a new life. As the infant is ushered into a state of existence entirely new, inhaling, for the first time, the vital air, and by its external senses becoming acquainted with material substances around, so the child of God is brought into a mode of existence, a spiritual state entirely new; he begins, for the first time, to inhale the element of the divine life; his spiritual powers take cognizance of spiritual things, all of which were neither enjoyed, nor understood, nor appreciated before.

Hence when our Saviour would convey to the mind of Nicodemus instruction respecting the inward, hidden, spiritual life, in contradistinction from the outward observances of the law, He assures him he must experience the new birth in order to see the kingdom of God; and in explanation, says, "Except a man be born of WATER and of the Spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." Surely no one will contend that being resurrected is being born of water and of the spirit.—He then proceeds to say, that "that which is born of the flesh is flesh," i. e. natural birth ushers one into a physical state of existence, "but that which is born of the Spirit is spirit," i. e. the spiritual birth ushers one into spiritual life. The two states are here contrasted; the one is a material existence, and the other a moral or spiritual state. This view appears to me perfectly clear; but it seems to my mind inappropriate, to make the flesh refer to this life, and the spirit to the life to come; for Jesus says of himself subsequently to His resurrection, "For a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have; therefore although resurrected, He had flesh and was not a spirit.

And again v. 8, "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit." How matchless the beauty and force of this comparison, as applied to the divine life; but, on the other hand, how inappropriate to illustrate the resurrection. As the agency of the wind operates powerfully on the objects of nature, causing the giant sons of the forest to bow under its influence while it is itself imperceptible to the eye, and its pathway can only be traced by its effects, just so the Spirit of God operates unseen—it is an agent unappreciable by the outward senses—its origin, its course cannot be traced by the eye; but its effects are seen in bringing down the high looks and the aspiring heart; we feel its influence, we discover its power all around us, but the agency itself is invisible to the eye.

But what propriety in this representation as applied to the resurrection from the dead? Will not the power that resurrects the saints be visible in the heavens, even the Son of man revealed in the glory of His kingdom? and will not the resurrection be an outward, visible and literal event—a physical occurrence appreciable by the senses? It seems to me, considering it in this light, the analogy entirely fails.

"Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God," (1 John 5: 1).—"Whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world," (v. 4). "If ye know that He is righteous, ye know that every one, that doeth righteousness, is born of Him," (ch. 2: 29). Here we are explicitly taught, that those who believe on Christ, who overcome the world, and work righteousness are born of God.

But there is an objection brought from this Epistle of John (ch. 3: 9) "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is born of God."—This objection is worthy of consideration; and is the only one, that I am apprized of, which to my mind has the least weight.—I understand this verse, however, as expressing, in striking contrast, and in very emphatic language, the diversity of the two natures. The children of the wicked one naturally and voluntarily commit sin, while "he that is born of God doth not commit sin;" and "he cannot sin, because he is born of God," i. e. in the same sense that the brethren of Joseph "hated him, and could not speak peaceably unto him," (Gen. 37: 4), or in other words, the bent and inclination of their minds was so obstinately set against him, that it is said, "they could not speak peaceably unto him." But this inability was simply in their disposition, or evil nature. So Jesus says, "No man can come unto me, except the Father which sent me draw him," (John 6: 44); and in another place, He says, "ye will not come unto me that ye might have life," thus expressing a moral inability lying in the will, and not a physical inability rendering it an absolute impossibility. Just so I understand this subject. The reason why one that is born of God cannot sin, is because it is repugnant to his new nature—it is contrary to his will—it would be doing violence to the divine life, the heavenly principles that control his acts. That this is the true idea, is evident from the context, incontestibly so to my mind; for in v. 7th the Apostle warns the Brethren not to be deceived, and then goes on to show them how they could discriminate between the righteous and the wicked, between those who are born of God, and those who are the offspring of Satan, pointing out the development of the two natures; one manifesting itself in the commission of sin, and the other in works of righteousness. This whole passage seems clear as the sunbeams; and I am unable to conceive how an intelligent reader of scripture can carry these developments of moral character, manifesting who is born of God, and who is of the Devil, into a future life, especially as this development consists partly in a life of faith in Christ and overcoming the world.

That this exposition is in keeping with the context is evident from v. 6. "Whosoever abideth in him sinneth not: whosoever sinneth hath not seen him, neither known him." Now it will not be maintained that in a strict and absolute sense "whosoever sinneth hath not seen Him neither known Him." If that be admitted it would conflict with many other passages of divine writ. To take an example from this Epistle, "If any man see his Brother sin a sin which is not unto death" &c. (ch. 5: 16.) This shews that one who is denominated a Brother is liable to sin after his conversion.

But it may be said, that the word rendered born should have been translated begotten, and therefore the allusion in these passages is to a future life commencing with the resurrection of the dead.

Turn to ch. 5: 18 of this Epistle, "We know that whosoever is born of God sinneth not; but he that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not."

Here we have both expressions in the same verse; and both of them from the same Greek verb, and the objector may take which position he prefers. If he contend the words have reference to a future life, and therefore should be rendered born, then inasmuch as this is the same Greek word used in the other passages refered to, he gives up the argument on the translation of the word, which of course overthrows his position. If on the other hand he contend that the words should be rendered begotten as having reference to the present life then inasmuch as this passage teaches that those who are begotten of God "sin not," and "that wicked one toucheth them not," the argument derived from the fact that those who are born of God cannot sin, is divested of all its force; so that in either case, the verse under consideration is fatal to the objections brought against the doctrine of the new-birth in the present life.

But the idea is by no means necessarily implied that a condition prior to birth is alluded to by the term begotten. In Is. 49 the Church is represented as a disconsolate widow bereaved of her children, to illustrate the destruction of the Jewish nation, who were once the covenant people of God; and then to express the enlargement of the Church under the messianic dispensation, she is represented as a joyful mother in the midst of a family, and she inquires, who hath begotten me these? In this and other passages, it is plain that the reference is not to a condition antecedent to birth; for in the next breath she says, "who hath brought up these?"

But that these expressions do not refer to the immortal state, is evident from 1 John, 3: 2; "Beloved, NOW are we the sons of God." Here another word is used in the Greek the meaning of which I think no one will deny; and this passage affirms that "now" in the present life, we are the sons of God, which implies, of course, that we have experienced the new birth—that we have been made new creatures by the spirit of God—that we have been sanctified through the washing of regeneration.

Gal. 4: 29. "But as then he that was born after the flesh, persecuted him that was born after the spirit, even so it is NOW." This passage clearly teaches that men are born as children of promise in this life; and not only so, but also that they are BORN OF THE SPIRIT in the present state. But if it be objected here that the word should have been translated begotten, and therefore refers to the Christian in the transition state from a life of sin to that of absolute perfection in the kingdom of God, all can see the impropriety of such a construction; because as the declaration is made that he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the spirit, it necessarily refers to a condition subsequent to birth. As the natural birth of him that was born after the flesh was consumated, so must the spiritual birth be, or the parallel fails.

But to settle this question forever beyond the possibility of doubt, let me refer to one more passage. Peter in his first Epistle ch. 1: 14 gives directions to the Church as obedient children, in v. 17 speaks of God as their Father, in v. 22 of the Church as a family of Brethren, and in v. 23 he says; "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever."

Then to show that the present state of the Church is not represented as a condition antecedent to birth, in the 2d v. of the next ch. he says; "As NEW BORN BABES, desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby."

Thus is the doctrine of the new birth in this life as clearly revealed to my apprehension, as any doctrine almost in the Bible. Let us, beloved Brethren be careful to separate the precious from the vile: the wheat from the chaff. We were educated in the belief of many fables, which we do well to relinquish for the truth of God; but the doctrine of regeneration by the spirit of God, by which old things pass away, and all things become new, is no cunningly devised fable. We have had rubbish of human tradition enough to remove in order to get down upon the solid rock; but let us not remove the foundations of scrpture truth for the sake of standing on a platform that is new. Let us have a substratum of Bible, and we can stand against the world.

Lowell, April 29, 1854.

How often we hear it remarked, by intelligent individuals, too, who knows what to believe? There are so many kinds of religion, so many different views, so many different interpretations of Scripture, who knows which is right? Who knows what to believe? Here, say they, stands up one, a Watchman upon the walls of Zion, to give the time of night, and to warn the people when he sees the sword coming, he proclaims that the kingdom of God is at hand, that the resurrection is to take place, and the people of God are about to be delivered, and the prophetic numbers all terminate about here, and that the present movements in Europe are precursors of events, that will usher in that great and eternal day. Another stands up in the congregation and teaches that there is no evidence that the Savior will come within one hundred or a thousand years from this time. But there were false prophets also among the people, in the law dispensation, even as there shall be false teachers among you, in the Gospel dispensation, (2 Pet. 2: 1). "And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it." (Is. 2: 2). This is the proud, exalted state of the Church in the last days. "And many people shall go and say: Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob," &c. (v. 3d). Here we have a thus saith the people, not a thus saith the Lord. And the people further say, (v. 4,) "And they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." Now when professed ministers of the gospel stand up and teach the people this prophecy, as a thus saith the Lord, in support of a temporal millenium, we regard them as false teachers, and such interpretations, as the last days'-fables. Also the prophet Micah, in his 4th chap., speaks the same language, referring to the same people, to the same proud Church, and to the same last days' fables. But we turn to the prophecy of Joel, (3: 9,) and we have a thus saith the Lord, "Proclaim ye this among the Gentiles; prepare war, wake up the mighty men, let all the men of war draw near; let them come up."—Here we see the reverse of what the people say, a thus saith the Lord, "Beat your ploughshares into swords, and your pruninghooks into spears; let the weak say I am strong," (v. 10). Have we not seen this prophecy fulfilling before our eyes, for the last seven years at least. 13th v. "Put ye in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe: come, get you down; for the press is full, the fats overflow; for their wickedness is great." This does not look like a temporal millenium. Ps. 2: 8 is often quoted in support of this theory, "Ask of me, and I shall give the heathen thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth thy possession." The popular theology interprets this of conversion, but the 9th v. says, "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." 10th v. "Be wise now therefore, O ye kings: be instructed, ye Judges of the earth." 11th v. "Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling."

According to the word of the Lord there will be a people looking for that day, and desiring it, who are doomed to a disappointment, as were the Jews in the first Advent. The Jews were looking for the Messiah to come with great majesty and power, and glory; but his humble appearance did not meet their expectations, therefore they rejected and cast him out, and crucified him; for they would not have this man to reign over them. The theory of a temporal millenium places Him as far beneath the majesty, the glory, and the power, in which he will come the second time, as their expectations exalted Him above the prophetic description at His first Advent. Hence we read in the prophecy of Amos, 5th ch. and 18th v. "Wo unto you that desire the day of the Lord! to what end is it for you? the day of the Lord is darkness, and not light."—19th v. "As if a man did flee from a lion, and a bear met him; or went into the house, and leaned his hand on the wall, and a serpent bit him." Now when we attempt to walk in any other path, than that which God designed we should pursue, we may expect to meet with great obstructions. But it may be said this was spoken to the Jews, and was fulfilled in the first advent. It may be so, but the great Antetype of that prophecy will be fulfilled in those upon whom the ends of the world have come.

There is another theory also relating to the return of the Jews to build up Jerusalem which is equally unscriptural and injurious in its influence as that of the temporal millenium. It is true God promised to bestow on that Church great blessings, provided they would keep His commandments, and do His righteous will; and on the other hand, there were great judgments threatened against them if they rebelled. But they were disobedient and uncircumcised in heart, therefore God inflicted the penalty, and poured His Judgments upon them. Those conditional promises are always quoted in support of the literal return of the Jews. We regard this language of the prophet Joel, 1: 13, as applicable to the teachers of the present day. "Gird yourselves, and lament, ye priests: howl, ye ministers of the altar: come, lie all night in sackcloth, ye ministers of my God: for the meat offering and the drink offering is withholden from the house of your God." 15th v. "Alas for the day! for the day of the Lord is at hand, and as a destruction from the Almighty shall it come. Is not the meat cut off before your eyes, yea, joy and gladness from the house of our God?" Matt. 24: 45, "Who then is a faithful and wise servant, whom his Lord hath made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season? Blessed is that servant, whom his Lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing." Also the prophet Amos testifies (ch. 3: 7), "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets." Therefore if we remain in ignorance in regard to the events and the time pointing us to the Judgment, we have no excuse.

It seems we must be considered willingly, if not willfully ignorant; for these things are revealed to his servants the prophets; and if we would have the truth we must search for it as for hid treasures. Hence the Saviour says, John 5: 39.—"Search the scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of me." Matt. 24: 15. "When ye therefore, shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, whoso readeth let him understand." There is great importance attached to this injunction, whoso readeth, concerning this abomination, let him take heed that he understands it. Turn to the reference, (Daniel 12: 11,) "And from the time the daily sacrifice shall be taken away." Here is a definite starting point for those three prophetic numbers; and we ask for no more evidence from history and prophecy, than we already have, to convince us that they commenced in the year 519; for we understand that to be the year when the true worship of God was taken away by an antichristian abomination, which arose, and was established or set up in the place of the true worship in that year. "And to the Woman were given two wings of a great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent."—(Rev. 12: 14.) "And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days," (years). Now those numbers were given for the special benefit of the church, the true people of God, that they might understand their position as they sail over the ocean of time, to the the Judgment; and they will understand it. Now let us start, as it were, from that prophetic depot, at 519, run over the track, down through the days of tribulation, (papal persecution) 1260 miles, (years) and we come to 1779. Here is a bound placed by our Saviour, which cannot be moved, and it is this: "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light," &c. And this did take place the next year, May 19th, 1780. This marks the commencement of that generation which was to witness the signs of our Lord's coming, and of the end of the world. We will now leave the depot at 1779, and run down thirty miles (years) farther, and we come to 1809. We have now arrived at the end of the 1290 years; here, (Dan. 7: 26,) the Judgment did sit, as we believe, upon that antichristian power, that papal abomination; and they took away his dominion to consume and destroy it unto the end—a gradual, progressive work, clear down to the end. We will leave this point, (1809) and run down 45 miles (years) farther, and we come to the last prophetic depot on our chart this side of the resurrection, when the prophet Daniel will stand in his lot. "Blessed is he that waiteth," (Dan. 12: 12.) How long? Till as many years expire as will bring us from 1809 to the end of the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days, (years). This 45 years is the time of the end, in which the gospel of the everlasting kingdom was to be preached to all the world for a witness. Also it is the time when the prophecy of Daniel was to be unsealed, that the light might shine upon his prophetic numbers, and upon that book that was not sealed, although not understood till the prophecy of Daniel was unsealed. Then the book of Revelation appeared plain. But where do those numbers end? According to this arrangement they must end this present year, 1854.—Here we stand upon the threshold of eternity; and the question comes to us all, are we ready? And now may grace, mercy and peace, be and abide with all who love his appearing.

IRA THOMPSON.

Editors of the Traveller :—I have received Greek papers to March 31, and from them copy the following particulars, which may interest your readers:

French or English men-of-war are cruising in the Ionian Sea, the Archipelago and the Gulf of Corinth, in order to intercept all reinforcements and ammunition, intended for the insurgents. On the first of April, while a French brig was cruising near Patras for this object, 600 Greeks crossed the gulf, by night, in boats, unperceived, and reached the opposite coast in safety, whence they proceeded towards the seat of action.

The Greeks, however, have more than daring and enthusiasm to carry them through their difficulties, they have the sympathy of those very nations whose men-of-war are arrayed against them. Two English merchant vessels that were taking their cargoes of Valonea at Karvasara, offered to transport gratuitously some insurgent troops from that port to Annino. As the boats loaded with troops were approaching, the English Captain hoisted the Greek flag and gave a salute, while the troops embarked amid the cheers and congratulations of the English tars, who expressed the greatest enthusiasm on the occasion.

The Constitutional Minos, under date of the 23d March, gives the full particulars of several engagements which took place between the Turks and Greeks, in every one of which the Greeks have been victorious, though they were generally much inferior to the Turks in number. A letter from Karaiskakes, one of the Greek chiefs, describes an engagement near Arta, at the village Peta. The Turks were about 1800 strong, and had two cannons. They attacked a body of Greeks who were entrenched in the village, and after six hours hard fighting, the Turks were compelled to retire, leaving on the field seventy dead, and the wounded were supposed to exceed 150.

On the same day another column of the Turkish garrison of Aarta attacked Grivas at the village of Gremenitza. Here also the Greeks were victorious; the particulars, however, were not yet known.

Another despatch from Jannina says that 3000 Turks, aided by a body of horse, and with several cannons, fell suddenly by night upon General Grivas, who was besieging Jannina. This General had previously stationed his troops on different important posts and passages, and at the time of the unexpected attack he had only 300 men with him, and was entrenched in the village Kutzulio. An obstinate battle took place, which lasted twelve hours and a half. "Believe me, my brother," says an eye-witness who describes the engagement, "that such fighting has never taken place before." At length the Turks withdrew, leaving behind them 300 killed. The Greeks lost 12 men and had 18 wounded.

Another engagement took place in Kanzia, in which the Turks were defeated by Capt. Kaskare.

The Bulletin du Spectateur de l'Orient, published at Athens, under date of March 31, gives the following additional news: on the 23d March, the bodies of men commanded by Pappakostas, Panuria, and other chiefs, attacked the village of Platanos, near Almiro, in which two hundred Albanians were entrenched in seventeen houses. One of these houses was set fire to by the Greeks, and the Albanians that were in it perished in the flames, the other Albanians soon after surrendered at discretion and being disarmed, they were set at liberty. A body of Turks with cavalry and artillery coming to the aid of these Albanians was also repulsed with the loss of thirty men, by the brave Pappakosta. In these two engagements the Christians lost seven men. Among these we regret to see the name of Agisilas Levcudi, a young man of great promise belonging to one of the most distinguished families of Greece, and whose father labored successfully in the revolution of 1821.

On the 24th of March Zenel pachi and Abbas Laliote, at the head of 2000 Turks, attacked Gen. Hadji-Petro at Loutzou.—The fighting lasted six hours. The Turks were repulsed here also, their loss unknown. The Christians had only six killed and seven wounded

The atrocious acts of barbarity perpetrated everywhere by the Turks against disarmed and inoffensive men cannot fail to produce the most painful sensation abroad, as well as increase the already overflowing hatred of Christians against the Turkish name and government, and thus widen still more the gulf existing between the contending parties. Lately at Epirus, in the province of Tzamuria, nine Christian primates were put to death.—The English consul of Revesa, Mr. Saunders, it is said, was struck with horror and indignation at seeing five of the heads of these innocent primates exhibited on poles at Plaisivitza. The churches of the Christians are continually profaned, their houses pillaged; the men are beheaded, the women dishonored—in fine, nothing is spared by those whose religion imposes upon them the duty of exterminating those who believe not in the Koran.

The misery in Zante and Cephalonia is constantly increasing. The lower classes suffer extremely. Money is very scarce, owing to the failure of their crops, and provisions are very high, owing to scarcity occasioned by interuption of communications. Our correspondent tells us:—"For bread-stuffs we can only look to the United States. Should that hope fail us, we must all starve to death."

HELLEN.

GREENFIELD, MASS., 1854.

Brother Merriam:—The World's Crisis is truly a welcome messenger to my dwelling. It is just what we need in these perilous times, to cheer us on our way. I love its columns, and the spirit it manifests.—That we are living on the last inch of time, I am perfectly well satisfied; and I praise God, that the midnight cry, has ever reached my ears; and, by the help of God, I am going out to meet the Lord, with full confidence that we shall meet him this year. O, I do praise the Lord, for this hope that I have within me of so soon seeing Jesus, and being made like him; who shall change this vile body, and fashion it like unto his glorious body. They that have this hope within them, "will purify themselves even as he is pure." I know in order to be accepted of him in that day, we must be like him here. May the Lord enable us to present ourselves a "living sacrifice holy, and acceptable unto God." There is a little band of believers here in Greenfield, that are looking for the Lord this year. We hope the Brethren will not forget us, as they go forth to sound the cry. There are souls perishing here for 'lack of knowledge.' O, that the Lord would send more laborers into his vineyard; for truly "the harvest is great, and the laborers are few;" and our work will soon be done, the time to labor will soon close. O, that the Lord would enable us to realize the position we occupy, that we may be the means of saving some from death, before mercy is forever gone. It is truly solemn to be living in this day, when we may expect to see the heavens rolled together as a scroll, and our Lord descending in all his glory, to receive his waiting Bride to himself. May the Lord enable us, dear children, to be all ready, with our lamps trimmed and burning, and we "like men who wait for their Lord," when he shall appear. Then we shall exclaim, "Lo! this is our God, we have waited for him, and he will save us."

LINCOLNVILLE, March, 1854.

Brethren and Sisters, "looking for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God."

I rejoice that through the mercy of the Lord, I, with you, have a hope of soon seeing "the King in his beauty," and joining that countless throng which shall be gathered "out of every kindred and tongue, people and nation." This is indeed a cheering hope. Yes, it is like "an anchor to the soul both sure and steadfast," which can trials well endure.

"Yet what are all our trials here,
If Lord thou count us meet,
With that enraptured host to appear,
And worship at thy feet?

Give joy, or grief, give ease, or pain,
Take life, or friends away,
But let us find them all again,
In that eternal day."

But I learn from the word of God that not all who say, "Lord, Lord," will share in the consumation of this "blessed hope.' No none but the "good and faithful," will ever hear that welcome plaudit "enter thou into the joys of thy Lord." O solemn thought, that when the kingdom of God shall come, many, who indulged a hope of entering therein, will be forever shut out! O what a disappointment!!

"Lord search our hearts, and try our ways," and enable us to do thy will every moment, that we may abide the day of thy coming, and stand when thou appearest.

O may our life with Christ be hid,
Long as we tarry here;
That when He who is our life shall come,
We may with him appear.

P. W., March 9, 1854.

Readers of the Crisis,—Let us do with our might, what our hands find to do, to save some poor souls from the impending storm, that is fast hastening; and while we try to save others, let us keep on the track ourselves. Glory be to God, this is the year of jubilee; this is the year that the saints will go home, to die no more forever; praise the Lord. My longing heart cries out, "Oh! come, bring immortality." Oh! I am glad the Lord is coming to put a stop to sin, and death. By the grace of God, Brethren and Sisters, I will meet you in the kingdom.

Later from Europe.

The steamship Franklin, from Havre and Southampton, reached New York May 22d, bringing Liverpool dates to the 10th inst.

It appears that the hostilities against Russia are to be carried out on a much larger and grander scale by the allied powers. With this object, the Emperor has decided on the formation of two camps—the first, of 100,000 men, will be established between Montreuil and St. Omer; and the second, of 50,000, near Marseilles. The English Government, on their side, (says the Moniteur,) are preparing troops, and a fleet capable of transporting, in case of necessity, the forces necessary to the Baltic or Black Sea.

The formation of the Northern camp is supposed to be a demonstration against Prussia.

Paris Bourse rose on a report that Denmark and Sweden had joined the Western Powers.

Austria has presented fresh terms to Russia, which if declined, she will join England and France.

A telegraphic despatch from Constantinople of the 27th April states that the French Ambassador having insisted that the United Greek Catholics should be permitted to remain in Turkey, a serious misunderstanding arose, and Gen. Baraguay D'Hilliers prepared to leave Constantinople, when the Porte yielded.

The Sultan was seriously indisposed.

Telegraphic despatches from Vienna state that Prince Paskiewitch has declared that Little Wallachia has been evacuated for strategic reasons; and that the Russians will soon return to Krajova, and subject to martial law any persons who may have assisted the Turks.

Great Wallachia is not to be evacuated.

The London Times asserts that both Revel and Helsingfors are to be occupied, and the Gulf of Finland closed till an attack on Cronstadt can be organized.

In the Black Sea a decent upon the Crimea and capture of Sebastopol will be effected, and the Crimea held by the allied armies. There is scarcely a doubt that this is a correct programme of the intended operations.

The Morning Herald has a telegraphic despatch from Stockholm, announcing that the British steamer Leopard arrived at Stockholm May 5th, and signalled that the enemy's ships were coming out of Helsingfors. Admiral Napier instantly made signal to the fleet to make ready for sea immediately.

The French fleet had reached Wingo Sound, and were hastening to form a junction with the British naval forces.

Several conferences have taken place between the British, French and Austrian Ministers, at which conditions were agreed to, to be offered by Austria to Russia, after the former shall have occupied Bosnia, and Upper Albania.—The conditions were said to be found favorable by Baron Meyendorf. They were regarded as being the final attempt of Austria to restore peace before she declared herself.

The Turks are about to blockade Greece.

Alliance of Sweden, Spain, Portugal and Piedmont with the Western Powers—One Thousand Arabs Embarked for Turkey—Capture of Fourteen Russian Merchant Vessels—French Loan of 250,000,000 Francs—Full Particulars of the Bombardment of Odessa.

By the America at Halifax, May 24th, we have European advices to the 13th inst. The Arctic had arrived out on the 10th.

Negotiations for an alliance offensive and defensive between Sweden and the allied powers, are said to have progressed so favorably that they are on the point of being concluded. It is also confidently stated in Paris that Spain, Portugal and Piedmont are willing to join the Western Alliance and if necessary to supply a contingent.

Hanover has declared against Letters of Marque. Austria is about to do likewise.—The Arab Chief Yussuf, with about 1000 men, has embarked for Turkey. Fourteen Russian merchantmen were captured in the Black Sea. Admiral Dundas has proposed an exchange of prisoners. A new French loan of 250,000,000 of francs was talked of.

The Times' correspondent at Landsoit, in Sweden, writes on the 4th, that the "Amphion," Capt. King, was reported ashore in the vicinity of Revel, and it was feared her captain and crew had been made prisoners.

The Bank of England on the 11th raised the rate of discount to 5 1-2 per cent. On the same day the Bank of France reduced the Eight to four per cent. Since February bullion has increased 4,000,000 in the Bank of France, and decreased the same amount in the Band of England.

Russian accounts say that on the 29th of March the British steamer Furious approached Odessa—two guns without ball were fired from the batteries, and the Furious ordered not to approach nearer. The Furious, therefore, stopped, and sent a boat ashore with a flag of truce. The boat was respected and allowed to land at Ulhart, and sent back to the Furious with information that the Consul had left.—The Furious, however, again got up steam and approached nearer, as if to survey, on which the battery fired seven shots, not on the boat with the flag of truce, but on the advancing frigate, which then left.

On the 2d of April three allied steamers came to Odessa to demand an explanation. Gen. Austin Sacken expressed his surprise, in writing, that the allied Admirals should imagine that the Russian shots were fired at the flag of truce—also explained how affairs were, and of course refused to deliver up the shipping in the harbor, as the Admiral had demanded. According on the 22d a bombardment took place. As surmised the affair was far from decisive, being mere destruction without result. British accounts report attacking force as the English steamers Sampson, Terrible, Tiger, Retribution, Furious—French steamers Mogador, Vanban, Descartes, Caton. Also, a detachment of English Rocket boats.

The mode of attack was new. Steamers continued for twelve hours to sail round in a circle of half a mile diameter, two thousands yards distant from the Balteria, and each steamer delivered fire as she passed—the rocket boats continuing to throw twenty-four pound rockets to set the town and shipping on fire. The steamers also threw hot shot. The Russians fought with extreme bravery, replying to the fire of the ships. Towards night the battery becoming untenable, its fire became slower, though regular, and at length, the shipping in the rear being on fire, it silenced.

During the action red hot shot from steamer Terrible blew up the Russian magazines on the Imperial Mole, and silenced a formidable battery there. A Russian frigate in harbor took fire, burned to the water's edge and blew up.—Also, twelve smaller ships, and two ships of war building. Rockets set the lower part of the city on fire also, which remained burning for two days. Three of the attacking steamers were disabled, and the Vanban set on fire, but extinguished. The British estimate their loss at less than 20 killed and wounded, the Russians theirs at 12 killed and 60 wounded.

The British Admiral, after action sent a circular to the fleet that he had inflicted retribution on the Russians for firing on a flag of truce, but Russian accounts look as like truth as British.

Odessa, May 1. The inhabitants are beginning to return, and places of business are being opened again. The bank had removed some distance from the town.

Rapidly increasing development of the frog spirit stirring up the elements of wrath preparatory to the awful scenes of destruction that is to come on the earth.

It seems another excitement has been created by the preaching of Orr in Charlestown. Says the Bee respecting it.

During the excitement not less than 6000 persons collected in the vicinity of the Catholic Church

After the Charlestown party passed over the bridge, the draw was raised, and all passage prevented. This stayed the proceedings.

Subsequently two newsmen were passing through the street, one of whom had a "Know-Nothing" under his arm. Without the least provocation, so far as we can learn, the Irish set upon and beat the party in a most outrageous manner. Two of the ringleaders were arrested. They were committed. The whole affair was disgraceful in the extreme.

GREAT RIOT IN BOSTON!

A Policeman Shot Dead!

Tremendous Excitement—Military Called Out—Attempt to Rescue the Fugitive Slave Burns—The Doors and Windows of the Court House Smashed!—Arrest of Nine Rioters.

A riot of a most serious nature took place in Boston on the 26th, growing out of the Fugitive Slave excitement. We take the following from the Boston papers:

About 9 1-2 o'clock P. M. an armed mob rushed through the streets from Faneuil Hall to the Court House, and immediately commenced an attack on that building, with axes and other destructive weapons. One of the doors upon the west side was demolished, and the mob were about rushing into the Court House to rescue Burns, the slave, when several loaded pistols were discharged, one of which, we regret to announce, proved fatal.

The Court House bell was immediately rung, and the most intense excitement prevailed.—The whole square was thronged with people. Chief of Police Taylor was upon the ground, with a full force of the Police, to stay the proceedings of the mob, now pressing still more reckless, and threatening. Mr Taylor pressed through the excited multitude, and, with great heroism, seized several men with axes in their hands, while breaking down the Court House door.

Other parties were immediately taken into custody, having in their hands a heavy beam, with which they were battering down the door.

The windows of the Court House were broken by stones and other missiles, and various demonstrations of a most disgraceful nature were made.

The name of the person killed was James Bachelder. He resided in Charlestown, and leaves a wife and two children. At the time of his being shot he was within the Court House, endeavoring to keep back the mob.

The Boston Artillery, Captain Evans, andt he Columbian Artillery, Captain Cass, were put on duty, quartering in City Hall.

The whole of the Police and Watch were on duty during the night.

It seems the excitement continued in Boston on Saturday, during which it is presumed 150,000 people visited the spot. We cut the following items from different papers:

Incidents, &c.—It may be a matter of interest to the riotously disposed to know that a force of 10,000 men could not rescue Burns. Every avenue in the Court House bristles with bayonets, and should an attack be made, the air would whirl with bullets.

Bold attempt to assault the U. S. Attorney.—Yesterday morning about 9 o'clock, as Hon. Benj. F. Hallett, U. S. Attorney for this district, was proceeding up School street in one of the Revere House coaches, accompanied by his son, Henry L. Hallett, Esq, the vehicle was stopped by a gang of negroes, who were about to make an assault on Mr Hallett, when the police arrived. It was a most audacious attack, and indicates the degree of desperation with which many are fired in our midst.

Riot in New York, Riot in Brooklyn, Disaster in Hoboken, &c.—New York, May 28. A riot occurred in the Park this afternoon between a party of Irishmen and the friends of a street preacher who was there holding forth. Several persons were injured, but none severely. The police interfered, and some arrests were made.

A riot of a similar character occurred in Brooklyn, near Smith street, where a Methodist preacher was holding forth. Some few persons were beaten, and several arrests made.

A terrible disaster occurred at Hoboken this afternoon. The drop bridge of the ferry landing broke down, while an immense number of people on it were waiting for the 5 o'clock boat. Hundreds of men, women and children were precipitated into the water, many seriously injured, and some, it is believed, drowned, though no bodies have as yet been recovered.

Revolution in Nicaragua.—The Destruction of San Salvado.—Serious Difficulties at San Juan. Attempted Arrest of the American Minister. The Northern Light brings intelligence that the revolution had broken out in Nicaragua, under the leadership of Senor Castellan, who came from Honduras with considerable force, captured Realijo and Chinandega, and marched thence upon Leonand, the capital. The whole country was under arms.

The city of San Salvado was totally destroyed by an earthquake on the night of Easter Sunday; 200 lives were lost and over $4,000,000 worth of property destroyed. The shock lasted nearly a minute, laying the whole city level with the ground.

On the Friday previous, until the moment of the calamity, strong shocks of earthquakes were experienced from day to day until the night of Sunday, the 30th, when, about 10 o'clock P. M., a rolling sensation, as that of a wave of the sea, and which lasted about fifty seconds, laid the whole city in ruins. Plunder and robbery followed.

Obituary.

Died, in Magog, C. E., on the 5th of April last, Ruth Merry, wife of the writer, aged 70 years and 7 days. Within a few weeks of her death she said that she thought the advent of the Savior would soon take place, but she should die first. For about 14 months previous to her disease she had strong indications that her stay on earth was short; and although I had known her as a professor of Christianity for 25 years, I never knew her so devoted to God before, and to struggle so hard for the final victory and to live by faith as she did during the above mentioned fourteen months, in that term she devoted much time to pious reading and secret prayer, and generally raised her voice with me in devout invocations to God at the family alter, a thing which she had not previously been in the habit of doing. While she was dying a sacred influence rested down in the room. She gave a bright and glorious evidence of her acceptance with her Divine Master, and left the world with a smile of holy triumph on her countenance. And I can say with calm resignation:

Happy soul, thy sighs are ended,
All thy mourning days are o'er;
By gathering angels soon attended,
Thou shall rise to die no more.

Will the Morning Star please copy.

Brother Merriam: Please insert in your columns, the death of our only son, Martin C. Fuller, who died April 13, aged 2 years, 5 mos. and 4 days, after a distressing illness of 23 days. His disease was lung fever, and terminated in quick consumption. He was a very forward, promising child. Many times in a day would he ask his sister, who is 9 years older than himself, to pray, getting down on his knees to pray in his own way. We miss him at morning and at night, but we feel that the Lord has taken him from the evil to come, and if we are faithful a few more days, we shall meet him in the new earth, to part no more. Brother H. Wytaker read a few passages from the Bible, and prayed with us, saying that there should be a formal discourse at some future time. We have selected a text from Jer. 31: 15–17, for the occasion, and are waiting still for Bro. O. D. Gibson, or some other one to come. I will here insert a few lines I have composed on the burial of my child.

Here lies our gentle Martin,
In the cold and silent grave;
He was ever mild and lovely,
Gentle as the summer breeze.

Hushed and silent is that voice,
We shall hear its sound no more;
But thy voice, O God, has called him,
And he rests in silence now.

Ne'er again shall we behold him
Till the resurrection morning,
When again we hope to meet him,
Where no farewell tear is shed.

COMMENCEMENT OF THE LAST SERIES OF TENT MEETINGS.

Since the last warm season has arrived, it is thought best to hold a few Tent Meetings. The first will be IN CONCORD, N. H., MAY 30, 1854. As the last year of the President's administration and the reign of Kings and Emperors has come, and all the governments of earth must now give place to an exceeding great and very greatly to be desired government, surpassing in majesty and power, in loveliness and beauty, anything before seen; the friends—the lovers—the expectants—the loyal subjects of the Most Grand, the Most Illustrious and Glorious King of this Sublime Kingdom, desire to meet to exhort one another to steadfastness as they see the day speedily approaching, and to listen to the tidings of their returning Sovereign, in a Tent prepared for the occasion, in the CITY OF CONCORD, N. H., TUESDAY, MAY 30TH, 1854, AT 5 O'CLOCK, P. M., AND CONTINUE OVER THE FOLLOWING SABBATH. Let those who belong to the household of faith, whether possessors of little or much, living far off or near, come as children of one family, "bearing one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

Ministers of God, to set the subjects contained in this notice before the people, are requested to attend.

In holding this meeting, it is not the design or desire to rebel against the government under which we live, or the city authorities of Concord, and with all due respect for our rulers and nation, we would invite one and all, without distinction, since all earthly governments must now fall, to come and candidly weigh the reasons of our expectation—believe—join us—prepare before it is too late, and be participators in the reign and kingdom of "ANOTHER KING, ONE JESUS," who, in the GRANDEUR OF HIS POWER, WILL SWAY HIS SCEPTER OVER ALL THE EARTH," AND OF HIS KINGDOM THERE SHALL BE NO END."

In behalf of the cause of the coming King,

J. CUMMINGS.

[illegible] will come after me, let him deny [illegible] and take up his cross and follow [illegible]
Who'll [illegible] my disciple? Consider again—
Can ye follow me [illegible] through [illegible] and pain?
Can ye leave all your pleasure and glory and fame,
And live but to honor my cause and my name?
Can ye turn from the follies of fashion and mirth,
And walk as a pilgrim and stranger on earth?
Leaving your riches, and living to bless
The widow and orphan and poor fatherless?
Can ye ask from your heart the forgiveness of men?
Can ye list to reproaches nor answer again?
Can ye pray that forgiveness and joy may be theirs,
Who've watched for your falling, who've set for you snares?
Can ye take up the cross that was heavy for me,
And walk in my steps a disciple to be?
When I call can ye turn, and in gladness depart
From the home of your kindred, and friends of your heart?
With nought but my promise on which to rely,
Rejoice and be glad that my coming is nigh?
When ye hear I am coming, O say, can ye rise
With joy in your hearts mount up to the skies?
Can ye come out to meet me where'er I may be,
Tho' ye come on the waves of the storm-crested sea?
For lo I am coming the Pilgrims to cheer,
With joy and thanksgiving will you meet me this year?
Dear Savior, thou knowest the weakness of man;
With strength that thou givest, we answer—we can.

West Winsted, Apr. [illegible].

I long to see the fig-tree bud,
And clothe itself with leaves—
I long to see the angels come
To reap the harvest sheaves!
I long to hear the joyful cry—
"Behold the Lord appears!"—
He comes to end your mourning days,
And wipe away your tears.
I sigh to mount on eagle-wings
To meet him in the air;
And sing a sweet millennial song
With all the ransomed there.
I long to wear my nuptial robes,
And meet the blest bridegroom;
With all the faithful now on earth,
And in the silent tomb.
Come! Jesus come; thy servants wait,
And long thy face to see!
With joyful hearts our tongues would raise
A welcome shout to Thee!
Come, Jesus! speedily appear
And usher in thy reign!
Could we but hear the cry, "He comes!"
Our souls would add—"Amen!"

Faith and Obedience.

Continued.

John beheld in vision an angel standing with one foot on the land, the other on the sea, having in his hand a little book open. We may learn something respecting the nature of its contents from the announcement of the messenger. He announces that in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, Time shall be no longer, but then the mystery of God shall be finished.—Was there ever a book closed up and sealed, which contained a message of time? Yes. Was it time, which extended to the closing of the mystery of God, as brought to view, and made known by the Apostle Paul? Eph. 3: 3–6, and Col. 1: 25–27. Yes. Then this angel is a symbol of a class of messengers who should at "the time of the end," when the book was unsealed, and knowledge increased respecting its truths, announce, with great assurance and mighty energy, the close of time in connection with the sounding of the seventh trumpet. The effect produced upon the minds of those who receive the truths contained in the little book, is illustrated by the prophet who eats the book, and finds it sweet at the first, but bitter when well digested.

In connection with this period of time, we have another class of events presented to our view, and new developments of truth thereby made to the Church by our Savior himself. They are recorded in Matt. 24. Having traced the pilgrimage of the Church past the standing of the abomination in the holy place, and the tribulation which was to follow, he says, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven," &c. Luke gives in addition to these—"and upon the earth distress of nations with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory." Here we have given a series of events which are to commence immediately after the "great tribulation" has ended, and continue to the coming of the Lord. These are to be tokens by which the Church may know that the time is approaching when the Bridegroom will return to claim her for his Bride, and in connection with [illegible] duty enjoined, to "look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh." How important then for the watchmen, who are the servants of the householder, to stand on the watchtower, and gaze with anxious eye for the first token of the Nobleman's return, that he may give timely notice to the Church, and thus she be prepared to obey the command of her Lord, to lift up her head, and look up for her redemption would be speedy. And as one sign after another appears in the heavens and upon the earth, how ought he to be prepared to announce the welcome tidings to the Bride, that the nuptial day is rapidly approaching, and she must keep her robes unspotted, and be ready to bid Him welcome. And as the seals are now broken, and the little book is opened, he ought to unfold its precious truths to the Church, that she may be strengthened and nourished by the "meat in due season."

As one event after another transpires in just the order predicted, until all the tokens of morning are in the past, then another duty is enjoined upon the Church of Christ. "Now learn a parable of the fig-tree: when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh." This being the last tree to bud and put forth leaves, it was an evident fact to all observers, that when this took place summer was assuredly at hand. "So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the door." Who are to learn the parable of the fig tree? Those who see the signs begin to come to pass? The sun and the moon darkened? No. Those who see all the signs are in the past, they are to "know that it (He, margin) is at the doors." And to make it stronger still, he adds, "Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." All what things? The signs? He had just said, when ye see all these things, (signs) know he is near; he would not therefore assure the generation who see them all to be in the past, that they will not pass away until they all take place. He must have special reference to the grand events, of which those signs were the precursors, even the coming of the Son of man in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory—the sending forth of his angels with a great sound of a trumpet to gather his elect from one end of heaven to the other.

The assurance is given to the "generation" living this side of the "great tribulation," who witness the signs of Jesus coming and learn the parable of the fig tree, that they shall not pass away until the Son of man shall appear, and redeem his elect. Now who can fail to see an importance attached to the understanding of these truths by the Savior? Is the command to "know that he is at the door," a non-essential one? It cannot be. How are they to arrive at this certain knowledge? By watching passing events, and comparing them with the "sure word of prophecy." To such a watchman will the sun be darkened and the moon, and he know it not? Will the stars fall next in order, as the untimely figs from the fig tree when violently shaken; and he be unmindful of the fact that the tokens of the approach of the day of God are being manifested? Will the Church, who watches for the first gleams of the dawn and eagerly inquires of the faithful watchman, "What of the night?" fail to learn the fact, that "the morning cometh?"

Will the beacon lights, erected to guide the Christian mariner across the stormy sea of time safe to his haven home, fail to accomplish their design? Will there be no skillful Pilot at the helm to steer the gallant ship safely through the "perils," rocks, and quick sands, and keep a good "look out" for the land-tokens? Will the crew remain ignorant whether she be a thousand leagues at sea, or within a few furlongs of her destined port? It would seem passing strange if it were so. No, no, it cannot be. The book is not unsealed for naught. The sun is not "darkened in its going forth" in vain. The moon withholds not her light—she becomes not red as blood, while no one heeds the warning. The stars fall not to the earth like the unripe figs from the tree, while there are none to say, "This is that which was spoken by the prophet."

The distress and perplexity of nations speaks loudly to some attentive hearts, that a fearful crisis is at hand. The faithful watchman will cry aloud, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh!" The Bride elect will hear with joy the glad announcement, and re-echo the thrilling note,—"The Bridegroom cometh!" She has for a long time worn the garments of widow-hood, and she longs to exchange them for the bridal robes. This has been a toilsome pilgrimage, and she ardently desires to reach the heavenly country and her blessed mansion; there to enter into rest. She has been long afflicted and down-trodden, and she eagerly pants to be comforted and exalted to the position appointed her by God. Oft has her harp been attuned to notes of sadness, and she looks forward with ardent anticipations for the period to arrive when she will strike the gladsome notes of victory and joy. The presence of the comforter has been sweet, but the companionship of her Lord is far more desirable. The earnest of the inheritance is blessed, but the full fruition of glory is more ardently coveted. She has sympathy for a perishing world, but far more for Christ, and thus she prays with vigorous hope and unwavering trust, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven."

Such is the position of the chosen Bride, and when the proclamation is made, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him!" and the truthfulness of the message is confirmed by the tokens he gave of his return, how does her heart kindle with emotions of holy rapture and love, and with what diligence does she seek to have all things ready, that when he arrives she may be prepared to welcome him with joy. What though many deridingly inquire, "Where is the promise of his coming?" enough for her, she has it in possession, written in characters not to be misunderstood; she grasps it by faith, and patiently overcomes the world's cold scorn. Many, who were once the chosen Bride, have turned to other lovers; they have sought for earthly pleasure and honor, and they look for a happy period to arrive, suited to their carnal hearts; a reign without Christ, without persecution, without reproach, and without the participation of the faithful who have gone before. To sustain them in their anticipations they appeal to the Word, and say, "Thus it is written!" but the cry of "Peace and safety," only tends to strengthen the faith of the waiting Church, and confirm their hope, for thus is she assured by the faithful Chart it will be when sudden destruction cometh, and those who utter the cry shall not escape. What though her hope has been deferred longer than she anticipated—the Bridegroom tarried beyond the expected time, and the proverb is heard on every hand, "The days are prolonged, and every vision faileth?" The promise is sure, "yet a little while and he that is to come will come;" the "tarry" has proved a way-mark, and she can answer back from the Word of the Lord, "The days are at hand and the effect of every vision!"

A Remarkable Prophecy.

"Before the middle of the XIX. century, seditions will be excited every where in Europe, Republics will arise, kings will be put to death, together with the nobility and ecclesiastics, and religionists will desert their convents. Famine, pestilence and earthquakes will spread desolation over many cities, Rome will lose her sceptre by the invasions of false philosophers, the Pope will be made a captive by his own people, and the Church of God will be placed under tribute, divested of its temporal possessions. In a short time there will be no Pope.

A prince from the north will overrun Europe with a great army, destroy the Republics and exterminate all rebels. His sword, wielded by God, will vigorously defend the Church of Christ, uphold the orthodox faith, and subdue the Mohammedan Power. A new Pastor, the final one, will come by a heavenly sign from the shore in simplicity of heart and in the doctrines of Christ, and peace will be restored to the world."

N. B. The above Prophecy I found among some old scraps of papers which I had laid by for future occasions. It was prophesied of by a monk in the year of our Lord 1675. It seems remarkable indeed that a person should foretell (in the last years of time) so correctly. I suppose the King of the North referred to, must be Russia—the orthodox faith—the Greek religion. The new pastor—the final one—the Lord Jesus Christ coming in the clouds of heaven. Yet the reader is left to judge and wait the event. Thinking this might be of some service to the readers of the Crisis, I forward it for publication. J. E. Clark.

The Aspirations of Russia. We translate from the Courrier des Etats Unis the following extract from a Brussels paper, whose character and position it says, are worthy of confidence:

"Last December, when the Cabinet of St. Petersburg protested in the face of Europe that it was animated by no thought of conquest, and that the object of its demands at Constantinople was to obtain certain religious guarantees for the Greeks in Turkey, the agents of the Czar highest in rank, dispatched into the central provinces of the Empire, permitted it to be said, and themselves proclaimed publicly, that the war was decided upon, that the hour had arrived for Russia to accomplish her destinies, that the Ottoman sway was on the point of terminating, and that it would be for the glory and safety of the Empire to extend its boundaries to the Mediterranean. This doctrine was not only contained in confidential papers (of which several fell into the hands of the ambassadors of France and England,) or preached in the assemblages authorized by the government; it was developed in popular pamphlets submitted to the censorship, and even in the churches of the great cities. Bodies organized in imitation of our Chambers of Commerce have obtained from the local authorities permission to address officially the Czar, begging him to break the bonds with which Russia finds herself held at the south. In the opinion of the Agricultural Chamber, it is not enough that the Danubian provinces take their laws from the Czar, but the Black Sea must become a Russian Sea, a sort of vast dock and arsenal, where Muscovite fleets can be formed, and rule and bully with impunity all the fleets of Europe. In order that this may be realized, the Dardanelles must belong to Russia. The Dardanelles will then form an impregnable barrier, behind which the Russian marine can in a few years assume proportions yet unknown to the civilized world. The day when the Black Sea, thus defended, will be transformed into a national ship depot, (fabrique de navires—this term is found in a printed statement of two merchants of Odessa, distributed by millions of copies at the expense of the Government,) Russia can undertake to fortify all these ports, and ride triumphantly the Mediterranean whenever she thinks fit.

"Another revelation, very curious, coming from the same source, deserves the attention of Germany. Four years ago, when the Russians entered Hungary, the report reached Moscow, and was not contradicted by the Czar, that his troops would never quit that country. A crowd of Russian officers themselves believed that the Czar's intention was to appropriate to himself at least a portion of the Hungarian State. After the submission of the rebels, the news was heard at Moscow with regret that the Russian armies would come back empty-handed.—[New York Tribune.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Levant, Me., March 27, 1854.

Brother Merriam :—I write to inform you how the cause of Christ is prospering here. The interest relative to the coming of the Lord, I think, is on the increase.—There have been some eight or ten praying children here for a number of years; but the past Winter some addition has been made to their number, such as desire to be saved. We have taken hold of faith in God's word; and have cried mightily to him for the salvation of the unconverted in this place, and the Lord has heard our prayers in a measure; for he has converted quite a number, and more are melting down under the mighty hand of God. The Lord is truly pouring out his Spirit on the people, and we believe this is the last call of mercy they will ever hear.—Well, we bless God for this; we do rejoice and give God the glory that our labors have not been in vain, although we almost felt that we were forsaken, not of God but of preaching brethren. We have had but two or three sermons in Levant since the first of last January, if I mistake not. We truly felt that we were left to work out our own salvation; so we are trying to do it the best we can, the Lord being our helper. If the Lord would send us a good, faithful laborer, we would be very thankful; for the harvest is great, and laborers are few. We hope to have the prayers of all the brethren who read the Crisis; for we believe that "the fervent effectual prayer of the righteous availeth much," and for such we ask.

O how glad I am that the Midnight Cry has echoed and re-echoed through this State; and I rejoice that I ever heard it, and that it aroused me from slumbering before the coming of the Lord, for I do believe he is coming soon to deliver his faithful children who love his appearing.

I bless the Lord that he ever put it into the hearts of some of the brethren to publish the World's Crisis; for it is my meat and drink to peruse its pages. It gives me light, peace and comfort when I can't go to hear the servants of God sound the midnight cry; for this paper seems to me like the cry going through the world. Is it not a blessed sound? "Behold the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him." Is it not essential that we arise and trim our lamps?

May the Lord bless the Editor of this paper, and all who are looking for the immediate coming of my Lord. This is the prayer of your unworthy Sister,

Palmyra, Me., March 25, 1854.

Brother Merriam :—Having received a few Nos. of the World's Crisis, I can say that I have been much interested while reading communications from those who are expecting to see the Lord this year. I have often wished that the believers in the

PROPHETIC PERIODS.—1260, 1290, 1335 Years of Daniel and John.

The daily sacrifice taken away, and the Abomination of Desolation set up, or the Saints given unto the hand of the Little Horn . . . . 519.

1260 years of tribulation.—Rev. 11: 2, 3, and 12: 6, 14, and 13: 5. The sun darkened May 19, 1780, to show its termination. 1779.

1290 years, or time times and the dividing of time—or time times and a part, in which the TIMES and LAWS are in the hands of the Little Horn. 1809. [illegible] Little Horn.

1335 years, reaching from the setting up of the Abomination of Desolation, or the time when the Saints' times and laws were given into the hand of the Little Horn, to the end, when Daniel with all the Saints will stand in their lot. 1854.

THE END.

The above Diagram is designed to illustrate the measurement of time from the rise of the little horn, with eyes and a mouth (the civil power of the Greek Empire, or Eastern Rome incorporated with the Ecclesiastical Power of the Papacy.—Dan. 7: 8) until the coming of Christ at the resurrection of the saints.

The 1290 years, or time, times and the dividing of time, (Dan. 7: 25) measure the period during which the saints, times and laws were to be given into his hand—The period of the saint's tribulation, we understand, were shortened to 1260 years, (Rev. 12: 6, 14—11: 2 and 13: 5); but times and laws were to remain in his hand during 1290 years, extending 30 years beyond the 1260. "But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion to consume and destroy unto the end." 45 years from the close of the 1290 make 1335 years, when Daniel will stand in his lot, which must be at the resurrection of the saints.

Christ, speaking of this desolating power—the papacy—says, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened,"—which marks a point previous to which the saints were taken out of the hands of the little horn power. Thus we perceive that 1260 years of the 1335 ended prior to the 19th of May, 1780, when the sun was darkened. Add 75 years to 1260 and you have 1335 years, which must end before May 19th, 1855, according to the evidence from the darkening of the sun. But we have abundant historical evidence that the papal power, i. e. the abomination that maketh desolate, was set up in 519, hence the 1335 days (years) end in 1854, which brings the coming of the Lord and the resurrection of the saints the present year. Samuel Page.

Lord's speedy coming would issue a paper, that I might read the evidences presented by them on the time. It is to me an interesting subject; for I believe the wise will understand, and will be proclaiming the message when He comes. My earnest inquiry is for truth, and I am often led to cry out, Lord, are these things so? I have not had an opportunity of hearing but little on the subject, for there is no advent preaching in this place; and but little said about it, only what is said against it. Still there are quite a number here, who are desirous to hear the truth; but there has not been as yet, any one directed this way.

Will Brother I. Dammon, or Brother A. Ross, or some one else who may feel a "thus saith the Lord," come and present to the people in this place, the evidences of the coming of Christ this year? I believe the coming of the Lord is the present truth to this generation; and there is nothing else that will so powerfully awaken and arouse people from their slumber.—It seems to me that the brethren, who have the message, ought to take new routes, where the cry has not been made. The fields are all white, ready for harvest; may the Lord send forth laborers, is the prayer of my heart. There are many precious souls through these regions, that would gladly receive the truth, if they could hear it. I rejoice to-day, that I ever heard the second coming of Christ preached, and the glorious truths connected therewith. I still cherish a fond remembrance of that dear Bro. and Sister, whom I first heard proclaim the good news. I well remember the first day that Bro. and Sister Mansfield preached in the Hall at Old Town. It was to me like cold water to a thirsty soul. I am glad to hear from them through the press, that they are still preaching the word, and that the Lord is blessing their labors in the conversion of souls.

O may the Lord give us his spirit to lead and direct us, that we may be found blameless at his coming. I do thank God for the hope of soon meeting all the children in the Kingdom to part no more.

Yours,
In hope of immortality
at the coming of Christ,
Norris Keene.

P. S.—If any of the brethren feel it duty to come here to preach, they will please address me at East Pittsfield Me.

Woodstock, N.B., March 13, 1854.

Dear brother Merriam :—Though lonely and weary, and sometimes by sorrow oppressed, yet I am endeavoring to gain that rest which remains for the people of God. The six thousand years, have nearly fulfilled their tardy and disastrous course over this sinful world—And soon He, who is the brightness of the Father's glory, will visit earth in mercy, and repair what has been blasted and defaced by man's revolt. Then the morning stars will once more sing together in unison, and all the sons of God will shout for joy, when they see his image of perfection enstamped on every object which their eyes behold. In view of the speedy coming of Christ, and the glory that shall then be revealed, my heart cries out in the language of John while on the Isle of Patmos, "Amen, even so, come Lord Jesus." Yet I would wait patiently all the days of my appointed time till my change comes; knowing that it is only a little while, and he that is to come will come and will not tarry. Then such as have patiently continued in well doing will be crowned with immortality and eternal life. But there is a solemn consideration involved in this subject, as said a writer, "No doubt a better than paradise is coming, but what is coming first? What is before that paradise? What is nearest, yea nigh at hand to this secure unthinking, dreaming world? The tempest clouds of heaven's judgments? The filling up of God's wrath! The last vial already trembling in the Angels hand! that baptism of fire!" Solemn thought, that the destinies of our race are so soon to be decided forever. And from the consideration that our work for the world is brought within the circle of a few weeks or months at longest, with what earnestness should we labour for the salvation of sinners. For a few weeks past I have been labouring in this place: the word has taken effect. On the 9th (inst.) seven followed their Lord in the ordinance of baptism, and one more on the 12th. May the Lord establish them in the truth, is my prayer, and enable them to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made them free, and never be again entangled in any yoke of bondage.

A. Ross.

Three Rivers, March 28, 1854.

Brother Merriam :—I feel that we need a great deal of the grace of God to keep us from the snares of the devil which are laid to entrap our feet, and to lead us astray from the love of God. There are not any Advent meetings in this place. I should like to have an opportunity of meeting with those of like precious faith, who are looking for Christ to appear in the clouds of heaven this year, to take his weary children home, where "the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest." My desire and prayer to God is, that I may be found ready and waiting for his coming and Kingdom; and at last hear the welcome plaudit, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." I thank the good Lord that I have the privilege of reading the Crisis from time to time. That the Lord may aid you, and enable you to continue to publish abroad the solemn midnight cry, is the prayer of your unworthy sister,

In hope of speedy redemption,
Eveline L. Wellman.

Halesborough, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., April 19, 1854.

Beloved Brethren and Sisters :—To you who have confidence in the words of the Master, peace be multiplied. O how precious are those that dare to believe God: faith will be counted unto them for righteousness. Except we receive the kingdom of God as a little child, we shall in no case enter therein. I have just seen an illustration of this principle. A little girl, that had just given her heart to the Lord, upon hearing us speak of the coming of the Lord, said to her mother, I do not feel afraid to die; but to think of being burned up (for she supposed the saints' bodies were burnt and the soul saved,) seems awful.—Her mother replied; "they believe that we shall be changed and caught up to meet the Lord in the air." "O well," said she, "then I wish He would come to night."—O, thought I, would to God that old professors felt like that, or even all professed Adventists. But thank God, there are a humble few that are little in their own estimation, but honorable in the sight of their Master. O how their hearts are ever longing for that glad day! I rejoice that our Jesus knows how much we love him; and oh how sweet the moment when he shall come to receive us unto himself.—Then, I think, we shall not only see Him, but his Father also. He says, my Father and your Father, my God, and your God. Our fellowship is with the Father, and with his son Jesus Christ. The Father himself loveth you, and why? because ye have believed that I came forth from God. John 16: 27. And they have received thy words 17: 8.

Your companion in tribulation, and patience, and in the kingdom of Jesus Christ,

The Great Anti-Christian Power,

AS REPRESENTED BY

DANIEL, CHRIST, PAUL AND JOHN:

BY J. COUCH.

"When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand:)"—Matt. 24: 15.

Having given an outline of the prophetic delineation respecting this power as seen in different portions of the word, we now inquire in relation to the historical facts which may be understood to be a fulfilment of the predictions. First, we ask, what portion of the history of the world must be examined in order to find a fulfilment of the first developments of this power?

According to the representations of Daniel 7th ch. we must look for the development of this power after the Imperial government of Rome had been broken, and ten kingdoms had arisen on its territory; for the eleventh horn having eyes and a mouth, which constituted this power, arose after the ten. But some will raise an objection to this arrangement, because the Greek government existed prior to this time upon the Roman territory. To this we would reply, that any kingdom in prophecy dates from the point in its history where it is presented upon the field of prophecy. In harmony with this principle we find Grecia dates, in the prophecy, from the reign of Alexander as its first king, notwithstanding the government of Greece existed before him. We find the same principle developed in the history of the ten kingdoms that arose on the territory of Rome. The Brittons, for instance, existed as a kingdom before they were conquered by the Romans, but their history in the prophecy is not dated prior to the division of the Roman government.—The same is true of the Franks and others of the ten kingdoms, which existed as governments before they were presented in the prophetic vision. So we may say of the Greek kingdom. It might have existed a long time before it was dated in the prophecy, but not as a kingdom united with a Church as represented by the horn with "EYES AND A MOUTH."

As we learn from history, that the last of the ten kingdoms arose as early as the last of the fifth, or beginning of the sixth century, we must look for the development of this power subsequently to that date, and prior to the plucking up of the first of the three horns by the roots; because the prophet shows us that this kingdom would be the agent in the work of plucking up the three horns, or, in other words, of exterminating three kingdoms. We have before remarked, that the first of the three (the Vandals) was plucked up in A. D. 534; therefore, if we are correct in our argument, we shall find the Greek kingdom united to the Roman Catholic Church, as represented in the prophecy, between the last part of the fifth century and A. D. 534.

The characteristics of this power, which we may expect to be developed in the short period of time referred to, are as follows:

1. The Greek kingdom will submit, in its governmental acts, to the dictation of the Catholic Church, (Rev. 17: 18).

2. It will adopt the religious creed of the Catholic Church, (Dan. 11: 30).

3. It will rely on the spiritual discernment of the Catholic Church for the development of truth from the scriptures, as represented by the "eyes" in the little horn of Dan. 7: 8.

4. It will constitute the Catholic priesthood the legalized teachers of Christian doctrine, as represented by the "mouth" in the little horn of Dan. 7th, and the "mouth" given to the Beast of Rev. 13th.

5. It will submit to the dictation of the Church so as to become a desolating or persecuting power, (Dan. 11: 32-36).

6. The abomination, being set up, will change the law of God by which the Church is governed, (Dan. 7: 25). "He shall think to change times and laws."—2 Thess. 2: 4. "Showing himself that he is God."

7. The principles which laid the foundation for a long-protracted persecution of the Church of Christ, such as never was from the beginning of the world, nor ever should be after it, i. e. a persecution, the particular manner of which is described in prophecy, were to be adopted at the formation of this politico-ecclesiastical government, or union of the Catholic Church with the Greek kingdom, (Matt. 24: 16–22. Dan. 7: 25, &c).

8. The Church will depend on the state for support and protection instead of depending on Christ; therefore the Woman is represented as seated on the Beast, i. e. sustained by the civil power, (Rev. 17: 3).

We will now examine the history of that period, viz.: from the latter part of the fifth century to A. D. 534, to ascertain whether the positions we have taken in relation to the prophecy be correct.

1. The Greek kingdom will submit, in its governmental acts, to the dictation of the Catholic Church. We learn from the civil and ecclesiastical history of that time, that the professed Christian Church were divided into a number of sects or contending parties, each striving for the mastery, such as the Arians, Manicheans, Eutychians, Orthodox or Catholics, &c. These different denominations of the Church not only contended for the maintenance of their distinctive theological views by polemic controversy, but also resorted to the civil arm and the power of the sword for the establishment and protection of their peculiar faith. In doing this they naturally courted the favor and protection of the kings and rulers of the different governments with which they were connected, in order that the power of the State might be wielded in their behalf, to the exclusion of all other sects.

This subject will be made clear by the following extracts from De Cormenin's history, commencing on p. 100. "Before speaking of the successor of Symmachus, it is necessary to trace the picture of the deplorable state of the Church in the beginning of the sixth century. Father Louis Doucin has left us a description so touching, and so conformed to the truth, that no one can study it without being penetrated with the most lively compassion for the unfortunate people who are submitted to the despotism of emperors, or the domination of priests. Wise men had failed in all their efforts to pacify the Church, and their counsels had only irritated the passions of the clergy. Cities were constantly troubled by bloody seditions, and the prelates, far from appeasing them, frequently even excited them; every where murders and sacrileges were committed in holy places where the themes of discourse and the capitals of the provinces had become the theatres of the most horrible cruelties.

The massacres commenced in the city of Alexandria. The holy martyr Proteus, bishop of that city, was murdered in his very church, and only from hatred to the council of Chalcedon."

• • • • • • •

"Antioch was disgraced by like executions, and four orthodox patriarchs were massacred during the seditions. The heretics were not the sole authors of these atrocities; the Catholics exercised like violence, and on their side preserved no measure in their vengeance. Under the pretext of assembling a synod to discuss religious affairs, they drew into the city a great number of Eutychian monks, 'and there, as on a field of battle, they maintained religion by massacreing all the heretics. The blood which was shed on this fatal day caused the Orontes to overflow, and dead bodies arrested the course of the river for some days.'

At Jerusalem the famous Sabas, a Catholic bishop, carried away by religious zeal, had assembled in the desert more than four thousand Arabs, and at their head attacked the troops of the emperor, routed them, and caused religion to flourish, not by force of anathemas or miracles, but by the terror which his bandits inspired.

The clergy rendered themselves still more terrible at Constantinople. The majesty of the throne was not even spared; the priests overwhelmed with outrages the unfortunate emperor Anastasius; they stabbed his best friends almost under his very eyes, massacred a religious female whom they accused of advising him; drew from his retreat a poor Eremite, and after having killed him, paraded his head through the city on the point of a lance, crying out, 'Behold the confidant of him who has declared war on the adorable Trinity! Thus perish all the blasphemers of the three divine persons.'

Then they secured the gates of Constantinople, and forming a camp in the midst of the city, organized troops of assassins to murder those who were suspected of heresy; to burn their houses and destroy the statutes of the emperor. The senators sent by the prince to calm this irritated multitude were driven off by blows from stones; and Anastasius himself was besieged in his palace by a species of army, composed of monks, priests, and devotees, marching in order of procession with the cross and scriptures. The affrighted monarch only saved his life from the fury of these inexorate wretches, by disgraceful submission."

"The authority of the POPES was strengthened daily by these disorders, and by the complaisance of the emperors, who, far removed from the ancient capital, showed an extreme submission to the pontiffs, in order to retain the people under their despotism.

The barbarians who had invaded the provinces of the empire, equally sought the friendship of the BISHOP OF ROME.—Then the holy father flattered the ambition of rival princes, and sold his alliance to the two parties. On their side, the heretics, like bad herbs or foul plants, banished and driven away, now from Africa and now from the East, had still resource to the Holy See, and addressed to it their appeals; and all complaints, as all alliances, were favourably received, provided they favoured the proud project of universal monarchy, entertained by the pontiffs of Rome.

Finally, at this period, the policy of the popes had rendered them the dispensers of all grace; there was not a single bishop who did not seek the friendship of the holy father for the interests of his diocese or his personal glory. The pontiffs availed themselves skilfully of all these circumstances. If they were consulted—if very humble requests were addressed to them, or if they themselves even gave advice, they made it pass for a command. Finally, if prelates named them as arbiters in their differences, their arbitration was immediately changed into a judgment.

Such was the position of the Church at the beginning of the sixth century! We ought to add that the faithful were divided on the subject of a council, which was principally accused of having approved of the epistle of Ibas, the faith of Theodore, and the writings of Theodoret.

It was in the midst of these disorders, so fatal to the Church, and so ADVANTAGEOUS TO THE HOLY SEE, that Celius Hormisdas, the son of Justus, a native of the small town of Frusilona, in Campania, was chosen at Rome, to replace Symmachus."

The government at Constantinople was particularly affected by these religious wars, and the Catholic Church especially sought to be strengthened by the submission of that government; but the Emperor Anastasius would not submit to the dictation of the Pope to protect that Church to the exclusion and persecution of all others, although he was compelled to promise a submission to the Orthodox party. The Emperor, being expelled from the imperial city by the Catholics, and finding that they were about to appoint another Emperor, and that he himself was liable to lose his crown and his life, returned to the city, and taking the position of a suppliant, asked mercy at their hands; and offering to abdicate his throne, confessed that he had not given that Church the protection which they ought to have enjoyed. The Catholic party, exercising the spirit of clemency toward their Emperor, admitted that they thought two of his ministers of state were more in fault than himself. After promising the execution of those who were most obnoxious to the Orthodox party, and the protection of the Catholics in future, he was suffered to resume the throne; but finding himself again established in power, he still manifested his partiality for the Arians rather than the Catholics. Vitalian, the Commander of the imperial cavalry, sympathizing with the Catholics, was incensed against the Emperor for breaking his promise, and not granting to the Roman Church that protection which he thought they ought to enjoy; and having assembled a powerful army, he marched against the city in order to compel the Emperor to submit to the dictation of the Catholic Church, or to sustain them in the religious quarrels in which they were engaged. The Emperor finding his throne was again shaken, and that he would be divested of his crown unless he exercised the powers of government to sustain the Catholic Church, despatched some of his most able senators to treat with Vitalian, on the most favorable terms he should see fit to grant. Vitalian granted peace on the following conditions: that the Emperor should grant his subjects the privilege of professing the Catholic faith unmolested, and that he should exercise the powers of government in protecting that Church to "the satisfaction of the Pope."

The Emperor immediately communicated with the Pope, to ascertain upon what conditions he could make peace with the Church of Rome. After some delay the Pope made known to the Emperor, in A. D. 515, the conditions upon which the Western Church, and those sympathizing with them in the East, would make peace with the imperial government. These articles however seemed so extravagant to the Emperor, that he warmly remonstrated against them, and refused his assent.

From these facts it appears, there was a controversy at this time between the Greek government and the Catholic Church, the latter endeavoring to bring the power of the State to yield implicit obedience to its demands, which was the event to be accomplished when the abomination is set up. But the government had not yet submitted to the dictation of the Church, although, at the different points referred to, in the history of that government, it seemed that all power of resistance was exhausted. As the events portrayed in prophecy were not at this time accomplished, the action of the Catholic Church on the government must necessarily continue till the word of God is fulfilled.

The Pope, being resolved that the Greek government should submit to terms of his dictation, sent a second legation to Constantinople in 517; and the conditions, which he then required of the Emperor, show a full determination on the part of Pope, that in all ecclesiastical matters, the government should be in entire subjection to the See of Rome. The articles required by the Pope were the following: "1. To anathematize all heretics in general, and those in particular, who have been mentioned above, together with Acacius. 2. To receive the council of Chalcedon, the letter of Leo on the incarnation, and all the letters which that pope had written on the Christian religion; though most of the orientals, probably all, were utter stangers to those letters, and the doctrine they contained. 3. They were to declare, that they conformed, and would conform in all things, to the apostolic see; that they received all the constitutions of the Roman church, and would suppress, at the altar, the names of those who had died out of the communion of the catholic church, that is, (for so it was explained in the confession), of those, who, at their death, had disagreed in opinion with the apostolic see."

Bower, remarking on these articles, says, "This was obliging all, who would communicate with Rome, to promise AN ENTIRE SUBMISSION AND OBEDIENCE to the ordinances of that see, and to own all, who died out of the communion of Rome, to die out of the communion of the catholic church; which, he could not but know, none even of the orthodox party would agree to, as matters then stood."

It appears, therefore, that Bower understood that when those articles were assented to by the State, the government pledged itself to be directed, in all ecclesiastical affairs, by the Church of Rome. The Pope, expecting that the articles would be rejected by the Emperor, sent a protest by the legates, which he directed them to distribute all over the East, with the intention of exciting a seditious mob against the government. The Articles being presented to the Emperor, he became exasperated, ordering two Officers to convey the legates to a ship lying in the harbor, and remove them from his dominions. Thus was the Roman Church again defeated in her attempt to control the Eastern government; for the time had not yet arrived for the accomplishment of the prophecy. That the Emperor understood that the Church was attempting to control and reign over him, is evident from an expression which he penned in a letter to the Pope at this time. It is as follows, "we can bear to be despised and affronted; but we will not be commanded."

But at length the time arrived for a revolution in the government. Its obstinate resistance to the requisitions of the Catholic party gave way to a spirit of submission. To effect this work, the Lord was pleased to remove the Arian Emperor, Anastasius, by a stroke of lightning, July 9th, 518. The Catholic party, still feeling determined to control the government, reported that the Lord had taken away the Emperor, by a thunderbolt from heaven, because he refused to be commanded by the Pope. Says De Cormenin, "The priests, availing themselves of this circumstance, frightened the superstitious multitude, and threatened the heretics with the vengeance of God. Their intrigues were so well conducted, that they placed on the throne Justin, a very ignorant man, and from that very cause, a good Catholic. The prince, on his elevation, gave a direction to affairs ENTIRELY OPPOSITE to that of his predecessor. The pretended heretics were punished, and the populace by reiterated acclamations made the Catholic faith triumphant. The will of a fanatical mob having been confirmed by a council held at Constantinople, the Catholics could exercise their vengeance against the Eutychians."

As this administration was entirely opposite to the preceding, we inquire, does this change involve a fulfilment of prophecy? or in other words, does this administration submit to the dictation of the Catholic Church? The first effort of Justin on his ascension to the throne was to unite all the Churches of the East on one platform, thus organizing one national Church to the exclusion of all others. Says Bower, "For that Prince," (Justin,) "not satisfied with having put an end to the schism, undertook in the next place to clear his dominions from heretics, as he styled them, of all denominations."

The next effort of Justin was, to unite the Western Church with the Eastern; and as the Eastern Church had become a NATIONALIZED CHURCH, a union of the Western Church with that of the East MUST INVOLVE A UNION OF THE WESTERN CHURCH WITH THE GOVERNMENT. It appears from Bower, he first wrote a letter to the Pope acquainting him with his promotion, and inviting him to unite his efforts with those of the imperal government to accomplish this work. From the earnest importunity of the Emperor and his adherents, the Pope concluded "they were disposed to purchase such valuable blessings upon any terms." "Resolved therefore to improve such a disposition to the advantage of his see, he answered immediately the emperor's letter, and that of the patriarch, commending their zeal, and assuring them, that if they, on their side, were ready, as he hoped they were, to remove the cause of discord, he was ready on his to concur with them in establishing concord; that is, he was ready to establish concord on HIS OWN TERMS, AND NO OTHER."

The Pope complied with the request of the Emperor, and sent a legation to Constantinople with the conditions on which he would unite with the East. These Articles, says Bower, "were those I have mentioned above, which seemed so very unreasonable to the late emperor, that he drove the legates from his presence, and ordered them to quit his dominions, for daring to propose them." As these Articles express the principles according to which the Western Church endeavored to control the Eastern Empire, and as they were rejected by the former administration, and complied with by the government of Justin, this shows the submission of the State to the Church according to the representation of prophecy.

It appears that Hormisdas, the Pope, sent a third legation to the Emperor with these articles in 519. The legates having waited on the Emperor, he directed them to the Patriarch of Constantinople to settle with him the terms of union. "The legates replied, agreeably to their instructions, that the blessed pope Hormisdas had settled the terms, which therefore must not be altered, nor even disputed, since they were strictly enjoined by his holiness to admit none to the communion of his apostolic see, who did not receive them without THE LEAST ALTERATION."

The Patriarch, aware of the object of the Western Church to control the Eastern, demurred. Says Bower, "Against these articles, therefore, he warmly remonstrated, as artfully calculated to subject, rather than to unite, the see of Constantinople to that of Rome. But the legates were inflexible; and, on the other hand, the emperor was determined, out of his great zeal for the unity of the church, to agree to any terms rather than to suffer so scandalous a division to continue among the Christian bishops. Finding therefore that the legates would not yield, he declared, that the patriarch should; and accordingly, having FIRST CAUSED THE ARTICLES TO BE APPROVED BY THE SENATE, he commanded him to receive them." What was the design of these Articles? To form a union. Between whom was the union to be formed? Between all who received them and the Church of Rome. The conditions of the union were expressed in the Articles, viz.: that all who received them "should promise an ENTIRE SUBMISSION AND OBEDIENCE TO THE ORDINANCES OF THAT SEE," viz.: the Western Church. Was a union formed as expressed in the Articles? It was.—With whom was it first formed? With the Eastern Empire; for the Emperor caused them to be approved by the Senate. But the Eastern Church was not yet united to the Western, for the Patriarch, who was the head of that Church, still refused to sign the Articles. It being, however, a nationized Church, and consequently under the control of the government, the Imperial authority obliged him to yield.—By what power then was the union of the two Churches formed? By the power of the State.

That the Roman Church had now obtained what she had endeavored to accomplish for a number of years, and of which she had hitherto failed, is evident from the expression of the Historian, "And now the legates, having obtained all they were enjoined to require, declared, in the name of the blessed pope, Hormisdas, the two sees UNITED again in charity and faith. They then attended the patriarch to the great church; assisted at divine service performed by him with great solemnity, the emperor, the empress, the whole court, and the senate, being present; and, to SEAL THE UNION, [illegible] with him, and probably at his holy eucharist."

What union did these individuals [illegible] by this act at the mystic table? [illegible] seal a union between themselves as individuals merely? Certainly not; for in that case they would have celebrated no union between the two churches. But as the Patriarch, in signing the Articles, and sealing the union, acted for the Eastern Church of which he was the representative, so the Emperor and the Senate acted for the State of which they were the representatives, and the legates of the Western Church of which they were the representatives. This union therefore must have existed not only between the two Churches of the East and West, but also between those Churches and the Greek Empire; and the terms of that union not granting equal privileges to the bodies united, but bringing all into complete subjection to the authority of the Roman See in ecclesiastical affairs, we have here evidently a fulfilment of the prophecy.

But some may object that soon after the formation of this union, difficulties arose between the Pope and the Emperor, in [illegible] will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow [illegible].

Would ye be my disciples? Consider again—
Can ye follow my footsteps thro' trial and pain?
Can ye leave all your pleasure and glory and fame,
And live but to honor my cause and my name?
Can ye turn from the follies of fashion and mirth,
And walk as a pilgrim and stranger on earth?
Leaving your riches, and living to bless
The widow and orphan and poor fatherless?
Can ye ask from your heart the forgiveness of man?
Can ye list to reproaches nor answer again?
Can ye pray that forgiveness and joy may be theirs,
Who've watched for your falling, who've set for you snares?
Can ye take up the cross that was heavy for me,
And walk in my steps a disciple to be?
When I call can ye turn, and in gladness depart
From the home of your kindred, and friends of your heart?
With nought but my promise on which to rely,
Rejoice and be glad that my coming is nigh?
When ye hear I am coming, O say, can ye rise
With joy in your hearts mount up to the skies?
Can ye come out to meet me where'er I may be,
Tho' ye come on the waves of the storm-crested sea?
For lo I am coming the Pilgrims to cheer,
With joy and thanksgiving will you meet me this year?
Dear Savior, thou knowest the weakness of man;
With strength that thou givest, we answer—we can.

West Winsted, Apr. 24th.

I long to see the fig-tree bud,
And clothe itself with leaves—
I long to see the angels come
To reap the harvest sheaves!

I long to hear the joyful cry—
"Behold the Lord appears!—
He comes to end your mourning days,
And wipe away your tears."

I sigh to mount on eagle-wings
To meet him in the air;
And sing a sweet millennial song
With all the ransomed there.

I long to wear my nuptial robes,
And meet the blest bridegroom;
With all the faithful now on earth
And in the silent tomb.

Come! Jesus come; thy servants wait,
And long thy face to see!
With joyful hearts our tongues would raise
A welcome shout to Thee!

Come, Jesus! speedily appear
And usher in thy reign!
Could we but hear the cry, "He comes!"
Our souls would add—"Amen!"

Continued.

John beheld in vision an angel standing with one foot on the land, the other on the sea, having in his hand a little book open. We may learn something respecting the nature of its contents from the announcement of the messenger. He announces that in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, Time shall be no longer, but then the mystery of God shall be finished.—Was there ever a book closed up and sealed, which contained a message of time? Yes. Was it time which extended to the closing of the mystery of God, as brought to view, and made known by the Apostle Paul? Eph. 3: 3–6, and Col. 1: 25–27. Yes. Then this angel is a symbol of a class of messengers who should at "the time of the end," when the book was unsealed, and knowledge increased respecting its truths, announce, with great assurance and mighty energy, the close of time in connection with the sounding of the seventh trumpet. The effect produced upon the minds of those who receive the truths contained in the little book, is illustrated by the prophet who eats the book, and finds it sweet at the first, but bitter when well digested.

In connection with this period of time, we have another class of events presented to our view, and new developments of truth thereby made to the Church by our Savior himself. They are recorded in Matt. 24. Having traced the pilgrimage of the Church past the standing of the abomination in the holy place, and the tribulation which was to follow, he says, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven," &c. Luke gives in addition to these,—"and upon the earth distress of nations with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory." Here we have given a series of events which are to commence immediately after the "great tribulation" has ended, and continue to the coming of the Lord. These are to be tokens by which the Church may know that the time is approaching when the Bridegroom will return to claim her for his Bride, and in connection with their accomplishment, is the duty enjoined to "look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh." How important then for the watchmen, who are the servants of the householder, to stand on the watchtower, and gaze with anxious eye for the first token of the Nobleman's return, that he may give timely notice to the Church, and thus she be prepared to obey the command of her Lord, to lift up her head, and look up for her redemption would be speedy. And as one sign after another appears in the heavens and upon the earth, how ought he to be prepared to announce the welcome tidings to the Bride, that the nuptial day is rapidly approaching, and she must keep her robes unspotted, and be ready to bid Him welcome. And as the seals are now broken, and the little book is opened, he ought to unfold its precious truths to the Church, that she may be strengthened and nourished by the "meat in due season."

As one event after another transpires in just the order predicted, until all the tokens of morning are in the past, then another duty is enjoined upon the Church of Christ. "Now learn a parable of the fig-tree: when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh." This being the last tree to bud and put forth leaves, it was an evident fact to all observers, that when this took place summer was assuredly at hand. "So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the door." Who are to learn the parable of the fig tree? Those who see the signs begin to come to pass? The sun and the moon darkened? No. Those who see all the signs are in the past, they are to "know that it (He, margin) is at the doors." And to make it stronger still, he adds, "Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." All what things? The signs? He had just said, when ye see all these things, (signs) know he is near; he would not therefore assure the generation who see them all to be in the past, that they will not pass away until they all take place. He must have special reference to the grand events, of which those signs were the precursors, even the coming of the Son of man in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory—the sending forth of his angels with a great sound of a trumpet to gather his elect from one end of heaven to the other.

The assurance is given to the "generation" living this side of the "great tribulation," who witness the signs of Jesus coming and learn the parable of the fig tree, that they shall not pass away until the Son of man shall appear, and redeem his elect. Now who can fail to see an importance attached to the understanding of these truths by the Savior? Is the command to "know that he is at the door," a non-essential one? It cannot be. How are they to arrive at this certain knowledge? By watching passing events, and comparing them with the "sure word of prophecy." To such a watchman will the sun be darkened and the moon, and he know it not? Will the stars fall next in order, as the untimely figs from the fig tree when violently shaken; and he be unmindful of the fact that the tokens of the approach of the day of God are being manifested? Will the Church, who watches for the first gleams of the dawn and eagerly inquires of the faithful watchman, "What of the night?" fail to learn the fact, that "the morning cometh?"

Will the beacon lights, erected to guide the Christian mariner across the stormy sea of time safe to his haven home, fail to accomplish their design? Will there be no skillful Pilot at the helm to steer the gallant ship safely through the "perils," rocks, and quick sands, and keep a good "look out" for the land-tokens? Will the crew remain ignorant whether she be a thousand leagues at sea, or within a few furlongs of her destined port? It would seem passing strange if it were so. No, no, it cannot be. The book is not unsealed for naught. The sun is not "darkened in its going forth" in vain. The moon withholds not her light—she becomes not red as blood, while no one heeds the warning. The stars fall not to the earth like the unripe figs from the tree, while there are none to say, "This is that which was spoken by the prophet."

The distress and perplexity of nations speaks loudly to some attentive hearts, that a fearful crisis is at hand. The faithful watchman will cry aloud, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh!" The Bride elect will hear with joy the glad announcement, and re-echo the thrilling note,—"The Bridegroom cometh!" She has for a long time worn the garments of widow-hood, and she longs to exchange them for the bridal robes. This has been a toilsome pilgrimage, and she ardently desires to reach the heavenly country and her blessed mansion; there to enter into rest. She has been long afflicted and down-trodden, and she eagerly pants to be comforted and exalted to the position appointed her by God. Oft has her harp been attuned to notes of sadness, and she looks forward with ardent anticipations for the period to arrive when she will strike the gladsome notes of victory and joy. The presence of the comforter has been sweet, but the companionship of her Lord is far more desirable. The earnest of the inheritance is blessed, but the full fruition of glory is more ardently coveted. She has sympathy for a perishing world, but far more for Christ, and thus she prays with vigorous hope and unwavering trust, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven."

Such is the position of the chosen Bride, and when the proclamation is made, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him!" and the truthfulness of the message is confirmed by the tokens he gave of his return, how does her heart kindle with emotions of holy rapture and love, and with what dilligence does she seek to have all things ready, that when he arrives she may be prepared to welcome him with joy. What though many deridingly inquire, "Where is the promise of his coming?" enough for her, she has it in possession, written in characters not to be misunderstood; she grasps it by faith, and patiently overcomes the world's cold scorn. Many, who were once the chosen Bride, have turned to other lovers; they have sought for earthly pleasure and honor, and they look for a happy period to arrive, suited to their carnal hearts; a reign without Christ, without persecution, without reproach, and without the participation of the faithful who have gone before. To sustain them in their anticipations they appeal to the Word, and say, "Thus it is written!" but the cry of "Peace and safety," only tends to strengthen the faith of the waiting Church, and confirm their hope, for thus is she assured by the faithful Chart it will be when sudden destruction cometh, and those who utter the cry shall not escape. What though her hope has been deferred longer than she anticipated—the Bridegroom tarried beyond the expected time, and the proverb is heard on every hand, "The days are prolonged, and every vision faileth?" The promise is sure, "yet a little while and he that is to come will come;" the "tarry" has proved a way-mark, and she can answer back from the Word of the Lord, "The days are at hand and the effect of every vision!"

A Remarkable Prophecy.

"Before the middle of the XIX. century, seditions will be excited every where in Europe, Republics will arise, kings will be put to death, together with the nobility and ecclesiastics, and religionists will desert their convents. Famine, pestilence and earthquakes will spread desolation over many cities, Rome will lose her sceptre by the invasions of false philosophers, the Pope will be made a captive by his own people, and the Church of God will be placed under tribute, divested of its temporal possessions. In a short time there will be no Pope.

A prince from the north will overrun Europe with a great army, destroy the Republics and exterminate all rebels. His sword, wielded by God, will vigorously defend the Church of Christ, uphold the orthodox faith, and subdue the Mohammedan Power. A new Pastor, the final one, will come by a heavenly sign from the shore in simplicity of heart and in the doctrines of Christ, and peace will be restored to the world."

N. B. The above Prophecy I found among some old scraps of papers which I had laid by for future occasions. It was prophesied of by a monk in the year of our Lord 1675. It seems remarkable indeed that a person should foretell (in the last years of time) so correctly. I suppose the King of the North referred to, must be Russia—the orthodox faith—the Greek religion. The new pastor—the final one—the Lord Jesus Christ coming in the clouds of heaven. Yet the reader is left to judge and wait the event. Thinking this might be of some service to the readers of the Crisis, I forward it for publication. J. E. Clark.

The Aspirations of Russia. We translate from the Courrier des Etats Unis the following extract from a Brussels paper, whose character and position it says are worthy of confidence:

"Last December, when the Cabinet of St. Petersburg protested in the face of Europe that it was animated by no thought of conquest, and that the object of its demands at Constantinople was to obtain certain religious guarantees for the Greeks in Turkey, the agents of the Czar highest in rank, dispatched into the central provinces of the Empire, permitted it to be said, and themselves proclaimed publicly, that the war was decided upon, that the hour had arrived for Russia to accomplish her destinies, that the Ottoman sway was on the point of terminating, and that it would be for the glory and safety of the Empire to extend its boundaries to the Mediterranean. This doctrine was not only contained in confidential papers (of which several fell into the hands of the ambassadors of France and England,) or preached in the assemblages authorized by the government; it was developed in popular pamphlets submitted to the censorship, and even in the churches of the great cities. Bodies organized in imitation of our Chambers of Commerce have obtained from the local authorities permission to address officially the Czar, begging him to break the bonds with which Russia finds herself held at the south. In the opinion of the Agricultural Chamber, it is not enough that the Danubian provinces take their laws from the Czar, but the Black Sea must become a Russian Sea, a sort of vast dock and arsenal, where Muscovite fleets can be formed, and rule and bully with impunity all the fleets of Europe. In order that this may be realized, the Dardanelles must belong to Russia. The Dardanelles will then form an impregnable barrier, behind which the Russian marine can in a few years assume proportions yet unknown to the civilized world. The day when the Black Sea, thus defended, will be transformed into a national ship depot, (fabrique de navires—this term is found in a printed statement of two merchants of Odessa, distributed by millions of copies at the expense of the Government,) Russia can undertake to fortify all these ports, and ride triumphantly the Mediterranean whenever she thinks fit.

"Another revelation, very curious, coming from the same source, deserves the attention of Germany. Four years ago, when the Russians entered Hungary, the report reached Moscow, and was not contradicted by the Czar, that his troops would never quit that country. A crowd of Russian officers themselves believed that the Czar's intention was to appropriate to himself at least a portion of the Hungarian State. After the submission of the rebels, the news was heard at Moscow with regret that the Russian armies would come back empty-handed.—[New York Tribune.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Levant, Me., March 27, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—I write to inform you how the cause of Christ is prospering here. The interest relative to the coming of the Lord, I think, is on the increase.—There have been some eight or ten praying children here for a number of years; but the past Winter some addition has been made to their number, such as desire to be saved. We have taken hold of faith in God's word; and have cried mightily to him for the salvation of the unconverted in this place, and the Lord has heard our prayers in a measure; for he has converted quite a number, and more are melting down under the mighty hand of God. The Lord is truly pouring out his Spirit on the people, and we believe this is the last call of mercy they will ever hear.—Well, we bless God for this; we do rejoice and give God the glory that our labors have not been in vain, although we almost felt that we were forsaken, not of God but of preaching brethren. We have had but two or three sermons in Levant since the first of last January, if I mistake not. We truly felt that we were left to work out our own salvation; so we are trying to do it the best we can, the Lord being our helper. If the Lord would send us a good, faithful laborer, we would be very thankful; for the harvest is great, and laborers are few. We hope to have the prayers of all the brethren who read the Crisis; for we believe that "the fervent effectual prayer of the righteous availeth much," and for such we ask.

O how glad I am that the Midnight Cry has echoed and re-echoed through this State; and I rejoice that I ever heard it, and that it aroused me from slumbering before the coming of the Lord, for I do believe he is coming soon to deliver his faithful children who love his appearing.

I bless the Lord that he ever put it into the hearts of some of the brethren to publish the World's Crisis; for it is my meat and drink to peruse its pages. It gives me light, peace and comfort when I can't go to hear the servants of God sound the midnight cry; for this paper seems to me like the cry going through the world. Is it not a blessed sound? "Behold the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him." Is it not essential that we arise and trim our lamps?

May the Lord bless the Editor of this paper, and all who are looking for the immediate coming of my Lord. This is the prayer of your unworthy Sister, S. F.

Palmyra, Me., March 23, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—Having received a few Nos. of the World's Crisis, I can say that I have been much interested while reading communications from those, who are expecting to see the Lord this year. I have often wished that the believers in the Lord's speedy coming would issue a paper, that I might read the evidences presented by them on the time. It is to me an interesting subject; for I believe the wise will understand, and will be proclaiming the message when He comes. My eaenest inquiry is for truth, and I am often led to cry out, Lord, are these things so? I have not had an opportunity of hearing but little on the subject, for there is no advent preach ing in this place; and but little said about it, only what is said against it. Still there are quite a number here, who are desirous to hear the truth; but there has not been as yet, any one directed this way.

Will Brother I. Dammon, or Brother A. Ross, or some one else who may feel a "thus saith the Lord," come and present to the people in this place, the evidences of the coming of Christ this year? I believe the coming of the Lord is the present truth to this generation; and there is nothing else that will so powerfully awaken and arouse people from their slumber.—It seems to me that the brethren, who have the message, ought to take new routes, where the cry has not been made. The fields are all white, ready for harvest; may the Lord send forth laborers, is the prayer of my heart. There are many precious souls through these regions, that would gladly receive the truth, if they could hear it. I rejoice to-day, that I ever heard the second coming of Christ preached, and the glorious truths connected therewith. I still cherish a fond remembrance of that dear Bro. and Sister, whom I first heard proclaim the good news. I well remember the first day that Bro. and Sister Mansfield preached in the Hall at Old Town. It was to me like cold water to a thirsty soul. I am glad to hear from them through the press, that they are still preaching the word, and that the Lord is blessing their labors in the conversion of souls.

O may the Lord give us his spirit to lead and direct us, that we may be found blameless at his coming. I do thank God for the hope of soon meeting all the children in the Kingdom to part no more.

Yours,
In hope of immortality
at the coming of Christ,
Norris Keene.

P. S.—If any of the brethren feel it duty to come here to preach, they will please address me at East Pittsfield Me.

THE END.

☞ The above Diagram is designed to illustrate the measurement of time from the rise of the little horn, with eyes and a mouth (the civil power of the Greek Empire, or Eastern Rome incorporated with the Ecclesiastical Power of the Papacy.—Dan. 7: 8) until the coming of Christ at the resurrection of the saints.

The 1290 years, or time, times and the dividing of time, (Dan. 7: 25) measure the period during which the saints, times and laws were to be given into his hand—The period of the saint's tribulation, we understand, were shortened to 1260 years, (Rev. 12: 6, 14—11: 2 and 13: 5); but times and laws were to remain in his hand during 1290 years, extending 30 years beyond the 1260. "But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion to consume and destroy unto the end." 45 years from the close of the 1290 make 1335 years, when Daniel will stand in his lot, which must be at the resurrection of the saints.

Christ, speaking of this desolating power—the papacy—says, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened,"—which marks a point previous to which the saints were taken out of the hands of the little horn power. Thus we perceive that 1260 years of the 1335 ended prior to the 19th of May, 1780, when the sun was darkened. Add 75 years to 1260 and you have 1335 years, which must end before May 19th, 1855, according to the evidence from the darkening of the sun. But we have abundant historical evidence that the papal power, i. e. the abomination that maketh desolate, was set up in 519, hence the 1335 days (years) end in 1854, which brings the coming of the Lord and the resurrection of the saints the present year.

Dear brother Merriam:—Though lonely and weary, and sometimes by sorrow oppressed, yet I am endeavoring to gain that rest which remains for the people of God.

The six thousand years, have nearly fulfilled their tardy and disastrous course over this sinful world—And soon He, who is the brightness of the Father's glory, will visit earth in mercy, and repair what has been blasted and defaced by man's revolt. Then the morning stars will once more sing together in unison, and all the sons of God will shout for joy, when they see his image of perfection enstamped on every object which their eyes behold. In view of the speedy coming of Christ, and the glory that shall then be revealed, my heart cries out in the language of John while on the Isle of Patmos, "Amen, even so, come Lord Jesus." Yet I would wait patiently all the days of my appointed time till my change comes; knowing that it is only a little while, and he that is to come will come and will not tarry. Then such as have patiently continued in well doing will be crowned with immortality and eternal life. But there is a solemn consideration involved in this subject, as said a writer, "No doubt a better than paradise is coming, but what is coming first? What is before that paradise? What is nearest, yea nigh at hand to this secure unthinking, dreaming world? The tempest clouds of heaven's judgements? The filling up of God's wrath! The last vial already trembling in the Angels hand! that baptism of fire." Solemn thought, that the destinies of our race are so soon to be decided forever. And from the consideration that our work for the world is brought within the circle of a few weeks or months at longest, with what earnestness should we labour for the salvation of sinners. For a few weeks past I have been labouring in this place: the word has taken effect. On the 9th (inst.) seven followed their Lord in the ordinance of baptism, and one more on the 12th. May the Lord establish them in the truth, is my prayer, and enable them to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made them free, and never be again entangled in any yoke of bondage.

Brother Merriam:—I feel that we need a great deal of the grace of God to keep us from the snares of the devil which are laid to entrap our feet, and to lead us astray from the love of God. There are not any Advent meetings in this place. I should like to have an opportunity of meeting with those of like precious faith, who are looking for Christ to appear in the clouds of heaven this year, to take his weary children home, where "the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest." My desire and prayer to God is, that I may be found ready and waiting for his coming and Kingdom; and at last hear the welcome plaudit, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." I thank the good Lord that I have the privilege of reading the Crisis from time to time. That the Lord may aid you, and enable you to continue to publish abroad the solemn, midnight cry, is the prayer of your unworthy sister,

In hope of speedy redemption,

Beloved Brethren and Sisters:—To you who have confidence in the words of the Master, peace be multiplied. O how precious are those that dare to believe God: faith will be counted unto them for righteousness. Except we receive the kingdom of God as a little child, we shall in no case enter therein. I have just seen an illustration of this principle. A little girl, that had just given her heart to the Lord, upon hearing us speak of the coming of the Lord, said to her mother, I do not feel afraid to die; but to think of being burned up (for she supposed the saints' bodies were burnt and the soul saved,) seems awful.—Her mother replied, "they believe that we shall be changed and caught up to meet the Lord in the air." "O well," said she, "then I wish He would come to night."—O, thought I, would to God that old professors felt like that, or even all professed Adventists. But thank God, there are a humble few that are little in their own estimation, but honorable in the sight of their Master. O how their hearts are ever longing for that glad day! I rejoice that our Jesus knows how much we love him; and oh how sweet the moment when he shall come to receive us unto himself.—Then, I think, we shall not only see Him, but his Father also. He says, my Father and your Father, my God, and your God. Our fellowship is with the Father, and with his son Jesus Christ. The Father himself loveth you, and why? because ye have believed that I came forth from God. John 16: 27. And they have received thy words 17: 8.

The Great Anti-Christian Power,

AS REPRESENTED BY

DANIEL, CHRIST, PAUL AND JOHN:

BY J. COUCH.

"When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand:)"—Matt. 24: 15.

Having given an outline of the prophetic delineation respecting this power as seen in different portions of the word, we now inquire in relation to the historical facts which may be understood to be a fulfilment of the predictions. First, we ask, what portion of the history of the world must be examined in order to find a fulfilment of the first developments of this power?

According to the representations of Daniel 7th ch. we must look for the development of this power after the Imperial government of Rome had been broken, and ten kingdoms had arisen on its territory; for the eleventh horn having eyes and a mouth, which constituted this power, arose after the ten. But some will raise an objection to this arrangement, because the Greek government existed prior to this time upon the Roman territory. To this we would reply, that any kingdom in prophecy dates from the point in its history where it is presented upon the field of prophecy. In harmony with this principle we find Grecia dates, in the prophecy, from the reign of Alexander as its first king, notwithstanding the government of Greece existed before him. We find the same principle developed in the history of the ten kingdoms that arose on the territory of Rome. The Brittons, for instance, existed as a kingdom before they were conquered by the Romans, but their history in the prophecy is not dated prior to the division of the Roman government.—The same is true of the Franks and others of the ten kingdoms, which existed as governments before they were presented in the prophetic vision. So we may say of the Greek kingdom. It might have existed a long time before it was dated in the prophecy, but not as a kingdom united with a Church as represented by the horn with "EYES AND A MOUTH."

As we learn from history, that the last of the ten kingdoms arose as early as the last of the fifth, or beginning of the sixth century, we must look for the development of this power subsequently to that date, and prior to the plucking up of the first of the three horns by the roots; because the prophet shows us that this kingdom would be the agent in the work of plucking up the three horns, or, in other words, of exterminating three kingdoms. We have before remarked, that the first of the three (the Vandals) was plucked up in A. D. 534; therefore, if we are correct in our argument, we shall find the Greek kingdom united to the Roman Catholic Church, as represented in the prophecy, between the last part of the fifth century and A. D. 534.

The characteristics of this power, which we may expect to be developed in the short period of time referred to, are as follows:

1. The Greek kingdom will submit, in its governmental acts, to the dictation of the Catholic Church, (Rev. 17: 18).

2. It will adopt the religious creed of the Catholic Church, (Dan. 11: 30).

3. It will rely on the spiritual discernment of the Catholic Church for the development of truth from the scriptures, as represented by the "eyes" in the little horn of Dan. 7: 8.

4. It will constitute the Catholic priesthood the legalized teachers of Christian doctrine, as represented by the "mouth" in the little horn of Dan. 7th, and the "mouth" given to the Beast of Rev. 13th.

5. It will submit to the dictation of the Church so as to become a desolating or persecuting power, (Dan. 11: 32–36).

6. The abomination, being set up, will change the law of God by which the Church is governed, (Dan. 7: 25). "He shall think to change times and laws."—2 Thess. 2: 4. "Showing himself that he is God."

7. The principles which laid the foundation for a long-protracted persecution of the Church of Christ, such as never was from the beginning of the world, nor ever should be after it, i. e. a persecution, the particular manner of which is described in prophecy, were to be adopted at the formation of this politico-ecclesiastical government, or union of the Catholic Church with the Greek kingdom, (Matt. 24: 16–22. Dan. 7: 25, &c).

8. The Church will depend on the state for support and protection instead of depending on Christ; therefore the Woman is represented as seated on the Beast, i. e. sustained by the civil power, (Rev. 17: 3).

We will now examine the history of that period, viz.: from the latter part of the fifth century to A. D. 534, to ascertain whether the positions we have taken in relation to the prophecy be correct.

1. The Greek kingdom will submit, in its governmental acts, to the dictation of the Catholic Church. We learn from the civil and ecclesiastical history of that time, that the professed Christian Church were divided into a number of sects or contending parties, each striving for the mastery, such as the Arians, Manicheans, Eutychians, Orthodox or Catholics, &c. These different denominations of the Church not only contended for the maintenance of their distinctive theological views by polemic controversy, but also resorted to the civil arm and the power of the sword for the establishment and protection of their peculiar faith. In doing this they naturally courted the favor and protection of the kings and rulers of the different governments with which they were connected, in order that the power of the State might be wielded in their behalf, to the exclusion of all other sects.

This subject will be made clear by the following extracts from De Cormenin's history, commencing on p. 100. "Before speaking of the successor of Symmachus, it is necessary to trace the picture of the deplorable state of the Church in the beginning of the sixth century. Father Louis Doucin has left us a description so touching, and so conformed to the truth, that no one can study it without being penetrated with the most lively compassion for the unfortunate people who are submitted to the despotism of emperors, or the domination of priests. Wise men had failed in all their efforts to pacify the Church, and their counsels had only irritated the passions of the clergy. Cities were constantly troubled by bloody seditions, and the prelates, far from appeasing them, frequently even excited them; every where murders and sacrileges were committed in holy places where the themes of discourse and the capitals of the provinces had become the theatres of the most horrible cruelties.

The massacres commenced in the city of Alexandria. The holy martyr Proteus, bishop of that city, was murdered in his very church, and only from hatred to the council of Chalcedon."

* * * * * * *

"Antioch was disgraced by like executions, and four orthodox patriarchs were massacred during the seditions. The heretics were not the sole authors of these atrocities; the Catholics exercised like violence, and on their side preserved no measure in their vengeance. Under the pretext of assembling a synod to discuss religious affairs, they drew into the city a great number of Eutychian monks, 'and there, as on a field of battle, they maintained religion by massacreing all the heretics. The blood which was shed on this fatal day caused the Orontes to overflow, and dead bodies arrested the course of the river for some days.'

At Jerusalem the famous Sabas, a Catholic bishop, carried away by religious zeal, had assembled in the desert more than four thousand Arabs, and at their head attacked the troops of the emperor, routed them, and caused religion to flourish, not by force of anathemas or miracles, but by the terror which his bandits inspired.

The clergy rendered themselves still more terrible at Constantinople. The majesty of the throne was not even spared; the priests overwhelmed with outrages the unfortunate emperor Anastasius; they stabbed his best friends almost under his very eyes, massacred a religious female whom they accused of advising him; drew from his retreat a poor Eremite, and after having killed him, paraded his head through the city on the point of a lance, crying out, 'Behold the confidant of him who has declared war on the adorable Trinity! Thus perish all the blasphemers of the three divine persons.'

Then they secured the gates of Constantinople, and forming a camp in the midst of the city, organized troops of assassins to murder those who were suspected of heresy; to burn their houses and destroy the statutes of the emperor. The senators sent by the prince to calm this irritated multitude were driven off by blows from stones; and Anastasius himself was besieged in his palace by a species of army, composed of monks, priests, and devotees, marching in order of procession with the cross and scriptures. The affrighted monarch only saved his life from the fury of these inexorable wretches, by disgraceful submission."

* * * * * * *

"The authority of the POPES was strengthened daily by these disorders, and by the complaisance of the emperors, who, far removed from the ancient capital, showed an extreme submission to the pontiffs, in order to retain the people under their despotism.

The barbarians who had invaded the provinces of the empire, equally sought the friendship of the BISHOP OF ROME.—Then the holy father flattered the ambition of rival princes, and sold his alliance to the two parties. On their side, the heretics, like bad herbs or foul plants, banished and driven away, now from Africa and now from the East, had still resource to the Holy See, and addressed to it their appeals; and all complaints, as all alliances, were favourably received, provided they favoured the proud project of universal monarchy, entertained by the pontiffs of Rome.

Finally, at this period, the policy of the popes had rendered them the dispensers of all grace; there was not a single bishop who did not seek the friendship of the holy father for the interests of his diocese or his personal glory. The pontiffs availed themselves skilfully of all these circumstances. If they were consulted—if very humble requests were addressed to them, or if they themselves even gave advice, they made it pass for a command. Finally, if prelates named them as arbiters in their differences, their arbitration was immediately changed into a judgment.

Such was the position of the Church at the beginning of the sixth century! We ought to add that the faithful were divided on the subject of a council, which was principally accused of having approved of the epistle of Ibas, the faith of Theodore, and the writings of Theodoret.

It was in the midst of these disorders, so fatal to the Church, and so ADVANTAGEOUS TO THE HOLY SEE, that Celius Hormisdas, the son of Justus, a native of the small town of Frusilona, in Campania, was chosen at Rome, to replace Symmachus."

The government at Constantinople was particularly affected by these religious wars, and the Catholic Church especially sought to be strengthened by the submission of that government; but the Emperor Anastasius would not submit to the dictation of the Pope to protect that Church to the exclusion and persecution of all others, although he was compelled to promise a submission to the Orthodox party. The Emperor, being expelled from the imperial city by the Catholics, and finding that they were about to appoint another Emperor, and that he himself was liable to lose his crown and his life, returned to the city, and taking the position of a suppliant, asked mercy at their hands; and offering to abdicate his throne, confessed that he had not given that Church the protection which they ought to have enjoyed. The Catholic party, exercising the spirit of clemency toward their Emperor, admitted that they thought two of his ministers of state were more in fault than himself. After promising the execution of those who were most obnoxious to the Orthodox party, and the protection of the Catholics in future, he was suffered to resume the throne; but finding himself again established in power, he still manifested his partiality for the Arians rather than the Catholics. Vitalian, the Commander of the imperial cavalry, sympathizing with the Catholics, was incensed against the Emperor for breaking his promise, and not granting to the Roman Church that protection which he thought they ought to enjoy; and having assembled a powerful army, he marched against the city in order to compel the Emperor to submit to the dictation of the Catholic Church, or to sustain them in the religious quarrels in which they were engaged. The Emperor finding his throne was again shaken, and that he would be divested of his crown unless he exercised the powers of government to sustain the Catholic Church, despatched some of his most able senators to treat with Vitalian, on the most favorable terms he should see fit to grant. Vitalian granted peace on the following conditions: that the Emperor should grant his subjects the privilege of professing the Catholic faith unmolested, and that he should exercise the powers of government in protecting that Church to "the satisfaction of the Pope."

The Emperor immediately communicated with the Pope, to ascertain upon what conditions he could make peace with the Church of Rome. After some delay the Pope made known to the Emperor, in A. D. 515, the conditions upon which the Western Church, and those sympathizing with them in the East, would make peace with the imperial government. These articles however seemed so extravagant to the Emperor, that he warmly remonstrated against them, and refused his assent.

From these facts it appears, there was a controversy at this time between the Greek government and the Catholic Church, the latter endeavoring to bring the power of the State to yield implicit obedience to its demands, which was the event to be accomplished when the abomination is set up. But the government had not yet submitted to the dictation of the Church, although, at the different points referred to, in the history of that government, it seemed that all power of resistance was exhausted. As the events portrayed in prophecy were not at this time accomplished, the action of the Catholic Church on the government must necessarily continue till the word of God is fulfilled.

The Pope, being resolved that the Greek government should submit to terms of his dictation, sent a second legation to Constantinople in 517; and the conditions, which he then required of the Emperor, show a full determination on the part of Pope, that in all ecclesiastical matters, the government should be in entire subjection to the See of Rome. The articles required by the Pope were the following: "1. To anathematize all heretics in general, and those in particular, who have been mentioned above, together with Acacius. 2. To receive the council of Chalcedon, the letter of Leo on the incarnation, and all the letters which that pope had written on the Christian religion; though most of the orientals, probably all, were utter stangers to those letters, and the doctrine they contained. 3. They were to declare, that they conformed, and would conform in all things, to the apostolic see; that they received all the constitutions of the Roman church, and would suppress, at the altar, the names of those who had died out of the communion of the catholic church, that is, (for so it was explained in the confession), of those, who, at their death, had disagreed in opinion with the apostolic see."

Bower, remarking on these articles, says, "This was obliging all, who would communicate with Rome, to promise AN ENTIRE SUBMISSION AND OBEDIENCE to the ordinances of that see, and to own all, who died out of the communion of Rome, to die out of the communion of the catholic church; which, he could not but know, none even of the orthodox party would agree to, as matters then stood."

It appears, therefore, that Bower understood that when those articles were assented to by the State, the government pledged itself to be directed, in all ecclesiastical affairs, by the Church of Rome. The Pope, expecting that the articles would be rejected by the Emperor, sent a protest by the legates, which he directed them to distribute all over the East, with the intention of exciting a seditious mob against the government. The Articles being presented to the Emperor, he became exasperated, ordering two Officers to convey the legates to a ship lying in the harbor, and remove them from his dominions. Thus was the Roman Church again defeated in her attempt to control the Eastern government; for the time had not yet arrived for the accomplishment of the prophecy. That the Emperor understood that the Church was attempting to control and reign over him, is evident from an expression which he penned in a letter to the Pope at this time. It is as follows, "we can bear to be despised and affronted; but we will not be commanded."

But at length the time arrived for a revolution in the government. Its obstinate resistance to the requisitions of the Catholic party gave way to a spirit of submission. To effect this work, the Lord was pleased to remove the Arian Emperor, Anastasius, by a stroke of lightning, July 9th, 518. The Catholic party, still feeling determined to control the government, reported that the Lord had taken away the Emperor, by a thunderbolt from heaven, because he refused to be commanded by the Pope. Says De Cormenin, "The priests, availing themselves of this circumstance, frightened the superstitious multitude, and threatened the heretics with the vengeance of God. Their intrigues were so well conducted, that they placed on the throne Justin, a very ignorant man, and from that very cause, a good Catholic. The prince, on his elevation, gave a direction to affairs ENTIRELY OPPOSITE to that of his predecessor. The pretended heretics were punished, and the populace by reiterated acclamations made the Catholic faith triumphant. The will of a fanatical mob having been confirmed by a council held at Constantinople, the Catholics could exercise their vengeance against the Eutychians."

As this administration was entirely opposite to the preceding, we inquire, does this change involve a fulfilment of prophecy? or in other words, does this administration submit to the dictation of the Catholic Church? The first effort of Justin on his ascension to the throne was to unite all the Churches of the East on one platform, thus organizing one national Church to the exclusion of all others. Says Bower, "For that Prince," (Justin,) "not satisfied with having put an end to the schism, undertook in the next place to clear his dominions from heretics, as he styled them, of all denominations."

The next effort of Justin was, to unite the Western Church with the Eastern; and as the Eastern Church had become a NATIONALIZED CHURCH, a union of the Western Church with that of the East MUST INVOLVE A UNION OF THE WESTERN CHURCH WITH THE GOVERNMENT. It appears from Bower, he first wrote a letter to the Pope acquainting him with his promotion, and inviting him to unite his efforts with those of the imperal government to accomplish this work. From the earnest importunity of the Emperor and his adherents, the Pope concluded "they were disposed to purchase such valuable blessings upon any terms." "Resolved therefore to improve such a disposition to the advantage of his see, he answered immediately the emperor's letter, and that of the patriarch, commending their zeal, and assuring them, that if they, on their side, were ready, as he hoped they were, to remove the cause of discord, he was ready on his to concur with them in establishing concord; that is, he was ready to establish concord on HIS OWN TERMS, AND NO OTHER."

The Pope complied with the request of the Emperor, and sent a legation to Constantinople with the conditions on which he would unite with the East. These Articles, says Bower, "were those I have mentioned above, which seemed so very unreasonable to the late emperor, that he drove the legates from his presence, and ordered them to quit his dominions, for daring to propose them." As these Articles express the principles according to which the Western Church endeavored to control the Eastern Empire, and as they were rejected by the former administration, and complied with by the government of Justin, this shows the submission of the State to the Church according to the representation of prophecy.

It appears that Hormisdas, the Pope, sent a third legation to the Emperor with these articles in 519. The legates having waited on the Emperor, he directed them to the Patriarch of Constantinople to settle with him the terms of union. "The legates) replied, agreeably to their instructions, that the blessed pope Hormisdas had settled the terms, which therefore must not be altered, nor even disputed, since they were strictly enjoined by his holiness to admit none to the communion of his apostolic see, who did not receive them without THE LEAST ALTERATION."

The Patriarch, aware of the object of the Western Church to control the Eastern, demurred. Says Bower, "Against these articles, therefore, he warmly remonstrated, as artfully calculated to subject, rather than to unite, the see of Constantinople to that of Rome. But the legates were inflexible; and, on the other hand, the emperor was determined, out of his great zeal for the unity of the church, to agree to any terms rather than to suffer so scandalous a division to continue among the Christian bishops. Finding therefore that the legates would not yield, he declared, that the patriarch should; and accordingly, having FIRST CAUSED THE ARTICLES TO BE APPROVED BY THE SENATE, he commanded him to receive them." What was the design of these Articles? To form a union. Between whom was the union to be formed? Between all who received them and the Church of Rome. The conditions of the union were expressed in the Articles, viz.: that all who received them "should promise an ENTIRE SUBMISSION AND OBEDIENCE TO THE ORDINANCES OF THAT SEE," viz.: the Western Church. Was a union formed as expressed in the Articles? It was.—With whom was it first formed? With the Eastern Empire; for the Emperor caused them to be approved by the Senate. But the Eastern Church was not yet united to the Western, for the Patriarch, who was the head of that Church, still refused to sign the Articles. It being, however, a nationized Church, and consequently under the control of the government, the Imperial authority obliged him to yield.—By what power then was the union of the two Churches formed? By the power of the State.

That the Roman Church had now obtained what she had endeavored to accomplish for a number of years, and of which she had hitherto failed, is evident from the expression of the Historian, "And now the legates, having obtained all they were enjoined to require, declared, in the name of the blessed pope, Hormisdas, the two sees UNITED again in charity and faith. They then attended the patriarch to the great church; assisted at divine service performed by him with great solemnity, the emperor, the empress, the whole court, and the senate, being present; and, to SEAL THE UNION, received with him, and probably at his hands, the holy eucharist."

What union did these individuals seal by this act at the mystic table? Did they seal a union between themselves as individuals merely? Certainly not; for in that case they would have celebrated no union between the two churches. But as the Patriarch, in signing the Articles, and sealing the union, acted for the Eastern Church of which he was the representative, so the Emperor and the Senate acted for the State of which they were the representatives, and the legates of the Western Church of which they were the representatives. This union therefore must have existed not only between the two Churches of the East and West, but also between those Churches and the Greek Empire; and the terms of that union not granting equal privileges to the bodies united, but bringing all into complete subjection to the authority of the Roman See in ecclesiastical affairs, we have here evidently a fulfilment of the prophecy.

But some may object that soon after the formation of this union, difficulties arose between the Pope and the Emperor, in which the Emperor seemed to triumph over the Pope, and therefore conclude that this union could not be the particular union identified in the prophecy. To this we would reply, that such difficulties have existed, at different points, throughout the entire history of the Roman Church. If therefore this objection be valid, it would be equally so against the formation of such a union at any other period in the past. We do not however understand the prophecy as recognizing a union between the Pope and Emperor as individuals, but as representatives of Church and State.—If it could be shown that the Greek government separated from the communion of the Catholic Church before the Woman took her seat upon the next head of the Beast, this would imply a dissolution of that union, and therefore disprove our position. No such separation however, we believe can be shown from history: but a quarrel between the Pope and Emperor does not affect the question. We have now ascertained from the historical facts refered to, that between the commencement of the sixth century, (when the last of the ten horns arose,) and 534, (when the first of the three was plucked up,) a union did take place between the Greek kingdom and the Catholic Church, as represented in the prophecy, and that that union was effected in 519.

The World's Crisis.

LOWELL, JUNE 7, 1854.

☞ Some of our subscribers have expressed a desire that a statement should be made in the Crisis relative to the amount of funds received, the expenditures of the Office, and further resources needed to continue the publication of the paper.—We have felt a reluctance to publishing any thing at all on the subject, lest our motives should be misconstrued; and my own personal desire has been to let the Brethren pay in such appropriations as each one may deem binding on himself from a sense of duty; and then when the funds fail, just notice the fact; and if means should still be wanting, to stop the publication. But inasmuch as Brethren wish the statement to be given for their information, we present the facts without any particular solicitation for pecuniary aid.

In the first place let me say, that we have not sought to build up a permanent establishment by purchasing a printing press, type, &c. We believe the Crisis will be needed but a few days, or months, at most. Neither have we been willing to contract a debt, that might prove an embarrassment; we pay our printer weekly, and settle with all hands at least once a month; so we pay as we go, and are ready to cease operations the moment the Lord manifests it to be His will, by withholding the requisite funds. We only desire the Lord to be glorified—the children comforted—and sinners awakened and converted, that they may be saved in the great day. We have no pride of opinion, nor personal aggrandizement to promote. If the Lord will have the number of copies diminished, we will say, amen; if the publication is to cease we would still cordially acquiesce in the will of God.

We now strike off 9,000 copies of the Crisis, for which if we received as most weekly papers do $2 per copy, we should have at the rate of $18,000 per annum; and this would be about $346 per week; but all we desire is enough to meet our expenditures. Our expenditures have averaged about $120 per week for the paper, but the expense increases with the increase of circulation. The whole amount received since the commencement of the publication is about $3,200. A part of this was paid in on commencing the paper with the understanding that it should be devoted either to the expenses of the paper or such pamphlets and small works as it might be deemed expedient to publish; but that which has been paid in for the paper is devoted exclusively to that object.

We have now on hand about $100; the remainder has been expended in publishing books for which we have not yet received payment; but as these payments come in, they will be devoted to the paper.

For the past few weeks our receipts have fallen far short of our expenditures. We have however perfect faith in God that resources will not fail until His work is accomplished in respect to it; and in His hands we cheerfully leave the subject, believing at the same time that those who desire its continuance, will not be delinquent to discharge their duty in this respect.—Most of those who are particularly interested in the circulation of the Crisis, have given freely and unsolicited; but there are thousands, that receive the paper, who have not as yet become sufficiently interested to add to our funds. We are willing that all who feel that they are profited by the paper, should share with us to the last extremity, whether able to remit money or not; it is not meet to take away the children's bread. As we love one another with pure hearts fervently, we will all stand or fall together. I will only add, "Father, not my will, but thine be done."

Fulfilment of Prophecy.

There has been no point in the history of the world, except at the opening of the Christian dispensation, when the prophecies were so clearly fulfilled as at the present time.

Within the present century we have seen that great anti-christian power, that for more than twelve centuries had been wearing out the saints of the Most High, broken down—the inquisition with its unuterable horrors destroyed—the fire and the faggot, the dungeon and the rack, are passed away. Why is not Catholic supremacy domineering over the earth?—Why are not crowns and courts subservient to her will? Why do not the governments of Europe at this moment protect the Catholics to the exclusion of every other sect? The potentates of Europe incarcerate their political prisoners, and every man who is suspected of revolutionary tendencies is either gibbeted, or dungeoned, or exiled, as were the church of Christ in former times. Why do not the civil powers connected with the Catholic faith now hand over the saints to the executioner, or confiscate his goods, or disfranchise him from the immunities of citizenship, or expatriate him from the country? The reason is the time, times and dividing of time, during which the saints were to be in the hand of the harlot power, are out; her dominion over the saints, has therefore passed away; and the kings, and princes, and dukes of Europe no longer submit to her dictation, nor do her bidding in this respect. The sorceress once seated on the Beast, governing the powers of earth, has been dismounted; the judgment has set on the little horn power, and its dominion to consume and destroy, (the saints) is taken away.

Let it be remembered, when this deliverance comes, we arrive at "the time of the end," (Dan. 11.)

Why are not our Bibles locked up in monasteries, and speaking in dead languages, and the literature of the world buried beneath the rubbish of Catholicism? Why do the scriptures utter their voices in a multitude of tongues, and proclaim the tidings of salvation to the remotest ends of the earth? Why do missionaries of the Cross in this eventful century, traverse every land, and publish the Gospel to the heathen world? Why do tracts and religious newspapers, pamphlets, and volumes, fly on the wings of every wind, except that we are in the time of the end, when knowledge shall be increased?—Why does the horrizon of Europe, to borrow the language of a late writer, redden with the flame of a universal conflagration? Why are these fires breaking forth in Russia, Turkey, England, France, Austria, Greece, and in some measure, in Sweden, Denmark, Spain, and Piedmont? It is because the three unclean spirits were to "go forth to the kings of the earth, and of the whole world to gather them together to the battle of that great day."

Why is a preparation for war made on a scale stupendous beyond all former precedent in the annals of the world? It is because the voice of God has said by the mouth of His servant Joel, "Prepare war, wake up the mighty men,; let all the men of war draw near;" to bring them into the valley i. e. Jehoshaphat, of judgment of God.

Why does a voice reach us from Greece that business in her provinces is stagnant; and that unless breadstuffs can be procured from the United States, they must all starve to death? Why do we hear from that distinguished Missionary, Schaufler, that for the twenty years of his residence in Constantinople, amid plague and pestilence, fire and sword, he never before witnessed anything like the distress which is now suffered at that Capital? Why are the principalities of the Danube at this moment suffering privation and hardship beyond description?—And why is commercial enterprise paralyzed to such an extent in Europe? It is because the nations are in that incipient stage of "distress of nations," of which Jesus speaks, as immediately preceding His glorious appearing; and of that time of trouble of which Daniel speaks, when Michael shall stand up.

Why does the spirit of rebuking sin prevail to such extent in the earth? The slaveholder, although formerly permitted to keep his human goods in peace, to trample on the law of God, and annul the rights of man without admonition, has in this generation been rebuked in thunder tones.

The inebriate, who could once pursue his bacchanalian revels—his nightly debauchery, almost without serious admonition, is now counseled and warned and expostulated with; so of the libertine, and the abandoned of every class. Why all this impulse given to moral movements in this generation? Why are slaveholders and the licentious of every class enlightened and admonished and warned of their imminent danger, and aggravated sins, but to prepare the present generation for the judgment, and ripen off the harvest of the world?

Why has the mode of conveyance, both by land and by sea, undergone an entire transition in our day, unless it be to fulfil that passage which declares that in the time of the end, many shall run to and fro?

Why do the vehicles of the present age move with electric velocity, raging through the streets of our cities, and shaking terribly the fir trees in our vales, except to fulfil that which Nahum assures us would take place in the day of his preparation?

Why has a new era dawned upon the earth in all these respects?

It is because the time in which we live is the time of the end, the day in which we live is the day of His preparation.—The era in which we live is one in which many run to and fro and knowledge is increased.

Why are the waves of popular tumult rolling in mountain billows, and the union of our glorious Republic virtually dissolved? Why are the impassioned masses of our hitherto peaceful population—our law-abiding people, excited to popular outbreaks, trampling on the civil power, and almost bidding defiance to the federal government? Why is the metropolis of Massachusetts, I was about to say, in a state of seige, the temple of justice converted into a military fortress? O it is the distant roaring of the tempest that precedes the tornado—it is the premonitory throes of that earthquake, that will shake all nations—overturn all governments—and leave the world a wreck. Already do thy mighty heavings cause the pillars of every throne to reel to and fro; and even the stupendous fabric of the American Union trembles, nay TOTTERS under the violence of the shock. Believe it who will—reject it who may—the Lord is roaring out of Zion; so that the heavens and earth do shake. Earth is doomed—her destruction cometh like a whirlwind. O sinner, flee from impending wrath! Talk of a millenium of peace and safety—you might as well talk of a cloudless sky when torrents of rain are falling to the earth.—Talk of establishing liberty and eqnal rights—no; the bulwarks of American freedom are battered down by slaveholding ordnance, the citadel is carried—you are too late for the rescue. But "the Lord will be the hope of His people, and the strength of the children of Israel."—The Lord preserveth all who trust in Him; but all the wicked will He destroy.

The exasperated state of the public mind developing itself in actual violence not to be controlled by civil power, but by military force, shows most conclusively that the three unclean spirits like frogs have begun their work, not only in Europe, but also in America; and this work is to give the signal for the battle of Armageddon. The frog is of an amphibious nature, subsisting in two elements; so also does the warlike influence operate both in the religious and the political world; Catholicism and slaveholding on the one hand, Protestantism and liberty on the other; and if I understand the signs of the times, there is an affinity and will be a combination between the two on each side. To say nothing of the prophecies, it is evident that if the spirit of disorganization and violence, which is manifesting itself at the head of government as well as among the people, since the commencement of 1854, should increase in the same ratio for a few months our political institutions will be prostrated—our Union dissolved—and anarchy fill the land with desolation and horror.

But O let us turn away from this revolting picture of earth's glory wrecked—of the fair fabrick of our world-renowned institutions lying in ruins—let us turn to a brighter and more inviting scene of contemplation. God says the things that can be shaken, will be removed; but we receive a kingdom that cannot be moved.—Of the increase of that government and peace there shall be no end. No violence nor outrage, no distraction nor confusion, shall ever enter there. Jerusalem, Glory to God, shall be a quiet habitation; not one of her stakes shall ever be removed. If faithful to Him that hath called us to glory and to virtue, the world will soon see that while they have been building on the sand, we have built our house on the rock—the eternal rock—the immovable foundation laid in Zion. He that believeth shall never be ashamed. Hold on, Brethren, a little longer, and He that is to come will come and will not tarry. Avoid all sympathy with the war-spirit as you would the pestilence that walketh in darkness.—Keep aloof from worldly associations and influences; with spotless robes and clean hands, with loins girded and lamps burning, be in perfect readiness and in a wait-position to see the King in His beauty.—The tokens of His approach are like the rumbling of the distant cars; we hear them, it may be, in other towns, and their approach seems slow at first; but on they come—nearer and yet nearer they approximate—and with the diminution of distance their velocity seems to increase; and at length their swift revolving wheels moving with resistless power, cause the very earth to tremble around us. Just so we have listened to the sound of the distant chariot of Him whose right it is to reign; we have seen all Europe shaken with violent commotion; and now as the eventful year of '54 rolls on, America feels the shock; the thunders of the mighty wheels have rolled into our immediate neigborhood, and the rapidity of the motion seems to increase. The powerfully exciting causes—the rapid development of popular feeling—the convulsed state of society—the spasmodic efforts of the masses to throw off the yoke of tyranny—the threats of assasination and violence on every hand—the unusual commerce in revolvers and other deadly weapons, leading us to expect blood will soon flow in our streets—all these things are but the bursting forth of that fiery element of wrath, which will ere long deluge the earth. It is the approach of that car of judgment, that brings our deliverer to Zion. Yes, I feel authorized of God to say, "BEHOLD THE BRIDEGROOM COMETH" THIS YEAR, "go ye out to meet Him."

N. B. Some exception has been taken to a remark made in the Crisis No. 18 to this effect, that no one was authorized to say positively that the time was understood; but we believed it was now understood. That paper contained a large amount of matter, and being pressed for time, I did not critically examine that article from the pen of Bro. J. M. Orrock, which was sent to me for publication. The position I take in relation to the subject is that it is a matter of faith; but that the evidence is so strong, and the position of the Church so clearly marked, that we ought to walk out on it as the Lord may open the way before us, just in the same manner as if we had absolute knowledge of the event; and for one, I feel willing to sacrifice all on this truth.

We thank Christian friends for watching us closely; for they cannot more ardently desire that every thing connected with the paper should be just right, than does the Editor. ED.

☞ We have endeavored to give a larger proportion of correspondence than usual today, and intend to crowd our columns with such communications in future, so far as is consistent. We would again say to our correspondents, we hope they will exercise all due patience in respect to the publication of their epistles, and communications. We have so large a number on hand that it would be impossible to publish more than a small proportion of them, but we intend to publish as fast as we find room; and this of course is all we have it in our power to do, without omitting matter that is essential to the interests of the paper.

NEW GLASGOW, C. E.

Brother Merriam:—As there are a few here willing to read the World's Crisis, please have the goodness to send us a dozen or more of them for distribution.—There are many who believe in the return of the Jews to Palestine, their conversion to God, and building of unwalled villages, which is nothing less than preaching peace and safety; we therefore wish to circulate the Crisis. As the Lord is about to appear for the destruction of them that corrupt the earth, let us give meat in due season, for the "Judge standeth before the door."

Yours, looking for the kingdom.
J. MORRISON.

THE FILLIBUSTERING EXPEDITION. A Washington correspondent writes as follows: The muster rolls of the organization for the invasion of Cuba shows a list of fighting men 12,000 strong. It is supposed that 10 per cent of the number is available for immediate service. The subscriptions to the fund amount to $1,000,000; but a small part has yet been collected. In return for payments, stock is issued, redeemable after the conquest of Cuba, and signed by the president, secretary, and treasurer of the association. General Quitman stands at the head of this military organization.

It is well understood that we have no spirit of contention with Brethren who may differ from us; but as the following communication is merely an affectionate appeal to such Brethren, we give it a place in our columns.

To the Advent Brethren and Sisters not sympathysing in the Time movement.

Dear Brothren and Sisters, whom I have loved in the truth, and faith of Jesus; as I have no other means of communication to you all, I trust you will receive this in love, as that is the only sentiment of my soul towards you. I have a message to you that I must deliver, because you have in time past been foremost in the heavenly race, and first in proclaiming the near approach of the Bridegroom. And why, dear Brethren, are you so silent now, when we are flooded with light? I feel that some of the prophecies of God have been so fully unfolded, and so clearly presented to the world, that those who do not see the light must shut their eyes against it to avoid the conclusions to which we have arrived. Can you say that you are looking for the Lord? You will perhaps say, "yes, every day." And as often been disappointed? "Well, we remember too well the disastrous consequences of 1844, which warns us not to face another such scene, on definite time." But did "the trial of your faith, which is so much more precious than gold that perishes," cause you to stumble? "If thou faint in the day of adversity, thy strength is small," says Solomon. Remember that it is only "those who come out of great tribulation, who do wash their robes, and make them white in the blood of the Lamb." By the grace of God I believe that if I am prepared to meet Him when He does come, that same preparation will fit me to face disappointment, should He not come. Submission, meekness, and humility become the followers of the Lamb. O Brethren, have I been deceived? Have I indulged such high hopes of you, only to be "dashed with bitter bowl?" I have looked on you as superior to the flattery, or frown, of such a world as this; and almost boasted that you would never desert the standard of the cross, nor flinch from "the reproach of Christ." But do you not evade our call for light, and tell us that "The prophetic periods, though definite in themselves, are indefinite as to their commencement, and consequently must be indefinite as to their termination?" You may as well say they are no periods at all; for they cannot be, unless periodically fulfilled. Have you not made them definite periods by separating the seventy weeks from the 2300 days, and commencing them at a given time? And have you not computed the years, according to the canon of Ptolomy, and fixed the end of them at, or near the crucifixion of Christ? Your position is exactly this, "God has given us an appointed time for the end of the world; but he has left the commencing point so shrouded in mystery that we cannot unravel it; and though we "stagger not at the promises of God, through unbelief," fiet we cannot come ont, and stand on what He has revealed, and be "strong in the faith, giving glory to God." Has God given us specific numbers, in the book of Daniel, only to tantalize us with false hopes? I do not believe it. What then has he given us those numbers for? Is not "all scripture given by inspiration?" You will doubtless say "Yes, but there is a difference between inspiration and human inferences; and a great part of the Scriptures are dark, the first presented, in types, and shadows, and proverbs; and the last in parables, symbols and metaphors." Yes, but are not some of you at least "stewards of the mysteries of God?" And is it not given you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God? If so, you are bound by every solemn obligation to your Lord and Master, "to declare the whole counsel of God:" and time is one of those things which he has revealed; and if you have been called of God to preach the gospel, and do not tell us "what of the night," I am authorized to tell you, that you do not fulfil your mission. "Say to Archippus, take heed to the ministry, which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfil it." Why, Brethren, do you tell us that our position is not tenable, till you can shew us a better system, and more light? Let us see your light, that we may rejoice in it; "and glorify our Father in Heaven:" for "there is nothing hid which shall not be manifested; neither any thing kept secret, which shall not be made known, and come abroad." "The wise man's heart discerneth both time and judgment." Shall we leave you, dear, dear Brethren, ten years behind your time? No, not without one effort to rouse you. It cannot be possible that your "lamps have gone out," I hope not. I beseech you, have respect enough for the honor of God, to suffer no lack of faith in his promises.—"Whosoever hath, to him shall be given; and he shall have abundance; but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away, even that, which he seemeth to have." Did the Saviour commend the discernment of His disciples when they asked an explanation of the parable of the Sower? No, but He said, "know ye not this parable? How then will ye know all parables?" "And Jesus said, have ye understood all these things?" "They say, yea, Lord." "Then said he unto them, Every scribe which is instructed unto the Kingdom, is like an householder; which bringeth forth out of his treasury things new, and old." Often have we called on you for light on the prophecies; and as often been turned back to '44, or to a separation of the 70 weeks from the vision. Did not our Lord give us a lesson to learn, when he referred us to "Daniel the prophet?" "Whoso readeth let him understand." There is meaning, and weight in these words: and his subject then was definite time. I say these things to convince you; and not to undervalue your past labors, No, God forbid; I know you have labored; I know you have suffered; and you are sure of your reward, "if you hold fast your confidence firm unto the end." The children have long been crying for bread, and it was not given them; but glory to God, He has opened His own treasure-house, and some of them now have had a supply.. God is in this work, Brethren; and I want you should be in it; and if you now faithfully declare the whole counsel of God, it will add thousands of gems to your crowns, "in the day of the Lord Jesus."

Some of you claim to "have borne the burden, and heat of the day;" and it is admitted; but you know there are last which shall be first, and the first last: God forbid that this should ever be applied to any of you. O be persuaded to come down, and sit with us in this valley, where our Lord, and Master once sat; for He has left a telescope here, through which we can take a very near view of that glorious "City, which hath foundations, whose Builder, and Maker is God." No farther do we make this question a test, than we see a determined rejection of both light, and truth: yet we see not how any Christian can evade it; and with so many ominous signs, the truth, and the light which now shines, we believe it is every christian's duty to proclaim it. Let us now for a moment follow Abraham to the hill of Moriah; but why is he so solemnly climbing that steep and rugged mountain? To worship God, and to make a sacrifice to Him. It is a costly sacrifice; all the wealth of India could not purchase it: but God requires it; and Abraham is ready to give it up! He builds his altar; lays his wood, binds his son, and takes the knife! with a heart full of grief, pity, and tender love for his only son; how can he strike the blow?—He has one more blessed object in his heart, than his only son! In the love of God, his whole heart is submerged, and he can withhold nothing from Him! He proved his love, his son survived, and God was glorified. O for Abraham's faith! to trust in God with implicit confidence, and lay all on His altar, who, though He spared Abraham's, "spared not His own Son, but delivered him up for us all." O Brethren, prepare yourselves to feed His flock. "Feed my sheep; feed my lambs." "Feed the church of God, which He hath purchased with His own blood," that every member of the mystical body of Christ may come to the measure, of the stature of his fulness. "Blessed indeed are the eyes that see, and the ears that hear!"—Now, Brethren, I do not call on you to truckle to opinions; but I ask you to bow to facts, and to acknowledge that you "esteem the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt." O for that spirit of martyrdom, which characterized the early Church! Come with me a moment to Mount Olivet; and with a weeping Saviour, let us weep over a world doomed to almost instant destruction!—"O Jerusalem, Jerusalem!" "O Earth, earth, earth!" With humble, penitent, believing hearts let us labor, and wait, and watch, and pray, that we may be accounted worthy to escape all the calamities that are coming on the earth, "and to stand before the Son of man." O, Son of David! Baptize us all anew "with the Holy Ghost, and with fire," for thine own sake. Amen! B. H.

IMPORTANT CONVENTION OF UNITED AMERICANS. The Arch Chauncey, Order of United Americans, hold a National Convention at the Chauncy Rooms, corner of Broadway and Grand streets, New York, on Tuesday. The gathering is a vital one, and matters of much interest and importance are to be discussed and acted upon.

The Commotions Of Europe.

Ye kingdoms of Europe, that now in commotion,
Are raising your standards of conquest so high,
O, look at the chart where the Prophets have spoken,
How soon all your glory will suddenly die.

Already those spirits, which John saw in vision,
Compar'd to the green frogs of Egypt's dark land,
Are gathering the nations to make the decision
On which side the question each party will stand.

The object before you is kingdoms and glory,
Sustaining the crown'd heads, the Pope, and the Czar,
Determined to finish your work like a story,
By legions of soldiers in battles of war.

But stop for a moment and look at the charter,
Where God has declar'd in the last burning day,
He'll gather all nations in Jehoshaphat's valley,
And there all usurpers will utterly slay.

A voice has gone forth, from the high court of heaven,
To gather all tribes of the earth that is curs'd,
And lay all the titles which they have assumed
At the feet of Jesus, quite low in the dust.

Then press on the battle, ye short-sighted mortals,
Bring all your proud legions now into the field,
Let courage inspire you to make strong the effort,
Alas! all will fail you, and you must soon yield.

For God has declared, by divine inspiration,
His Son shall descend and shall sit on the throne
Of David his Father, and rule all the nations,
Until of his enemies there shall be none.

Then lift up your heads, all ye pilgrims, who've waited
For Israel's redemption from bondage and sin,
And hail the last trump, that will open the portals
Of glory, and let all the ransom'd ones in.

WM. WHITFORD.

Addison, Vt.

PORTLAND, ME., May 26th, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—Permit me to say for the encouragement of the household of faith, that the sealing angel is accomplishing his mission in this place. On one afternoon I baptized two, and shortly after four more of one family, the father, mother, and two sons, comprising all the adult members of the household. The two sons were born blind. They went into the water praising God, and they came up out of the water praising God that they should have eyes to see this year. Thank God, it was a blessed season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord.

On the last Sabbath, six more were buried with their Lord in the watery grave, in hopes of seeing the King in his beauty the present year. It was an occasion of great solemnity. There are others who are waiting for opportunity to follow the Lord in the ordinance of baptism.

EPHRAIM HODGES, 2d.

Respected reader:—You will permit me to expostulate with you for a preparation to meet your departure from time to eternity this present year.

Will you allow yourself to be influenced by sound reasoning, historical facts, and scriptural present truth? If so—Then a chance for your safety in Heaven,—But not, if your doom is sealed. Then let us reason together, and make some inquiries.

Is it possible this is the last year I am to spend on earth? Must I leave my merchandise, and all aggrandizement, and my good name, and popular favour? How shall I meet all this?

Dear reader, my heart is full, is overflowing for my fellow men who are not prepared for the coming of the Lord this year. From "the field," "The one shall be taken, and the other left." "At the mill," "The one shall be taken, and the other left." O reader! Will you slumber on the brink of ruin? Will you allow the cry of peace to put out the light of the present truth, that would beam upon your heart, like the morning dawn and noonday sun?

Behold the infractions made upon the laws of nature,—the palsied state of men's hearts,—the diseased condition of the vegetable Kingdom,—the improvement of science, light and knowledge increased,—the destructions on earth, resulting from the disturbed elements of the atmosphere. Behold the civil and eclesiastical factions of earth,—crowned heads trembling,—kingdoms tottering to their fall. "Where is the man of adamantine heart that can look at the war preparations,—and see the bloodshed and slaughter of mankind without a shudder, and trembling at the word of prophecy?

BURNS A PREACHER. Rev. Mr. Dexter in a sermon "upon the times" yesterday, stated that Burns the fugitive was a regularly ordained and practising minister of the Baptist persuasion.

The Brooklyn Riot.

The New York correspondent of the Boston Traveller says:—

New York, June 5.

The most exaggerated reports were flying over New York and Brooklyn last evening, as to the doings of the mob, many of them, doubtless, circulated for wicked purposes.

The following is about a correct account of the affair, so far as can be got at. As had been announced, on Sunday evening of last week, a preacher attached to the Primitive Methodist Church of Bridge street appeared upon the lot on the corner of Smith and Atlantic streets, at the appointed time, and delivered a sermon.—His name is Joseph Folger, and he was accompanied and assisted in the exercises by the trustees and officers of his church. Previous to the sermon a prayer was made, in which the hope was expressed that all the people around about may be made better instead of worse by coming there. The service passed off quietly; no disposition being evinced to molest the preacher or disturb the proceedings. The procession from New York arrived some time before the sermon commenced; they numbered probably about two hundred, three abreast, and marched and countermarched up and down Atlantic street, waiting the arrival of the preacher, when they came up and stood until the sermon was over, and then proceeded down Smith street toward the Catherine Ferry, in the same order as they came in, followed by a large crowd. But no disturbance occurred until they had reached the junction of Main and Water streets; here and on the street leading thereto an immense crowd had congregated, and when about half the procession had passed Water street a general cry was made by the Irish—"Hip, boys, hip; now go in!" "Come on boys!" and with that came on showers of stones, sticks and brickbats, leveled at the New Yorkers.

A grand rush was now made, but the line of the procession remained unbroken, and marched to the Ferry gate, which they entered with military precision. As they were assaulted, they fired pistols at those who struck at them, and it is probable that about thirty shots were fired. One boy and a man fell on the pavement apparently dead. Some five or six were shot and a great many more had their heads, arms and legs broken with clubs. Pistols were also fired from the house tops, and stones fell like hail in every direction. The New Yorkers were within the gates and as they were being pelted, they fired a number of shots at the crowd without. One of the ferry boats took off a load of the New Yorkers, but the pilots of the two remaining boats seeing what was coming on, would not enter the dock, but stood off during the continuance of the riot. They finally entered the slip, and all those not arrested were permitted to take their departure. The police had to work; they had to fight like tigers, using their clubs freely and knocking down where they could all who resisted them.

At 7 1-2 o'clock the riot assumed an alarming aspect, and it seemed impossible to suppress the disturbance without the aid of the military. Orders were accordingly sent to the armory for the 14th Regiment of Militia, under command of Col. Jesse C. Smith, which was under arms, having been stationed at the armory during the afternoon awaiting orders. The Mayor came with them, and as he walked down Main street read the riot act.

The sheriff also appeared upon the scene of action, and the military were stationed so as to prevent any further outbreak. The mob was cleared away and quiet restored. This was about eight o'clock. Some 60 of the rioters were arrested and are under examination this morning. The premeditation of the Irish was clearly shown by the sticks with which they were armed being nearly all cut and pared, and of hard dry wood obtained from the wharfs in the neighborhood. Exaggerated rumors of the affair being circulated in New York, the most intense excitement prevailed. Crowds of persons congregated in the Park and on the corners of the streets. Some 500 persons assembled in front of the City Hall, and passed resolutions to proceed to the American Hall, corner of Broadway and Grant streets, there to procure ammunition and a reinforcement for the purpose of proceeding to Brooklyn. The disturbance was quieted however, and the Americans out of danger before they reached the scene.

☞ Says the Boston Bee, in reference to the feelings of the Bostonians, relative to the Nebraska bill:

Having given proof of their readiness to uphold the compromises of 1850, they, with all the people of the free States, had a clear and undoubted right to suppose that the South would not so act as to show that, while holding the North to the terms of an unpleasant contract, it was determined upon repudiating its own faith. Yet we were mistaken, and the slaveholding interest, while demanding the last pennyweight of the pound of flesh from us, has been guilty of one of the most odious acts that can be found in the whole history of legislation,—an act as foolish as it was wicked, as unnecessary as it was uncalled for by any portion of the people, and calculated to set the country in a blaze,—an end which, it must be admitted, it has accomplished in the most thorough and effectual manner.

OUTBREAK IN ITALY. The London correspondent of the New York Tribune, who appears to be well posted up in the movements of the European revolutionists, communicates the following:

"In Italy an outbreak can scarcely be prevented. Garribaldi has arrived at Genoa. Tommasco, the exiled Venitian statesman and poet, has likewise returned to Italy, and Mazzini is said to have disappeared from London; all this tends to the supposition that my next letter may be more interesting.

☞ A great fire occurred at Constantinople on the 5th ult., in which it is estimated that more than a thousand wooden houses have been burnt.

The Fugitive Slave Case in Boston!

We cut the following items from different papers:

As early as 6 o'clock Friday morning a crowd commenced assembling in Court Square, some of its members being anxious to obtain a standing place where they might remain till the decision of the Commissioner had been given.—At nine o'clock the Court House bell tolled, and the Court was opened. A piece of ordnance was placed on the easterly side of the Court House at an early hour. The various military companies were in readiness for action at seven o'clock. At half past nine the decision of the commissioner, granting Col. Suttle a certificate to take the slave, was finished, and the Square cleared of the crowd. Mayor Smith issued a proclamation announcing that Maj. Gen. Edmands and the Chief of Police were authorized to so dispose their forces as would best subserve the requirements of an immergency, and calling on all well disposed citizens to leave the avenues and streets around the Court House and to demean themselves as peaceable and law-abiding citizens. Attempts were made to purchase Burns, but without effect. Several arrests were made during the forenoon—one of the parties arrested had two pistols in his possession. Jones, one of the witnesses in the slave case, was arrested for being too earnest in his declamations. At two o'clock the excitement in the neighborhood of the Court House was at the highest pitch, as it was momentarily expected that the slave would be removed. R. H. Dana, the senior counsel for the defence, was greeted with twelve hearty cheers as he passed up State street. At half-past two every avenue leading to the Court House was guarded by a detachment of soldiers and police. Soldiers kept Court and State streets, to Long Wharf cleared. The 4th Regiment U. S. Artillery took charge of the field piece, and cartridges were deposited in pouches which were borne by some of the men. Every man's musket was duly inspected. The U. S. Marines, and the Artillery men were first marched out of the Court House. Next came 120 special officers, employed by the U. S. government, under command of Peter Dunbar, Jr. Each of these officers was armed with a sword and loaded revolver. They formed into a hollow square directly in front of the easterly entrance to the Court House.

These preparations having been completed, Burns was escorted out of the Court House by the U. S. Marshal Freeman and some half dozen of his aids, who took their position in the centre of the hollow square. At this moment Burns appeared as indifferent as the most uninterested spectator, and the cries of shame! shame! the hisses, groans, and other demonstrations which greeted his appearance, did not seem in the least to excite him.

The column was then formed in the following order: A detachment of the National Lancers were on the right and left of the street; a corp of U. S. Artillery, followed by a corps of U. S. Marines; hollow square of special officers, in the centre of which was the U. S. Marshal, his aids, and the fugitive, Anthony Burns; a corps of U. S. Marines; the field piece, drawn by a span of horses and manned by a detachment of six of the members of the 4th Regt. U. S. Artillery; a corps of U. S. Marines.

The rabble attempted to force their way upon the rear of the corps of U. S. Marines, but the formidable appearance of a detachment of the National Lancers, and others of the M. Y. M., deterred them at short notice from proceeding.

At the corner of Court Square and Court street, the demonstrations were loud and uproarous.

Passing down State street the procession was greeted the whole entire route with groans, cheers, hisses, but no attempt at rescue was made. The most intense interest was manifested to get a parting glimpse of the fugitive.

As the column was passing through State street, by the office of the Commonwealth, the procession was greeted with a shower of cayenne pepper, cowitch, or some other most noxious substance, thrown from the Commonwealth building.

A bottle, containing a liquid, believed to be vitriol, was also thrown from the Commonwealth building, nearly across State st. The misile would have struck Joseph W. Coburn, Esq., had he not chanced to see it coming directly towards his head, and dodged aside. As it was, however, the bottle struck the pavement and was dashed in pieces, and very fortunately the contents harmed no one.

The procession turned at the head of Long Wharf and proceeded down the back side of the wharf and thence to T wharf, at which the steamer John Tyler was lying. Burns was marched directly aboard and taken to the cabin out of sight of the crowds.

The wharves and vessels in the vicinity were crowded with thousands of persons gathered to witness the embarkation. The U. S. Marines and the company of U. S. Troops from Fort Independence went down the harbor.

The steamer was delayed at the wharf about one hour after Burns went on board. The delay was mainly occasioned by the labor of getting the field piece, which was drawn in the procession, aboard the steamer.

At quarter past three, everything was on board, and the word to cast off was given.

At precisely twenty minutes past three, the steamer swung from the wharf, and proceeded down the harbor, with Revenue Cutter Morris, which had been previously towed down to the castle.

The steamer will there put Burns on board the cutter, and then take her in tow and tow her to sea.

She will then land the company of troops at the fort and return with the marines to the navy yard.

The Light Dragoons, Capt. Wright, had a hard duty to perform to keep the crowds from entering State street, from the avenues leading thereto, and in the faithful and fearless discharge of their duty, were obliged to draw their heavy sabres, and "cut right and left." In the exercise of this duty, one man, who was somewhat more venturesome than the rest, or who was more unfortunate, received a severe but not dangerous wound on the head from a sabre, and was conducted by the Police to Station No. 1, where a physician was called to attend him.

A valuable horse, belonging to a member of the corps of National Lancers, who was on duty in Commercial street, was severely stabbed in the side by some unknown person, and so badly injured that it was thought that the noble animal would have to be killed.

The decision in the Fugitive Slave Case and Impression.—Finally the crisis has been reached. Burns has been remanded to slavery. The law has been executed, fully, vigilantly, determinedly. The excitement of an entire week, intense and startling beyond any thing in our whole history, has passed. The hollow square has been formed, the long procession of military has passed, the loaded field-pieces have been dragged through our streets, and Burns, a poor slave, has been put on board the vessel which is conveying him to Virginia.

An Exciting Week.—The week that closes today, has been a most exciting one for our city—exciting, we think, beyond any precedent. It will mark itself on our annals in bold characters, and be remembered with mingled emotions—of sadness or joy, as the stand-point is at one point or another. Events have occurred that, we trust, may never occur again. A fever of tumult has ruled every hour; and words have been uttered, and deeds acted that must bring little but sorrow in reflection.

We hope to have no more such weeks. Neither Boston, its people or humanity could bear up under it.

The Military.—More than 1200 soldiers are on duty to preserve the peace, and for such other purposes or emergencies as may be required.

The First Brigade Massachusetts Volunteer Militia is in waiting upon the Common, under Brig. Gen. Andrews, ready for service. This Brigade embraces all the militia companies in the city, and also the Independent Cadets. The several companies are under their respective commanders.

In the Court House.—The Court House is packed with U. S. troops, fully armed and equipped. During the night a large quantity of balls, slugs and powder were conveyed into the building, and secreted in the "dark regions below" from which they will be disentombed should a fearful necessity, which we pray may not exist, require.

The Police and Watch.—The entire Police and Watch forces are on duty, their ranks swelled with about 100 recruits. The force numbers 350 and more.

The Deed is Done.—We give below the particulars of the infamous decision of the slave-catcher Loring, remanding Burns to his claimant. The city is alive with excitement and indignation at the outrageous villainy. We know of no words to express our feelings with.

Seven Days Later from Europe.

Revel Attacked—Sebastopol Bombarded, etc. etc.

The British steamer Asia, which left Liverpool on the 20th ult., arrived at New York yesterday afternoon, with seven days later news from England. The steamer Arctic left on the 17th, but struck a rock off Tuskar, and had to put back to Liverpool for repairs. The news from the seat of war is as contradictory as ever, and consists of the usual rumors of fights, victories, &c. A report of the bombardment of Revel by the British Baltic squadron is in circulation at Paris, but it seems to be discredited. Revel lies on the southern coast of the Gulf of Finland, near its junction with the Baltic. It seems pretty clear that Admiral Napier is in no hurry to make his threatened dash at Cronstadt. An "authentic despatch," is said to have been received by the London Times, to the effect that Sebastopol had been bombarded by the allied fleets four days. The British steamer Tiger, of 16 guns, stranded near Odessa, and surrendered to the Russians. Two steamers were sent to cut her out, but failed, or in other words were beaten off. To the Russians, therefore, belongs the honor of having captured the first vessel of war.

A despatch received in Paris from Vienna, on the 15th, states that the bombardment of Silistria, with eighty pieces of cannon, had commenced. The evacuation of Lower Wallachia had been suspended. The allies are now in sole possession of Varna, and as the French have already advanced to Adrianople, the Turkish garrison of that city is on its way to Shumla. A despatch from Constantinople, of the 9th, announces that Sebastopol had been cannonaded by the French and English fleets, with guns of long range, and with a view to destroy the advanced works of the port. The allied fleets attacked one of the outposts of Sebastopol, and the Russians were compelled to abandon it. Three vessels were cruising along the coast of Circassia, waiting for the Ottoman fleet, which was to bring 5000 men for disembarkation in Abasia. Vely Pasha has been confirmed in his post, at the request of Prince Napoleon.

Constantinople, May 10.—The Duke of Cambridge, and Marshal St. Arnaud, have arrived. The ratifications of the treaty of triple alliance have been exchanged. From Kalafat it is reported that an engagement between six squadrons of Cossacks and five of Turkish hussars had taken place near Badoum, on the 4th of May. The Cossacks were defeated, and lost 60 horses, two guns, and 138 men killed.

Vienna, May 10. Orders have been received at Adrianople to have provisions ready for 70,000 men, who are expected there towards the end of the month. The Vladika of Montenegro has declined to make war against the Turks. The Russians are preparing materials for two bridges, intended to be thrown across the Danube, between the Schyl and the Aleuta. Their flotilla is concentrated near Hirsova, with a view to act against Silistria. The troops of Omar Pasha have driven the Russians out of Krajova.

Trebizond, April 30. The forts of Nevoposs-is and Geleadjik, on the Circassian coast, have been evacuated by the Russians. Techem Kale is almost deserted. A despatch from Omar Pasha, dated Shumla, May 6th, states that Sali Pasha had on on the 28th of April defeated the Russians at Nicopolis, with a loss to the Russians of 1400 men. On the 2d of May, Suliman Bey had also defeated the Russians at Padova, not far from Krajova. The Paris Journal Patrie says news has been received from Constantinople that the Russians had attempted recently to cross the Danube at various points, and that they had been repulsed with heavy loss. Accounts have been received from the Danube to the effect that, owing to a sudden rise and overflow of the river, immense damage had been done to the Russians. Their pontoon works have been swept away, their bridges destroyed, and it is also added that sickness had broken out among them to a considerable extent.

Russia.—Advices from Cracow state positively that a corps of 20,000 Russians, with artillery and provisions, is on its march towards the Austrian Gallician frontier, so that the roads between Warsaw and Kielco are much encumbered. On the Austrian side there are stated to be 100,000 men already concentrated at Gallicia, together with 150,000 men in Sout Hungary, part of whom are directed on South Transylvania. An American and two Russian ships had arrived at Cronstadt, and the navigation must therefore have been completely open.

From St. Petersburgh 9th, letters state that the British fleet had been seen 25 miles off Cronstadt, and had captured a number of gunboats. The Russians retired from the exposed ports on the 11th. The British Baltic fleet took possession of Bosners, on the Island of Aland, on the 12th.

Paris, May 18.—A distrust of Prussia is increasing, and the government papers, by quoting articles hostile to the Prussian King and Cabinet, show the displeasure of the French government at the conduct of the former. The correspondent of the London Morning Chronicle, says it was reported in Paris on Monday, that a levy of 100,000 men has been ordered by the Russian government.

Spain.—The Spanish government have sent an answer to Mr Soule, who despatched the same by a special messenger to the United States. It is reported the American government have abandoned all their claims against Spain if she will cede her African possessions in Melilla to the United States.

Obituary.

Died, in New Hartford, Ct., May 18th, Hellen Josephine, only child of Alfred and Emeline Allen, aged 3 years. Her sufferings were most severe. She now sleeps in the embrace of death—no more to awake till the voice of the archangel is heard, and the trump of God sounds to wake all the precious saints that sleep in the dust. She said before she departed, "Mother, I am going to die, and am going into the kingdom, and I want you to go with me." Although she is gone from us for a little season, yet she, with Rachel's children, will come again from the land of the enemy; for there is hope in thine end saith the Lord, that thy children shall come again to their own border. "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not," saith our Savior, "for of such is the kingdom of God."

Bro. Merriam:—This beautiful hymn, is so applicable to the time in which we live, I thought it ought to be in circulation among the Brethren who are looking for the Bridegroom, even Jesus, the King of kings, and Lord of lords.—Please insert it in the Crisis. Yours, looking for redemption this year. Blessed be the King of Israel that cometh in the name of the Lord, and let all the true Israel say, Amen and Amen.

A. Merry.

The Bridegroom is Coming.

When descending from the sky,
The Bridegroom shall appear;
And the dead in Christ arise,
And all, the trump shall hear,
How the sound our hearts shall daunt,
How will shame o'erspread each face,
If we only have a lamp
Without the oil of faith!

Foolish virgins then will wail
And seek for a supply,
But in vain will undertake
To borrow or to buy;
Then with those they once despised,
Earnestly they seek to share;
But the best among the wise
Will have no oil to spare.

Wise are they, and truly blest,
Who then shall ready be;
But despair will seize the rest,
And dreadful misery.
Once, they cry, we scorned to doubt,
Though in lies our trust we put;
Now our lamp of hope is out,
The door of mercy is shut.

Should they then presume to plead,
"Lord, open to us now,
We on earth have heard and prayed,
And with thy people bowed,"
He will answer from his throne,
"Though you with my people mix'd,
Yet to me you are unknown,
Depart, your doom is fix'd."

O that none who worship here,
May hear that sound, depart,
Lord, impress a godly fear
On each professor's heart;
Help us, Lord, to search the camp,
Let us not ourselves beguile,
Trusting to a fading lamp,
Without a stock of oil.

Call to Preach.

Doubtless there are many laborers in the vinyard who are not called of God, and on the other hand many who are fully qualified and called, who refuse to enter upon the glorious work. Perhaps circumstances will not permit, or they do not feel qualified, or have doubts whether they are really called of God to preach. Many things are to be considered in this call.—The man who intends to preach and present truth, needs the whole armor of God, and his help must come from the Lord of strength.

Doubtless some are called of God to proclaim the last message of time—the kingdom of God at hand, yet, Jonah-like, go another way. Those who refuse to obey, must expect a fearful end. I ask if a man is called of God to preach who shuns to declare the whole truth? and who seeks to please the itching ears of the people of this generation? and to be called of men Rabbi? Yet there are a class at the present day, that do so, and make themselves rich. They recieve from $1,000 to $4-000 salary a year, &c. These characters do not appear much like the meek and lowly Redeemer who trod this earth in sorrow, and went about doing good. "He had not where to lay his head." It is consistent to believe that a great mass of the professed ministers at the present time, are not called of God to preach; and more, it would not be far from the truth to believe they do not possess the Holy Ghost. They do not seem to care for poor souls, provided their salaries are in due time received.

Let us look, for a moment, at the opposite side of the question, and ask what are some of the qualifications that a man should possess to enable him to enter upon the blessed work.

1st. Personal Holiness is indispensable. None but the pure in heart are called of God to preach to the wicked. God saith, "what hast thou to do to declare my statutes?" To whom can this apply, if not to ungodly ministers.

2d. Good Common Sense is an important requisite. To define this, we may call it a sound and independent judgment, independent of what men may think or say, sound in the scriptures, &c.

3d. Firmness and Holy Boldness are needful. He who is to be a standard bearer in the Lord's hosts must not be faint-hearted, in full but friendly tones, he must be able to tell men their danger, whether they will hear or forbear. And further, in this holy warfare, through faith, even the timid become brave, out of weakness they become strong, wax valiant in fight, turn to flight the armies of the aliens. God can give a tongue to speak, and He will if needful.

He who is called to enter upon this work should do it with gladness, saying, it is my delight to do thy will O God. He looks up to a bleeding Saviour, and has been healed. He looks round on a dying world, and his soul goes forth in longings which cannot be uttered; and like the spirit that moved on the deep, it seems to spread itself in tender sympathy over all. Why may they not be healed? he asks with hope and wonder. There is balm enough, and a physician that is adequate, and tongues enough to speak the joyful tidings.

Viewed in this new relation to a dying world and to God, a radiance of glory comes down from heaven around the secluded sphere in which sovereign grace has found him. In that sphere, whether at the plough—the bench—the anvil, or counter, he is not merely content, but will rejoice to remain, provided it be the calling in which God may employ him most effectually to his glory, and the salvation of souls. Now men of such a spirit are the men that a dying world needs, and that it must have, or souls will continue to throng the way to ruin. Such men see joy set before them which the world cannot proffer—that for which the Savior endured the cross, despising the shame.

In conclusion I would say, in view of the shortness of time, the certainty of the judgment, the day in which will be made known the secrets of all men's hearts, O be wise, weigh the matter well, and labor for the interest of dying men.

The Morning Light.

Brother Merriam:—We are told in Prov. 4: 18, "The path of the just is as the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." Again, Hosea 6: 3, "Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord: his going forth is prepared as the morning." Again, in Mal. 4: 2, "But unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings." That these metaphors are intended to illustrate the manner in which, to them that look for him, our Lord will appear the second time, I think is too manifest to need proof. I would ask then, how does the morning come upon the earth? Does it come in a moment from the darkness of midnight to the full blaze of day? O no. From the first dawn, the light becomes developed more and more until the horizon is bright enough to usher in the king of day. Such then according to God's unerring word, must be the manner in which the blessed Sun of righteousness will come to his believing, waiting children. Here then please note two facts. 1st. That the sun rises at a given point in the course or progress of the day. And 2d. That the light preceding his rising indicates very nearly that point before he appears in sight. I leave the reader to draw the manifest inference. But as these metaphors do not tell us definitely how near the time will be understood, we proceed to inquire, is there nothing still more explicit? Please then turn to Luke 17: 26, and onward, and we have the declaration of Him whose "word shall not pass away," that it shall be as it was in the days of Noah and of Lot in the day when the Son of man shall be revealed. But how was it then? How nearly did they know the time? Why so near as the very day. Then our Lord's word being true, his people must understand the day of his coming. But again we are told in Mal. 4: 5, "Behold I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord." But as this cannot mean Elijah literally, and personally, we conclude it is some person or class of persons whose work or calling, and final deliverance will resemble his. His calling seems to be to stand for the truth of God comparatively alone, in opposition to the apostacy and idolatry of a degenerate age, and the seductive influence of 'that woman Jezebel;' and his deliverance was by translation. The application of this part of the subject we leave for the reader. But did Elijah know the day his redemption was to come? O yes, all the prophets seemed to understand that. And permit me here to remark, that I know of no important event which was to occur on any one day to God's people, in the whole range of scripture history, but that day was known before the event occurred. Hence from all precedent, and the entire harmony of scripture, the DAY of our Lord's second coming must be understood before he comes, as is also plainly implied in his illustration of the 'householder,' and 'thief,' and of the evil servant. From the foregoing then, and many other arguments we might advance, I trust this point will be conceded by all candid believers in his near approach.

If, then, dear brethren and sisters, we are so near the prize, and I see no evading it, "What manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness?" If the children of Israel must wash their clothes, and sanctify themselves to stand about the mount, made holy and awful by the presence of Jehovah at its summit, how much more should we "cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of the Lord, that we may stand approved before his presence with exceeding joy." We should, however, as we approach that solemn, glorious day, avoid all undue excitement, and whatever savors of fanaticism, as unbecoming our high calling. Let us maintain the dignity of sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty as Elijah and Jesus did; remembering that a full preparation to meet him consists not in excitement or noise, but in perfect holiness, purity, and love. O let these be in us and abound, that we may be found of Him in peace without spot, and blameless.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Hartland, Vt., April 17th, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I feel truly grateful for the bundles of papers sent weekly since the Crisis commenced. God be praised for the salutary influence they have had on the sleeping Virgins in this place. Many have arisen, trimmed their lamps, and are going forth to meet the Bridegroom. Fifteen have left the city of destruction, and have enlisted under the Prince of Peace! They have been planted in the likeness of his death, and hope soon to be in the likeness of his resurrection. Brethren D. B. Wyat, I. Adrian, J. G. Bennet, Wm. Southerland, and Levi Dudley, have each labored in this work. Many backsliders have been reclaimed who have not attended meeting for years. The Lord is good—blessed be His name forever. "The midnight cry in mercy sounds," to the inhabitants of this doomed earth. Some are determined to press their way down to everlasting destruction.

O pause, ye giddy youth, on the verge of eternity, before it is too late. Soon they that are holy, will be holy still; and they that are filthy, will be filthy still.

Yours in hope of eternal life this year.

Frederick Densmore.

Pawlings, N. Y., April 18th, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—I receive the Crisis weekly and 'tis truly food for me. I like the paper because it does not cry "peace and safety," and "my Lord delayeth his coming," and for the Christ-like spirit manifested by those who write for it. I am much pleased with the course you have pursued in publishing what you believe, and letting others do the same. We are too near the judgement to enter into strife and debate in regard to the Lord's coming; I believe we have present truth to proclaim to the world, and a very brief time to do it in. This truth is the Lord's immediate coming. Our attention has of late been drawn from this important truth by the life and death question. The good Lord has given us much light of late, and if we obey him he will continue to let it shine brighter, and brighter, even until the perfect day. I thank the Lord, I am not afraid of time. The nearer it is proved to be, the better it suits me if true. The condition of the world at the present time gives us reason to believe it "near even at the door." I know of no signs but what are in the past, except the sign of the Son of man; and I think probably we shall see that before long. Men's hearts are now failing through fear and looking for those things that are coming on the earth. Some look for one thing, some for another; all in doubt and darkness, sleeping as did the aentdeluvians; but they will soon be awakened by the voice of the Archangel and the trump of God, calling them to judgment. Oh let us praise the Lord for his goodness and mercy; for the promise that he hath given us, (1st Thess. 5th, 4th.) "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief." Judging from the signs of the times, we are almost home. Two of the four Angels have let go their hold, and how soon the others will, the Lord only knows, but I think it will not be long. The nations are angry. They are beating their ploughshares into swords, and their pruning-hooks into spears. They are rushing madly onward, little thinking that the strife will soon end in their destruction. I believe those great voices will soon be heard in heaven, saying, "the Kingdoms of this world, are become the Kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ." If there ever was a time that required watchfulness, it is now. The world and a fallen Church are constantly crying, "Lo here and there," and "where is the promise of his coming;" but we know in whom we have believed, we know his word is true, for he cannot lie." There seems to be many conflicting opinions in regard to the Lord's coming. Some think the Jews must return first, and build up the "unwalled villages" spoken of in Ezekiel. I think they are mistaken. The Saviour said Jerusalem should "be troden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled." As I understand it, Christ will then come, and the times of restitution of all things begin. The Angel Gabriel told the Prophet Daniel the same thing in the 9th ch., 26th and 27th vs. He there says, the city and sanctuary shall be destroyed and made desolate, even until the consumation or end. Such testimony as this, is not to be set aside. Inference must give way to such texts as these; and as we do not all see alike, let us have charity one for another, and "judge nothing before the time until the Lord come." For he will not tarry beyond the appointed time. Let none of us forget that God requires holiness of heart, and brotherly love, in order to secure us an entrance into his everlasting kingdom. May the Lord give us much of his spirit to guide and direct us, and abide with us, that it may quicken us to eternal life in the day of his coming.

Yours in the blessed hope,

John B. Dodge.

Whitefield, Me., March 5, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I write to inform you that God is at work in this place converting sinners. Bro. Brown attended a meeting here three days, Bro. Mason followed, and ten or twelve were willing to confess the truth, eight were buried in baptism, and I trust the work will not cease. I am satisfied that in a very few months all will be over with the sinner.—May God have mercy on them. If I maintain a holy life, I shall be delivered this year, Glory to God through our Lord Jesus Christ. Says the Scripture, "Having your conversation honest among the Gentiles, that whereas they speak against you as evil doers, they may by your good works which they shall behold, glorify God in the day of visitation." "Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake, whether it be to the king as supreme; or unto governors as unto them that are sent by him for the punishment of evil doers, and for the praise of them that do well. For so is the will of God, that with well doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men; as free and not using your liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, but as the servants of God. Honor all men, love the brotherhood, fear God, honor the king." Will Brother Cummings come this way as soon as may be?

H. H. Northey.

Surry, March 13th, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—About two years and a half ago, the Lord sent his servants to visit us, who spread before us the bread of life. We were, at the time, both professors and non professors, alike immersed in the cares and love of the present world: and for upwards of two years, we have had the word preached to us by our beloved Brother Read, whose untiring labors have been blessed of God. Backsliders have been reclaimed, and sinners have been converted, and from the first, our numbers have been increasing. The community at large have been much stirred. The cry of peace and safety is heard in every direction, to lull to sleep those who are somewhat awakened; but the little Church who are led by the Spirit of God, and the word of His grace, are looking to the sure word of prophecy. We see the end of all things is at hand; therefore we want to be ready, and have our work done, and well done. We want to have our lamps trimmed and burning when Jesus shall come to take home his weary bride, which we believe will be this year. We earnestly solicit the prayers of God's humble people every where, that we come behind in no gift waiting for the Lord. We do thank the Lord for light and truth that has been shed on our path; we thank God for revealing the time in his word. It has awakened a deep and lively interest in our hearts to prepare for the judgment of the great day. The little Church in Surry meet in conference every fourth Saturday in every month. We hope Brethren and Sisters from abroad will meet with us; and preaching Brethren while traveling in this direction, we hope will visit us and preach the word of life.

Yours, looking for immortality when Jesus comes.

Benjamin Smith.

Cavendish, March 26th, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—It cheers my heart to hear the glad news of our Savior's soon coming to take his waiting children home. I do believe we are almost there; a little while longer and our trials will have an end. I thank the Lord, He has been good to me; and I mean by the grace of God, to prove faithful till Jesus comes to take His children home. We are all children of one family, and our Father's family will soon get home. Glory to God, we shall all very soon be seated around our Father's table in the kingdom. Brothers and Sisters, let us be faithful a few months more, and he that shall come, will come and not tarry.

PROPHETIC PERIODS—1260, 1290, 1335 Years of Daniel and John.

The daily sacrifice taken away, and the Abomination of Desolation set up, or the Saints given unto the hand of the Little Horn. . . . . 519.

1260 years of tribulation.—Rev. 11: 2, 3, and 12: 6, 14, and 13: 5. The sun darkened May 19, 1780, to show its termination. — 1779.

1290 years, or time times and the dividing of time—or time times and a part, in which the TIMES and LAWS are in the hands of the Little Horn. — 1809. Napoleon taken away the civil power of the Little Horn.

Fall of the stars 1833.

1335 years, reaching from the setting up of the Abomination of Desolation, or the time when the Saints' times and laws were given into the hand of the Little Horn, to the end, when Daniel with all the Saints will stand in their lot . . . . 1854.

THE END.

☞ The above Diagram is designed to illustrate the measurement of time from the rise of the little horn, with eyes and a mouth (the civil power of the Greek Empire, or Eastern Rome incorporated with the Ecclesiastical Power of the Papacy.—Dan. 7: 8) until the coming of Christ at the resurrection of the saints.

The 1290 years, or time, times and the dividing of time, (Dan. 7: 25) measure the period during which the saints, times and laws were to be given into his hand—The period of the saint's tribulation, we understand, were shortened to 1260 years, (Rev. 12: 6, 14—11: 2 and 13: 5); but times and laws were to remain in his hand during 1290 years, extending 30 years beyond the 1260. "But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion to consume and destroy unto the end." 45 years from the close of the 1290 make 1335 years, when Daniel will stand in his lot, which must be at the resurrection of the saints.

Christ, speaking of this desolating power—the papacy—says, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened,"—which marks a point previous to which the saints were taken out of the hands of the little horn power. Thus we perceive that 1260 years of the 1335 ended prior to the 19th of May, 1780, when the sun was darkened. Add 75 years to 1260 and you have 1335 years, which must end before May 19th, 1855, according to the evidence from the darkening of the sun. But we have abundant historical evidence that the papal power, i. e. the abomination that maketh desolate, was set up in 519, hence the 1335 days (years) end in 1854, which brings the coming of the Lord and the resurrection of the saints the present year.

Samuel Page.

Nashua, N. H., April 7th, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—My mind has been directed to the Parable of the ten Virgins. While the Bridegroom tarried, the ten Virgins (the Church) all slumbered and slept. What did they sleep on? I answer time; for they went out on time, and as the time passed they slumbered and slept, and consequently they slept on time. At midnight the cry is made, "behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him." I understand this to be the present movement, and I see the Virgins rising and trimming their lamps. I have great confidence in the advent movement, and believe God has been and is still with us. "Yet a little while, and He that shall come, will come and not tarry." "Now the just shall live by faith; but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him." Beware that you do not leave the truth of God because some Ministers reject it, and ridicule the word of God. The Lord is at work among His people, praise His dear name. O sinner, prepare for the judgment. You are hearing the last call of mercy, the nations are gathering for the last conflict, and soon it will be said from the throne, "it is done."

N. Eaton.

Hawley, Mass., March 19th, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—A desire to do the will of my Heavenly Father has induced me to take my pen at this time. I think every one, that claims the relationship of a child of God, will enquire, "Lord what wilt thou have me to do?" The satisfaction of knowing that we are approved of God is beyond any joy that this earth affords. We read of Enoch who prophesied of Jesus' coming, before his translation, having the testimony that his way pleased God. The service of God is not hard; His yoke is easy, and His burden is light. Paul says, "I can do all things through Christ which strengthneth me." All the members in Christ's body have not the same office; but every part is necessary to the body. We shall find that the Lord will not acquit us without doing the little duties he requires of us, though we may think ourselves weak and incapable. Those that do Christ's commands, "have right to the tree of life, and enter in through the gates into the city." Dear Brethren and Sisters, let us gird on the armor, wield manfully the sword of the Spirit, warn our fellow men around us faithfully, that we may in the coming day feel that we are free from the blood of all men. This year, if faithful, I expect we shall have rest in God's everlasting kingdom, comforted from all our sorrows, in the New Jerusalem. Afflicted ones of earth will soon have their tears all wiped away, and find a home where sorrow cannot come. Our Redeemer lives, He has given His life for us—for us he groaned and died—for us he comes again. The King in His beauty we shall see for ourselves—be where He is—and behold His glory.

J. H. C.

To my Brethren: I am glad that I never fought the Advent doctrine; if I had, my eyes might have been closed to the present truth. Although not identified with the movement in '44, I dared not speak against it. After the time passed, I concluded that the idea of Christ's coming very soon would be given up; and so kept on preaching the doctrines of the Methodists, feeling quite safe, until one day, as I was passing the house of Br. Rawson, in Jamaica, he asked me if I wanted to read the "Advent Herald," provided I could have it gratuitously. I replied, yes: and from that time for a year or more, it was sent to me regularly every week. I soon became interested in the Advent doctrines, and invited the preachers to hold meetings in the place where I lived. Br. A. Merrill came first, then Br. Gibson, and S. B. Munn; their meetings were attended with profit, and as they set no time, I fell in with many of their views. I made up my mind that no one would ever know the time of Christ's coming, but that we should be always ready. With this view of the subject, I moved to Fitchburg, and went to work. Soon my worldly prospects were of the most flattering nature. I made money rapidly, and thought that in a little time I should be able to build a house, and have every thing to my own mind as the Lord might not come for a long time. When my ambition was at the highest point, I heard that the Adventists were preaching definite time, which I thought to be an absurdity, and hence did not put myself in the way to hear the arguments. During the summer it was often suggested to my mind, that possibly the time was right; and if so, I ought to know it. In the fall I attended a tent meeting at Concord N. H. where I was convinced that the time brethren had the spirit of God among them, and before the meeting closed, that they had the truth also. Since that I have traveled and lectured almost constantly.—In almost every place a great desire is manifested to hear on the subject. The church has been aroused, as far as they have had an opportunity to hear. Sinners are converted to God, and the wanderer reclaimed. The Lord is with the message. Brethren, let us hold fast.

We must be holy in thought, in CONVERSATION, and in practice. A very little sin will keep us outside after all. We have had our last disappointment; this year will bring the Saviour, Blessed be God. Can it be that we are so near the Judgment? Let us endure all opposition with patience; in a few days our work will be done, and Jesus will say, "come thou blessed of my Father."

If the Lord will, I calculate to visit the brethren in Vt. again.

May the Lord keep our hearts in his love till he comes.

Wm. L. Camp.

Brother Merriam:—I am at home again, about worn out in body, but strong in the faith of the coming of Christ this year.—I have been attending a meeting at Belchertown, where God has been doing a great work. I have Baptised 26, the last 4 days, most of whom have been converted during the same time. The spirit of God was remarkably manifest at the Baptismal waters; and many found justification by faith, standing on the bank of that little river. Praise the Lord for his goodness to these brands saved from the burning at the eleventh hour. I have never attended a meeting where there was so little excitement as at this meeting. Those who have reported otherwise, have slandered all who participated in the exercises of the meeting. God forgive them. Envy, malice, evil speaking, parabolic insinuations, and vile slander, characterise the age in which we live. Patience is the greatest blessing God can bestow. He who knows well our need of this grace to enable us to endure, will not withhold it now. The more I look over the argument, the more satisfied I am, of its correctness. The Lord save us from abandoning the first principles of Adventism. I shall be able to leave home again soon, those wishing me to visit them on my Northern Tour will address me without delay. My P. O. address is Pleasant Valley Conn. Yours looking for the kingdom,

Isaac Adrian.

The Great Anti-Christian Power,

AS REPRESENTED BY

DANIEL, CHRIST, PAUL AND JOHN:

BY J. COUCH.

"When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand:)"—Matt. 24: 15.

2. The Greek kingdom will adopt the religious creed of the Catholic Church. (Dan. 11: 30). "He shall return and have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant." As we have remarked upon this subject, to have intelligence with one, is "to understand," or, "to take one's ideas or meaning;" therefore the civil rulers in the government must adopt and establish the same articles of faith as are taught by the Catholic Church. It appears from the above passage in the 11th of Dan., in connection with its context, that the government would adopt the doctrines taught by an apostate Church prior to the establishment of the abomination. We learn from history, that from the time when the last of the ten horns arose down to the death of Anastasius, (518,) the government of Constantinople had never sustained by legislative enactments the Catholic creed; but the first acts of Justin's administration (in 518) were enactments to establish the faith of the Roman Church. Says Bower, "The acts of the council were immediately communicated to the emperor, who not only approved and confirmed them, but issued an edict, commanding all bishops, within his dominions, to receive publicly, in the presence of the clergy and people, the council of Chalcedon, on pain of forfeiting their sees." * * * "The above-mentioned edicts were no sooner published in the provinces, than councils were every where assembled, and synodical letters sent up from all quarters to Constantinople, fraught with invectives, curses, and anathemas, against all who presumed to dispute the authority of the holy COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON. They were now all convinced, that the doctrine of the two natures was the only true doctrine, and, as such, THEY RECEIVED IT, declaring the opposite dogma, which, in the late emperor's time, most of them had held, and zealously defended, to be a blasphemy against heaven, and pronouncing all, who countenanced it, enemies to God and his Church. I do not know of a single bishop, who chose rather to forfeit his see, THAN RENOUNCE HIS OPINION: THE IMPERIAL EDICTS carried with them such a conviction, as none could withstand.

Justin, having thus united the eastern bishops among themselves, (for none durst now utter a single word against the council of Chalcedon, or the two natures), undertook, in the next place, to unite them with their brethren in the west, coveting nothing so much as the glory of putting an end to the unhappy divisions, that, to the disgrace of the Christian name and religion, had so long prevailed in the Catholic Church." * * * * * * "But the council of Chalcedon was received, from the beginning, by all in the west; and its being as universally received in the east was entirely owing, as we have seen, to the decree which Justin issued, of his own motion, as soon as he ascended the imperial throne." From these quotations it appears evident, that the Greek empire did adopt and establish the creed of the Catholic Church and as we have before shown, the point of time when this occurred was in A. D. 518.

3. The Greek kingdom will rely on the spiritual discernment of the Catholic Church for the development of truth from the scriptures, as represented by the eyes in the little horn of Dan. 7th. Says Gibbon, "In the first years of his" (Justinian's) "administration, he signalized his zeal as a disciple and patron of orthodoxy; the reconciliation of the Greeks and Latins established the tomes of St. Leo as the creed of the Emperor and empire; the Nestorians and Eutychians were exposed on either side, to the double edge of persecution; and the four synods of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon were ratified by the code of a Catholic lawgiver." Thus we perceive that the Greek kingdom depended on the teaching of the Catholic Church for an understanding of spiritual things.

4. The Greek kingdom will constitute the Catholic priesthood the legalized teachers of Christian doctrine, as represented by the "mouth" in the little horn of Dan. 7th, and the "mouth" given to the Beast of Rev. 13th. The remark of Bower above quoted establishes this point, viz.: "I do not know of a single Bishop who chose rather to forfeit his see than renounce his opinion: the imperial edicts carried with them such convictions as none could withstand."

5. The Greek kingdom will submit to the dictation of the Church so as to become a desolating or persecuting power.

The Emperor, in a letter to the Pope, entreating him not to oblige the imperial government to persecute those who did not agree with him in faith, says, "that he is extremely grieved to find the great work of an entire reconciliation, which he had so much at heart, thus retarded; but on the other side, is no less unwilling to proceed to violence, and shed the blood of his innocent subjects; and therefore does not doubt but his apostleship, rather THAN OBLIGE HIM TO TURN PERSECUTOR, will connive, for the present, at the names of the orthodox bishops being kept in the diptychs, and be satisfied with their condemning the memory of Acacius alone; the rather, as his holy predecessor Anastasius had required no more, to receive all to his communion, who professed the same faith. BUT THE POPE [521] WAS DEAF TO ALL REMONSTRANCES AND REASONS. He still insisted on the condemnation not only of Acacius, but of all who had communicated with him, or his memory; and because the emperor had shown himself, in his letter, utterly averse to persecution and bloodshed, he strove in his answer, to reconcile him to both. 'Many things,' says he, 'which we naturally detest and abhor, are, in some cases, necessary remedies; and then, our health being at stake, we are not to consult, but strive to overcome, our natural aversion. In sickness, we are apt to complain of the remedies that are prescribed for our cure, and bate those who prescribe them. But would it be good natured or friendly in a physician to forbear applying what he knows to be conducive to health, out of compassion, or through fear of causing a momentary pain? It is cruelty to spare, and compassion to cure, let the remedies, that work the cure, be ever so painful.' Thus did the pope, in direct opposition to the doctrine of the gospel, endeavor to extinguish in the emperor all sense of humanity; nay, and to convince him, that he could by no other means better show himself a kind and benevolent prince, than by shedding the blood of his innocent people. These anti-Christian principles have EVER SINCE been maintained, as is but too well known, by the Church of Rome; and, in compliance with them, the popes have never failed, when it was in their power, to encourage persecution, and stir up the popish princes to persecute, and pursue with FIRE and SWORD, their protestant subjects. To these principles are owing the racks, the dungeons, and the unrelenting torments of the inquisition; it being highly meritorious with the ministers of that infernal tribunal to rack the body, without mercy, for the good of the soul, and highly criminal for any of them to show compassion, let the torments be ever so exquisite, when they are, as they say, become necessary remedies for the cure of the soul."

From the above quotations it appears, that the government of Constantinople considered itself under the control of the Roman Pontiff in regard to acts of persecution; and that the government obligated itself to this course in 519, as appears from the Articles of the treaty of that year. That the principles of persecution were introduced during the pontificate of Hormisdas, who died in 523, is evident from the following remarks of Bower, "Hormisdas was a man of uncommon parts, of great policy and address, as appears from his whole conduct; but of a most haughty, vindictive, and imperious temper, and, to the eternal infamy of his name and memory, the first Christian bishop, who, in matters of conscience, dared openly to countenance, nay, and to sanctify, slaughter and bloodshed."

6. The abomination being set up, will change the law of God by which the Church is governed, Dan. 7: 25, "He shall think to change times and laws."—2 Thess. 2: 4, "Showing himself that he is God."

Says Bower, "He enacted several laws concerning the ordination of Bishops, their age, qualifications, residence, privileges, &c. He regulated the convocation of Councils, and prescribed their time; issued several orders concerning the manners and conduct of the clergy, of the monks, and the sacred virgins; enforced the observance of the canons; established the penalties, no less than deposition and degradation, to be inflicted on the metropolitans, Bishops, and other ecclesiastics, who should transgress them; and finally restrained the Bishops, no Bishop excepted, from excommunicating, without just cause, i. e. without a cause specified in the canons, and till the crime was fully proved. In short, he acted, in every respect, as the SUPREME HEAD AND GOVERNOR OF THE CHURCH; and the LAWS he enacted as such, were received both in the East and the West, by the Bishops of Constantinople as well as by those of Rome, without the least opposition or complaint."

From these facts it appears, that the Catholic Emperor, under the influence of the Catholic Church, took his position as supreme head of the Church, and assumed the prerogative of God to enact laws for the purpose of dictating the faith of the Church, and prescribing the forms of worship. As Christ is presented in scripture as the sovereign head and lawgiver of the Church, and has himself given laws for the government of his people, any ruler who enacts laws respecting the faith or worship of the Church, takes the place of God, and changes times and laws in the sense of the prophecy. This the Greek government did do under the influence of the Catholic Church, and therefore fulfilled the prophecy.

7. The principles which laid the foundation for a long, protracted persecution of the Church of Christ, such as never was from the beginning of the world, nor ever should be after it, i. e. a persecution the particular manner of which is described in prophecy, were to be adopted at the formation of this politico-ecclesiastical government, or union of the Catholic Church with the Greek kingdom.

Says Bower, "For that Prince" (Justin) "not satisfied with having put an end to the schism, undertook, in the next place, to clear his dominions from heretics, as he styled them, of all denominations." Says Gibbon, "The reign of Justinian was a uniform yet various scene of persecution; and he appears to have surpassed his indolent predecessors, both in the contrivance of his laws and the rigor of their execution. The insufficient term of three months was assigned for the conversion or EXILE of all heretics; and if he still connived at their precarious stay, they were deprived, under his iron yoke, not only of the benefits of society, but of the common birth-right of men and Christians."

* Says Bower, as quoted above, "These anti-Christian principles have EVER SINCE BEEN MAINTAINED, as is but too well known, by the Church of Rome; and, in compliance with them, the Popes have never failed, when it was in their power, to encourage persecution, and stir up the popish Princes to persecute, and pursue with FIRE AND SWORD their protestant subjects. To these principles are owing the racks, the dungeons, and the unrelenting torments of the inquisition."

This quotation from Bower shows that ever since those principles of persecution were established (which was done under the pontificate of Hormisdas as Bower informs us when he says, he was "the FIRST Christian Bishop, who, in matters of conscience, dared openly to countenance, nay, and to SANCTIFY SLAUGHTER AND BLOODSHED," they have been maintained, and war carried on, as described by Daniel, when he says, "they shall fall by sword and by flame, by captivity and by spoil."

But Jesus gives additional features of this persecution, showing that the elect would be compelled to escape with precipitous flight, so that they could remove none of their goods, nor return back to take their garments, referring particularly to the commencement of the persecution, as Daniel does to the commencement of the political history of the abomination. Daniel only shows us, that the Church would be connected with one kingdom, while John presents the fact that it would be connected with seven. Jesus presents the persecution at the point when, and at the locality where the war of persecution would commence. Says Gibbon, v. 4, p. 530, "The Samaritans of Palestine were a motley race, an ambiguous sect, rejected as Jews by the Pagans, by the Jews as schismatics, and by the Christians as idolaters. The abomination of the cross had already been planted on their holy mount of Garizim, but the persecution of Justinian offered only the alternative of baptism or rebellion. They chose the latter: under the standard of a desperate leader, they rose in arms, and retaliated their wrongs on the lives, the property, and the temples, of a defenceless people. The Samaritans were finally subdued by the regular forces of the East: twenty thousand were slain, twenty thousand were sold by the Arabs to the infidels of Persia and India, and the remains of that unhappy nation atoned for the crime of treason by the sin of hypocrisy. It has been computed that one hundred thousand Roman subjects were extirpated in the Samaritan war, which converted the once fruitful province into a desolate and smoking wilderness.—But in the creed of Justinian, the guilt of murder could not be applied to the slaughter of unbelievers; and he piously labored to estalish with fire and sword the unity of the Christian faith."

Bower, referring to the same events, gives more particulars in relation to the persecution and their flight. He says: "While the Arian king was striving, by the most just and equitable laws, to clear the Church from all simony in the west, the catholic emperor was employing the most unjust and unchristian means of clearing her from all heresies in the east, that of persecution, and the most cruel persecution any Christian emperor had yet set on foot, or countenanced. For by an edict which he issued to unite all men in one faith, whether Jews, Gentiles, or Christians, such as did not, in the term of three months, embrace and profess the catholic faith, were declared infamous, and, as such, excluded from all employments, both civil and military, rendered incapable of leaving any thing by will, and their estates confiscated, whether real or personal. These were convincing arguments of the truth of the catholic faith; but many, however, withstood them; and against such as did, the imperial edict was executed with the utmost vigor. GREAT NUMBERS WERE DRIVEN FROM THEIR HABITATIONS WITH THEIR WIVES AND CHILDREN, STRIPPED AND NAKED. Others betook themselves to flight, carrying with them what they could conceal, for their support and maintenance; but they were plundered of the little they had, and many of them inhumanly massacred, by the CATHOLIC peasants, or the soldiery, who guarded the passes."

From the above quotation we learn, that the Catholic Emperor of the East had sent an army into Asia for the purpose of persecuting the heretics; but the decree here referred to, under which he acted, was passed in 518, by Justin. As this is the first general persecution presented in history, in which an army of professed Christians was employed to make war on protestants; and we find it to be in the locality to which Jesus referred, we next inquire whether those, who were persecuted, fled agreeably to the instructions given by our Savior. The historian says, "they were driven from their habitations," Jesus says, "Let him that is on the housetop not come down;" the historian says "with their wives and children;" Jesus says, "wo unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days;" the historian testifies that they fled stripped and naked, Jesus told them "not to return back to take their clothes." We perceive, therefore, from these facts, that Christians in Judea fled from the persecutions of the papal army, which the historian denominates "the abominations of the cross," just as Jesus directed the disciples to flee from the armies of "the abomination of desolation."

But it may be objected that this direction given by our Savior in reference to fleeing from Judea, is identical with that presented in the 21st ch. of Luke, where Jesus directs His disciples to flee from the invading army of the Romans, when they encompass Jerusalem. We however do not conceive the two passages to be parallel, but to refer to different scenes, each of which was fulfilled in its appropriate season. Thus when the Roman armies invaded Jerusalem, we learn from Tacitus that the disciples in Jerusalem fled to Pella, a town located in the mountains, in fulfilment of the Savior's injunction in the 21st of Luke; and as we have already shown from history, when the armies of Rome under the papal form appeared in Judea to persecute the heretical sects, as they were termed, Christians again fled from Judea in compliance with the Savior's injunction to flee from "the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet."

"Have Faith in God."

Not to the Apostolic age alone, has the obedience of the above admonition of our Savior been of the utmost importance; but throughout all ages the "just have had to live by faith" in order to please God, and be accepted of him. Even from the time of Abel, down to the present, that same faith is required of the true Church of Christ; for "without it, it is impossible to please God." The sainted Apostle Paul defines faith as being "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence (or confidence) of things not seen." And for the Church's example, and instruction, he gives a catalogue of the divers manners in which many of the ancient worthies had trials of faith, became purified thereby, and "became heirs of that righteousness which is by faith." Now faith is simply a belief of God's word; a walking out on his promises; trusting the consequences with him. By so doing, the child of God need never fear any harm, however venturous the act required by faith may be to human appearance, for God has declared himself a "shield, and buckler, to all them that put their trust in him." Parent's love increases for their children while they witness their acts of confidence, and fearlessness under their protection, even while in danger.—Just so with God; He loves a confiding child that dare believe his word, and walk out on his promises fearless, thereby showing faith by works, "without which it is dead." Now in order to be fit subjects for the Kingdom we must possess the meekness, humility, love, and confidence in our Heavenly Parent, that a little child manifests toward an earthly parent. For, says Jesus, "whosoever shall not receive the Kingdom of God as a little child, shall in no wise enter therein." O, then let us "have faith in God," even that "perfect faith (or love) that casteth out all fear, for fear hath torment;" and when we pray just "believe that we receive the things we ask for, and we shall have them," so says Jesus, even the "Faithful and True." We are living in an age, which evidently surpasses all former ages, by its unbelief in God's revealed word; and for this reason, have the times become more perilous for the true Church of Christ. For not only do they have to suffer the scoffs and persecutions of a "whole world lying in wickedness," for showing their faith in God's immutable word, by their works, but what is still worse, they have to bear the same from their professed fellow laborers in the Vineyard of the Lord. Surely the Church has reached its Laodicean state, where it is neither cold nor hot, but because it is lukewarm, God will ere long spue her out of his mouth. Popularity, and love of the world, have destroyed her confidence and faith in God's word, and therefore she has become stupid and asleep to the present truth, which in all past ages have kept her in a living, active attitude. The Church is to be sanctified and made free through the truth. In all ages there has ever been a present truth adapted to each age, and a belief of the same has always been necessary for the Church in order to be accepted of God; and it is just as necessary now as formerly. The Church in these days have a present truth to test their faith, viz.: "the soon coming of Christ." But "because iniquity abounds the love of many is waxen cold;" and the people, together with Priests, are crying "Peace and safety," "there's a good time coming;" but lo! "while they cry, sudden destruction cometh upon them and they shall not escape." But we will not rest our faith on the teachings of Pastors, aside from the Bible, for therein do we have a "more sure word of prophecy, whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in your hearts." O, then let us that believe God's present truth show to the world our faith by our works, and sacrifice our earthly all for the cause of Christ; for, says Jesus, "whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple." O, then let us square our lives by the word of God; and not sacrifice our goods only, but offer up ourselves living sacrifices, holy and acceptable unto God, which is our reasonable service.

The Prophetic Periods of Daniel.

I find that some object to the argument in favor of the Lord's coming this year, from the fact that they believe, the 2300 days are past. Let me remark that the prophetic periods of Dan. 12, cover the time from a certain event to the resurrection. The last of the three numbers covers the whole of that time: the other two, a portion of it. Now, admitting the 2300 days and cleansing of the sanctuary to be in the past, it forms no objection to the time for the resurrection, unless that is also past. This I think will appear when I state the evidence which I understand to be deduced from this portion of prophecy.

In the 12th chapter of Daniel there are three numbers, the last of which, viz. the 1335, extends to the resurrection. The second, viz. 1290, has reference to the resurrection, as it is a portion of the 1335; and the first, viz. time, times and a half, has reference to the same, for it is in answer to the question respecting the wonders which include the resurrection. They are then, all of them, portions of time between some event and the resurrection. In connection with the 1290 we are told what that event is; viz. the taking away of the daily, and setting up the desolating abomination. Do they then all commence together at the setting up of the abomination of desolation, or do they all terminate together at the resurrection?—They do not terminate together, for after the 1290 there is a waiting and coming to the 1335; and after the time, times and a half, (or 1260,) there is a scattering of the power of the holy people. Do the 1260 occupy a position in the midst of the other periods? There is nothing to indicate such an indefiniteness that would ill accord with their importance, which appears from the solemn oath by which they were confirmed. Daniel was told that the words were closed up and sealed till the time of the end. What was to unseal them then? The darkening of the sun. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened." Immediately after what tribulation? That which should be endured under the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet, and which should be shortened for the sake of the elect. Matt. 24: 15, 22, 29. And we learn from Rev. 12: 6, 14, and 13: 5, that this tribulation was to continue 1260 days. Again, the 1260 and 1290 days having reference to the same abomination of desolation, they must either commence together, or terminate together. They could not terminate together, for had they done so, and that before the darkening of the sun in 1780, 45 [illegible] have terminated the 1335, and brought the resurrection in 1824–5.

If the 1260, 1290, and 1335 days commence together, and the sun was darkened immediately after the 1260 days of tribulation, then the 1335 days extend 75 years from 1780 or some point immediately before it. And the darkening of the sun as a sign of the coming of the Lord, has additional significance as a sign also of the ending of the 1260 days of tribulation.

The World's Crisis.

LOWELL, JUNE 14, 1854.

To our Readers.

We published in our last some account of the financial affairs of the Office, and it may not be improper to make some further statements in connection with that subject, although we do not intend to trouble our readers with repeated solicitations for pecuniary aid.

We have reached the 21st No. of our paper. Since the commencement of the enterprise we have circulated more than one hundred and fifty thousand sheets freighted with such light as we, through the grace of God, have been enabled to furnish. Whether the enterprise has contributed to the advancement of the cause of truth and to the glory of God, the Judgment will reveal; but we are confident from the numerous testimonials which come up from almost every direction, that it has been the means of making glad the hearts of thousands, and encouraging many a pilgrim on his way to the kingdom of God. Whether we have avoided all party spirit, all unnecessary controversy—all acerbitude and uncharitable denunciations towards our opponents, we leave with the readers to decide.

But we have reached a critical point in the history of our paper. Our resources are failing, and it remains entirely for the readers to decide what shall be done.—Dear Brethren, we now simply ask the question, Shall we discontinue, or not?

As yet we have sent the paper indiscriminately to all who have desired it, whether friends or foes, and we would be glad to continue this practice until the Lord comes, payment or no payment.—But we regret to say, duty to our paying subscribers forbids it. There are, however, three classes to whom we wish to send the paper, and to whom we shall send it while there is a dollar in our possession for its support. These are

1st. Those who have paid money for its support.

2d. Those who intend hereafter to pay.

3d. Those who are benefited by the paper and are not able to pay.

We find it necessary to reduce our list; but if we have, through mistake, cut off any names that come under the above heads, (viz., those who have paid, or will pay, or those who are benefited by the paper and have not the means to pay,) will some Brother inform us immediately.

We would also say, that if we send the paper to any who are not particularly interested in it, they will oblige us by returning a copy, that we may discontinue it. In such cases be particular to give the town and State to which it was sent.

Dear Brethren, we believe with all our hearts the Lord is coming. A few more days and the glorious victory is won, or all is lost. If we have any duties to do in giving the light to those who sit in darkness, or in cheering the pathway of the lonely poor who are rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom, let us do it with an eye single to the glory of God, and our whole bodies will be full of light.

CARLISLE. A good degree of interest existed in this place some 10 years ago in relation to the Advent doctrine; but for a number of years meetings there have been neglected, and the excitement died away. I have occasionally held meetings in that place within a few months past, and the Brethren appear to be revived and quickened in the divine life; so that a considerable interest has been manifested in the place to hear on the subject of the coming of the Lord. On my last visit, Sunday 21st ult., five were baptized, and a sweet refreshing season was enjoyed. God's presence and power were felt, and His children comforted by those consolations which are neither few nor small. May the Lord help them to prove faithful to the end, that with all the saints they may receive the crown from the coming king.

There seems to be a sort of epidemic rascality prevailing just now. We scarcely take up a paper which does not record riot, murder, or some other horrid crime. Satan seems to be let loose for a season. There is also more than a usual number of terrible casualties.

Chronology of the Types.

We find in the Old Testament a great multitude of figures, or "shadows of good things to come," presented in a variety of forms; some of which were to be daily observed, some weekly, some monthly, and some annually. The object of the often celebration of those offerings, rites, ceremonies and feasts, seems to be, to shew the comers thereunto, that the sole object of their faith and hopes, was constantly before them; and that it must center in the Son of God, the Lord Jesus Christ; the Prophet, Priest and King; (which was afterwards more clearly revealed to the prophets, by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit;) of which Moses their lawgiver, and leader, was a most eminent type; and it seemed to be the design of God to keep them humble, to make them remember that they were bondmen in Egypt, and that every ordinance which he enjoined on them, alluded in some way or other, to the Messiah, who had first been revealed to Adam and Eve, as "the Seed of the Woman who should bruise the Serpent's head." Some of those emblems were to be standing memorials, constantly before them; such was the shew-bread, and the lamps, that were to be kept constantly burning. The bread called the "bread of God," Lev. 21: 6, is explained in unmistakable terms, in John 6: 33, to be the Savior. The brazen serpent on a pole, in the form of a venemous reptile, represented the Son of God in the form of sinners, but without the poison of sin, "lifted up" upon the cross. The lamps, kept constantly burning, represented the light shed on every humble, faithful child of God, by reading and hearing his holy Word; Psalm 119: 105, and all the consecrated priests and vessels, sprinkled with the blood of the sacrifices, tell us that the heavenly things must be purified with the blood of a better sacifice than those, Heb. 9: 23. And although these and many other figures, pointed to the Messiah, they were not chronological; they pointed to no time when they would be fulfilled; neither were they to be observed on any given day of any month, but were to be observed, most of them, continually.

But there is a class of types that are chronological. They were to be strictly kept on certain days, of certain particular months, on pain of death; some of which were the following:

"And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying: concerning the feasts of the Lord, which ye shall proclaim to be holy convocations, even these are my feasts."

"Six days shall work be done, but the seventh day is the Sabbath of rest, an holy convocation; ye shall do no work therein: it is the Sabbath of the Lord, in all your dwellings." "These are the feasts of the Lord, even holy convocations, which ye shall proclaim in their seasons."

"In the 14th day of the first month, at even, is the Lord's Passover."

"And on the 15th day of the same month, is the feast of unleavened bread, seven days. "And when ye be come into the land which I give unto you, and shall reap the harvest thereof, ye shall bring a sheaf before the Lord, to be accepted for you: on the morrow after the Sabbath, the Priest shall wave it." "And ye shall count unto you from the morrow after the Sabbath, from the day that ye brought the sheaf of the wave offering, seven Sabbaths shall be complete; even on the morrow after the seventh Sabbath, shall ye number fifty days; and ye shall bring out of your habitations two wave loaves; they shall be of fine flour; they shall be baken with leaven; they are the first fruits unto the Lord." This feast was to be kept on the 6th of the third month. "In the seventh month, on the first day of the month, shall be a Sabbath, a memorial of blowing of trumpets." "Also on the 10th day of this (seventh) month, there shall be a day of atonement; to make an atonement for you before the Lord your God." It shall be unto you a Sabbath of rest, and ye shall do no work in that same day." "For it is a day of atonement; it shall be unto you a Sabbath of rest, and ye shall afflict your souls in the ninth day of the month, at even; from even unto even, ye shall celebrate your Sabbath."—"And the fifteenth day of this seventh month, shall be the feast of tabernacles, for seven days unto the Lord; it is a solemn assembly; ye shall do no servile work therein." "Also on the 15th day of this seventh month, when ye have gathered in the fruit of the land, ye shall keep a feast unto the Lord, seven days." "On the first day shall be a Sabbath; and on the eighth day shall be a Sabbath." "And ye shall take you on the first day the boughs of goodly trees, branches of palm trees, and the boughs of thick trees, and willows of the brook; and ye shall rejoice before the Lord your God seven days." "And ye shall keep it a feast unto the Lord seven days in the year; it shall be a statute forever, in your generations; and ye shall dwell in booths seven days, that your generations may know that I made the children of Israel to dwell in booths, when I brought them out of the land of Egypt." "I am the Lord your God." Lev. 23d chap.

Of the observance of the above appointed days, the Sabbath is mentioned first; and therefore we may suppose it was designed to take the precedence; and not only for its being first mentioned, but the oft repeated celebration of it every seventh day. This day was to commemorate the seventh day of the creation; when "God rested from all his work which he had created and made." "And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it." Gen. 2: 2, 3.—"And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, * * Verily my Sabbath ye shall keep, for it is a sign between me and you, * * it is holy unto you: * * six days may work be done, but in the seventh is the Sabbath of rest, holy * * to the Lord."

"Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the Sabbath throughout their generations, for a perpetual covenant." "It is a sign between me and the children of Israel forever; for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day he rested, and was refreshed." Exod. 31: 13–17. "Moreover also I gave them my Sabbaths to be a sign between me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them." Ezek. 20: 12. The prophet here tell us that the sign was given that we might know the Lord; which of course was the primary design of the Sabbath; but from the 4th chap. of Hebrews we learn that it will be ultimately, anti-typically, and chronologically fulfilled, by ushering all his chosen ones into that "rest which remaineth to the people of God." And after six typical days, of one thousand years each, we may expect that "Salem's golden spires will burst upon our vision, and we shall enter upon eternal realities."

Scholars tell us that the Hebrew letter Aleph, which like our letter M, stands for a 1000, occurs six times in the first verse of Genesis, chap. 1st.

The seventh year was a Sabbath to the Hebrews, in which they were not allowed to sow, nor reap; and they were to count seven times seven years, and the fiftieth, or Jubilee, was a threefold Sabbath of rest, being, as it were, composed of weekly Sabbaths, seven year Sabbaths, and seven times seven year Sabbaths, and a Sabbath itself, at the end of all these; and if such was their Sabbath, every fiftieth year, what will ours be after forty-nine such seven-fold Sabbaths have passed away? Truly it must be an eternal jubilee, in which all the redeemed will enjoy "everlasting rest."

There were certain feasts under the law that were called "solemn feasts," which pointed directly to the first Advent, and were chronologically fulfilled at that time; some of which are the following: "Three times thou shalt keep a feast unto me, in the year: thou shalt keep the feast of unleavened bread, in the time appointed, in the month Abib; for in it thou camest out of Egypt; and none shall appear before me empty." "And the feast of harvest, the first fruits of thy labors, which thou hast sown in the field; and the feast of ingathering, when thou hast gathered in thy labors out of the field." Exod. 23: 14, 15, 16. "Three times in the year shall all thy males appear before the Lord thy God, in the place which he shall choose; in the feast of unleavened bread, and in the feast of weeks, and in the feast of Tabernacles; and they shall not appear before the Lord empty." "Thou shalt sacrifice the Passover unto the Lord thy God; and thou shalt keep the feast of Weeks and the feast of Tabernacles, after thou hast gathered in thy corn, and thy wine." Deut. 16: 2, 10, 13, 16. "And Solomon offered burnt-offerings every day, according to the commandment of Moses; on the Sabbath, and on the New Moons, and on the solemn feasts; three times in the year; even in the feast of Unleavened Bread, and in the feast of Weeks, and in the feast of Tabernacles. 2 Chron. 3; 12, 13.

We see by the above, that the principal feasts enjoined on the children of Israel to observe, were the Passover, (which commemorates the passing over the Hebrews, while the first-born of the Egyptians were slain;) the feast of Weeks; (which was to be a memorial of giving of the Law, on Mount Sinai,) and the feast of Tabernacles, (which was to remind them of their dwelling in booths when they came out of Egypt.)

The Passover was to be kept on the 14th day of the first month Abib; the feast of Weeks or Pentecost, on the 50th day after the 16th of Abib, (when the wave sheaf was offered) because the law was given on the fiftieth day after they left Egypt, (which was the sixth day of the third month;) and the feast of Tabernacles was to be kept on the 15th day of the seventh month. The primary object of these feasts seems to be, to perpetuate the remembrance of their bondage in Egypt, and the distinguishing mercy of God in delivering them out of it; his giving them His law, and His "bearing them as on eagles' wings" to their promised inheritance. But was this the ultimate, and final object of God in these ordinances? I think not. Because God distinguished some of those very days, by the anti-typical fulfilment of some of those shadows on the same day. The paschal lamb which prefigured the crucifixion of Christ, was slain on the 14th day of the first month; and was chronologically fulfilled the same day by his death. The sheaf of first fruits which was offered on the morrow after the Sabbath, was fulfilled chronologically the 16th day of Abib, by his resurrection on the third day; "the first fruits of them that slept." 1 Cor. 14: 20. The first fruits of wheat harvest, on the sixth day of the third month, or the fiftieth after the resurrection, was chronologically fulfilled the same day, by the miraculous descent of the Holy Spirit, on the day of Pentecost; in the conversion of three thousand souls in one day, the first fruits of the Spirit. Rom. 16: 5., James 1: 15. So that that which commemorated the giving of the law, was anti-typically fulfilled by the powerful effacacy of the gospel.

Now as those types which related to the first advent, and descent of the Holy Spirit, were chronologically fulfilled, in the first, and third months, we may reasonably expect that all of this class, which had their observances in the seventh month, will be chronologically fulfilled also, in the seventh month. As no one that was ordained to be kept in the seventh month, has been anti-typically fulfilled in the seventh month; may we not look for all that remains behind, to be fulfilled in the seventh month? The greatest number of feasts and solemn days were appointed to be kept in the seventh month; and as God has distinguished those of the first and third months, by their chronological fulfilment the same days, it analogically follows that He will likewise honor those of the seventh month by a chronological fulfilment of all that remains to be fulfilled. The ark rested on Mount Ararat, on the 14th day of the seventh month. We have shown that two of the types have been chronologically fulfilled by the death and resurrection of Christ, in the first month; and that one has been thus fulfilled in the third month, on the day of Pentecost; and although it was a memorial of the thunders and terrors of Sinai, it was fulfilled in the voice of the gospel, sweetly whispering peace from Mount Zion, when thousands were converted to God; to whom "God sent forth the Spirit of His Son, crying, Abba Father."—There was another class of types that were ordained to be celebrated on the tenth day of the seventh month, which had their fulfilment on the fourteenth day of the first month. Such were the two goats, on whose heads the lots were cast, when the one on whom the Lord's lot fell, was to be slain, as a Sin-offering of expiation, on the tenth day of the seventh month, which was anti-typically fulfilled in the death of Christ on the 14th day of the first month. Lev. 16: 7–29. O, how truly indeed did God send forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law; to redeem a depraved, and perishing world from the terrible curses which this law denounced on all mankind! O, who will not lay hold by faith, on this last and only hope, even in these last flying moments? Who will not secure a refuge in this Lamb of God, who has created an Ark to the saving of his house," which will bear them above that fiery flood which in a very few months will be poured on a wicked world? All who have not secured a passage in this Ark, will be swallowed up in the pit of destruction. Of the Scape-goat, and the time he was led away, I shall speak presently. There was another class of types which did not consist in anniversary ceremonies, but in examples, which though they were first performed in the first month, can only be anti-typically fulfilled in the seventh month, or the Second Advent of Christ. Such were the coming of the children of Israel out of Egypt; the passing over those whose doors were marked with the blood of the Passover; and the destruction of all the first-born of Egypt, on the fourteenth day of the first month, these will, beyond all doubt be fulfilled on the tenth day of the seventh month, or when the Lord will appear in glory; and the destroying angel will pass over all whose hearts are washed in the blood of Christ, when he will deliver his people from the bondage of this world, and bring the deserved destruction on all his enemies.

Says Paul to the Corinthians, "Moreover, Brethren, I would not that you should be ignorant, how that all our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the (red) Sea." "And were all baptized unto Moses, in the cloud, and in the Sea." And did all eat of the same Spiritual meat; and did all drink of the same spiritual drink; for they drank of that Spiritual Rock that followed them, and that Rock was Christ. But as God was not pleased with many of them, he says they were our examples; not that we should follow in their steps, but shun their sin; "upon whom the ends of the world are come." 1 Cor. 10: 1–11. So we have examples to show us what we must do, and likewise what we must not do.

"And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying; On the first day of the first month, thou shalt set up the Tabernacle of the tent of the congregation: and thou shalt put therein the ark of the testimony; and bring the table, and set the things in order upon it; and the candlestick, and light the lamps thereof; and set the altar of gold, for incense, before the ark of the testimony; and put the hanging of the door to the tabernacle; and set the altar for burnt-offering before the door of the tabernacle; and the laver between the tent of the tabernacle, and the altar, and put water therein. And thou shalt set up the court, and hang up the hanging at the court gate; and take the anointing oil, and anoint the tabernacle, and all that is therein, and hallow it, and all the vessels thereof; and it shall be most holy." "And thou shalt anoint the altar of the burnt offering, and all his vessels, and sanctify the altar, and it shall be an altar most holy; and thou shalt anoint the laver, and his foot, and sanctify it." "And thou shalt bring Aaron, and his sons unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and wash them with water. And thou shalt put upon Aaron' the holy garments, and anoint him, and sanctify him, that he may minister unto me, in the (High) Priest's office." "Thus did Moses," (the ceremonies of which are recorded in Lev. 8th chap.,) "according to all that the Lord commanded him, so did he" Exod. 40: 1–16.

Here is a special command that Aaron the first High Priest, should be washed with water, anointed, and sanctified to minister unto God, on the first day of the first month; and, it was by Moses fully obeyed. Can any one doubt, that Jesus, our great High Priest, was likewise baptized, and anointed on the first day of the first month? To me it is beyond all doubt, that the washing of Aaron was a remarkable type of the baptism of Christ; and as the holy ointment was poured on the head of Aaron, so was the Holy Spirit without measure, poured upon him; and that both were anti-typically, and chronologically fulfilled, on the first day of the first month, of A. D. 38, when he was just 37 years old.

The place in Jordan where he was baptized, was Bethabara, which signifies "the house of the passage," (Doddridge,) and was the place where the children of Israel went over the river on dry ground, and where the feet of the Priests, bearing "the Ark of the Covenant," stood firm in in the midst of Jordan, "till all the people had passed clean over Jordan," Josh. 3: 2–17, John 1: 29–37. Here it seems John was baptizing, when "the Jews sent Priests and Levites from Jerusalem to ask him, who art thou?" and "he bare witness to the truth," saying "I am not the Christ, but am sent before him." "I baptize with water: but there standeth one among you, whom ye know not," "he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost." "He it is that is preferred, before me, for he was before me." "The next day," (after this conference with the Priests and Levites,) "John seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith, Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world!" "This is he of whom I said, after me cometh a man which is preferred before me;" John received the evidence of his Messiahship by the visible descent of the Holy Spirit upon him. Can any man doubt that he came then to be baptized, or that he was baptized at that time? I think not.—"Again the next day," (after he was baptized,) "John stood and two of his disciples, and looking on Jesus as he walked, he saith, Behold the Lamb of God!"—"And the two disciples heard him speak and they followed Jesus." "One of the two which heard John speak and followed him was Andrew, Simon Peter's Brother. He first findeth his own brother Simon, and saith unto him, we have found the Messiah, and he brought him to Jesus."—"The day following," (that is the third day after his Baptism,) "Jesus would go forth into Galilee, and findeth Philip, and saith unto him follow me." "Philip findeth Nathaniel," and it seems they all went forth into Galilee; attended the marriage at Cana, where he wrought his first miracle, by turning water into wine, and from thence to Capernaum; but "continued there not many days." "And the Jews' Passover was at hand, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem;" "and found in the temple those that sold oxen, sheep, and doves, and the changers of money sitting." "And when he had made a scourge of small cords, he drove them all out of the temple, and poured out the changers' money, and overthrew the tables, and said unto them that sold doves, take these things hence; make not my Father's house an house of merchandise." Does not this look like sanctifying the house of God before the Passover, as Moses, his type, sanctified the tabernacle just before the same feast? Exod. 40th chap. and Num. 9: 1. "Now when he was in Jerusalem, at the Passover, in the feast-day, many believed in him, when they saw the miracles which he did. But Jesus did not commit himself unto them, because he knew all men, and needed not that any should testify of man: for he knew what was in man." John 2d ch. From here I think he was led up into the wilderness on the feast day, (as the scape-goat was to a land not inhabited,) "to bear" away "the sins of the world." Heb 9: 28th. And if this is the right arrangement of those events, (which I fully believe,) then both the scape-goat and the goat for the sin-offering of expiation, which had typically been sacrificed on the tenth day of the seventh month, were both antitypically fulfilled in the suffering, temptation, and death of Christ on the fourteenth day of the first month.

But I am aware of objections to this view. It may be asked, does not Matthew say when Jesus was baptized, "then was Jesus led up, of the Spirit, into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil?"

True, but Luke says he returned from Jordan first; and Matthew says he "came from Galilee;" and if he returned he must have returned to Galilee, which I doubt not he did, and from thence to Jerusalem at the passover; and the place of his temptation is supposed to have been between Jerusalem and Jericho. But, says another, does not Mark say, "and immediately the Spirit driveth him into the wilderness?"

True, and how much more than immediately is thirteen days? If, as I think I have shown, he was baptized on the first day of the first month, John saw him the second, and bore a truthful testimony to his being "The Lamb of God," and the marriage in Cana was performed the third, and 'not many days' spent at Capernaum, would give him just time enough to purge the temple and eat the passover; and then on the same day he was led into the wilderness to fast and suffer forty days. I see no other view that looks probable; and though John gives us no account of his temptation, it is certain that he left Jerusalem; and the next account we have of his being in Jerusalem is in John 3: 22; and this must be soon after the forty days of temptation; "for John was not yet cast into prison." John 3: 24. Matthew speaks as though the Savior did not begin to preach till he heard that John was cast into prison. Matt. 4: 12. But John says he tarried in Judea and baptized, while at the same time John was baptizing in Ænon, near Salim. To harmonize these passages, it appears that after the temptation, Jesus came into Judea and tarried a while, and his disciples baptized; that he at this time held the conference with Nocodemus (if it was held in Judea,) and when he knew that the Pharisees had heard that he and his followers "made and baptized more disciples than John;" that "he left Judea and departed again into Galilee." And going through Samaria he stopped with the Samaritans two days. John 4th ch., and that while he was in Samaria John was seized and cast into prison; which, when he heard, "he departed into Galilee." Matt. 4: 12. There may still be objections to this view, that are unanswered; but every one must think for himself; I hold no one responsible for any thing that I advance; but if it is supported by inspiration, which I feel assured of, I hope others will see, and enjoy, it, in the same light that I do; and I must say that I look to the next seventh month with the most intense interest, believing that on the first day of that month the trumpets will be blown, to gather the congregation of the redeemed to go forth "and meet the Bridegroom;" that the seventh angel will then begin to sound the trump of God; that the last trump will soon after break the slumbers of the grave; and that thus this feast of trumpets, which was called "a memorial of blowing of trumpets," will be fulfilled by ushering in the great day of God Almighty." The tenth day of the seventh month was to be observed as a most solemn day; the great day of Atonement; when the High Priest was required to go into the "Holy of Holies with the blood of the sin-offering of expiation to make atonement for the sins of the children of Israel; and although our great High Priest entered Heaven itself in the second month to appear in the presence of God for us; it does not follow that he will not come out on the tenth day of the seventh month. The unmistakable symbol of his presence, (viz.) "the Ark of the Covenant" entered the most holy place in the temple of Solomon on that day; and may we not look for his return with the trumpet of the Jubilee, to bless his waiting people, on the tenth day of the seventh month? In the bringing of all things to a crisis, I think we may, (without incurring the charge of dogmatizing,) look for all those great feasts to be finally fulfilled in the seventh month; for even the passover, of which the Savior said, "I will no more henceforth eat of it, till it be fulfilled in the Kingdom of God,"—has yet a final fulfilment in the future: though it has had one astonishing performance in the death of Christ, on the 14th day of the first month; but the final atonement of the elect will not be completed till the great High Priest leaves "the Holy of Holies;" then untold glories will crown the heads of all his chosen ones, and the last fatal tragedy of earth will wind up in "the destruction of the wicked;" which, I doubt not, will be chronologically, antitypically, and finally fulfilled in the seventh month. The feast of tabernacles and the feast of ingathering the harvest, were both ordained to be celebrated on the fifteenth day of the seventh month; and as the present state of the world is ominous of the greatest event that ever transpired since it was created, the signs of the times are unmistakable; and as there were seven feast-days appointed under the law, (viz.) the Sabbath, the Passover, the Sheaf of first fruits, the Pentecost, the feast of Trumpets, or Jubilee, the feast of Tabernacles, and Harvest; and some of them have been in the past chronologically fulfilled, may we not, (as we approximate the end,) look intensely with a thrill of joy for them all to be consummated in the seventh month seven times seven-fold in the final harvest of the world which is now nearly ripe? God grant the writer, and every reader a seat among the blessed at "the Marriage Supper of the Lamb!"

CONCORD, May 6th, 1854.

BRO. MERRIAM. I have been thinking to-day that perhaps I ought to write a word of explanation to the Crisis. It is well known to some of the readers of the Crisis, and perhaps to its conductors, that when the paper was started, I had a great many fears as to the result of the undertaking, and being very much opposed to the starting of a new paper, I have sometimes spoken very decidedly against the entire arrangement. My reasons were these:

1st. I had before me the history of three advent papers. And 2d, having some knowledge of human nature, knowing that it is the same at all times and in all circumstances, and judging the future by the past, I did actually dread the idea of another paper contsoversy, which I thought might be the result of the present undertaking. These and some other reasons which it may not be important now to mention, led me to be very decided in opposing the idea of the new paper. As my appointments are sometimes seen in the paper, although not put there by my request, still the question will arise in some minds, why are they published there if I have no confidence in the paper? I wish to say, in answer to this question, that so far as the paper is concerned, whatever its future course may be, I fell well satisfied with its contents at present, and have been thus far happily disappointed, both in its course and management, as also in the effect it has had on the children and community at large. It is to me a welcome visitor. I love to read the warm epistles that are found in its columns from week to week, freighted as they are with love unfeigned to God, his children, and the truth, they are to me like oases in the barren desert, to cheer my fainting heart, while onward still I journey towards Beulah's peaceful land. I am satisfied from personal observation, that the Crisis has done much good; and I hope that during the few remaing hours of time, it may still bear to the little flock the welcome news of a coming salvation; and keep a straight onward course in telling the unvarnished truth of God, and warning a fire-doomed world to flee to the only refuge, the only safe hiding place from the dreadful storm that is fast gathering.—While thus engaged in the cause of God and truth, the God of truth will make it a blessing indeed to the pilgrim band.

Go, then, thou swift winged messenger of comfort; go, cheer the heart of the lone pilgrim o'er life's uneven way, whose heart perhaps is never cheered by the sweet notes of gospel truth as they fall from the lips of him whom God hath called to publish glad tidings to the meek;—go, tell him that trials are almost over;—bid his lone heart rejoice, for, lo, he who wipeth Israel's tears away is shortly to appear. Tell him that the morn of triumph is coming, the shades of night are swiftly passing away; and already we can descry through the prophetic glass, the rising beams of that glorious morn, whose rays of heavenly light divine will enshroud creation, and make God's people joyous forever, when paradise shall bloom once more in everlasting beauty. Go tell him, yea, speak it to his heart with confidence that the LAST YEAR of his toils has come, tell him it is swiftly passing, but ere its last sands shall drop, redemption's morn shall dawn to stop its crazy course, and bid him rejoice in light forever. Tell him that 1854 will bring our long expected King; and tell him, oh, tell him TO BE READY, for they that are ready will go in. For such the feast is all prepared.

Your brother still hoping,

S. W. BISHOP.

Later from Europe.

Important Declaration of the German Powers—the Black Warrior Matter Unsettled—Expedition against Greece.

By the Arctic at New York yesterday, we have one day's later advices from Europe.

It is confirmed that a protocol has been signed by the four powers to maintain the integrity of Turkey. Austria and Prussia will now demand that Russia evacuate the Turkish territory, and accordingly a draft of a note to Russia has been sent by the Vienna Conference to Berlin for approval of the Prussian Government.

According to advices from Frankfort, the ministers of Austria and Prussia have presented to the Diet the joint declaration of Austria and Prussia, announcing the continued cordiality of the Four Powers, and declaring that the prolongation of the struggle between Russia and Turkey constitutes a danger to Germany. After submitting the declaaation, the five protocols of the Vienna Conference were laid before the Diet, and the Austro-Prussian treaty made known to them. Other German States have been invited to adhere to it.

The Russians were manœuvering to cut off communication between Varna and Silistria.—On the 9th the combined fleets were still before Sebastopol. Very little further is known of the war. Gen. Forey's division of the French army left Malta on the 22d, in fourteen steamers, to take possession of Athens

Lord Clarendon stated that a treaty between Austria and Prussia would be laid before Parliament when the protocol containing it should be received; also, that papers would be laid before the House to show that coercive measures were necessary against Greece; finally, that the latest intelligence received by the British government was that Persia will remain neutral in the Turkish war. Sir James Graham admitted that the Tiger, steam frigate, had gone ashore and been captured by the Russians;—that ports in the Baltic and Black Sea were blockaded, but at present there was no intention on the part of the Allies to blockade Archangel, on the White Sea.

Spanish advices say that the Black Warrior affair is still unsettled, and that the object of M. Gallano, the special messenger to Washington, is to settle the matter without Mr Soule's intervention.

It is now reported that the Russians are unable, on account of the blockade, to defend the seaboard of Circassia, and had evacuated all their positions from Bantoum to Anapa, a distance of 200 leagues. They burned all their own forts, and retired to Kutais, in the interior. The Circassians came down from the mountains, and took possession of all the posts which the Russians had occupied, making prisoners of 1500 men whom they surprised at Sukhum Kaleh. The Circassians had proclaimed a provisional government under the Presidency of a brother-in-law of Schamyl.

The rebellion in Thessaly is said to be gaining ground again. The French steamer Gomer had brought four piratical vessels into Rhodes.

The ultimatum to Greece demands the observance of a strict neutrality, and the punishment of all those who have joined the rebellion, the immediate recall of all civil and military officers who have joined it, and the refusal to re-admit into the public service those who had resigned office, or left to join the insurrection. If these categorical demands are not granted by the 22d, the throne to be declared vacant, and a new government established. A Greek bishop was arrested at Pesth on the evening of the 28th of May, as an emissary of Russia. Six more Russian vessels had been taken as prizes.

From Copenhagen and Stockholm we are informed that vast numbers of the Fins are quitting Finland, and seeking refuge in Sweden, in consequence of the reign of terror established in their own country.

A case which has just transpired, seems to indicate that specie payment in Russia was wholly suspended.

France. A report was current in well informed circles at Paris that France will augment the army in Turkey to 170,000 men, in order to carry on the war with vigor. The army of St. Omers will be divided into three divisions, and will be extended towards the East. One division, as already stated, will be commanded by Gen. Baraguay d'Hilliers, another by Gen. Pellissier, and the third by Gen. de Abbouville.

LATER FROM EUROPE.

Progress of the War on the Danube, &c.

By the Pacific at New York last evening, we have four days later news. King Otho had accepted the Anglo-French ultimatum, and the smaller German states had generally adopted Austria and Prussia in relation to the views of the war. Three frigates of Sir Charles Napier's fleet had destroyed the outworks of Hango, in the Gulf of Finland.

In the Black Sea the allied fleets were blockading Sebastopol. The Turkish fleet was off Varna on the 11th, on the way to the Circassian coast. It is confirmed that the Russians have abandoned their Circassian forts. On the 13th of May the Russians lost 1500 men by an attack on the new fort of Abdel Medjid.—Marshal St. Arnand is appointed Generalissimo of the combined forces. He and Lord Raglan were to meet Omar Pacha at Varna, to conclude a plan of campaign.

The Greek insurrection had assumed a less formidable appearance.

Naples had declared in favor of neutrality.—Gen. Garaballi was at Nice.

Four Russian war vessels had been presented to the Greek government by Russia. A Russian steamer had sailed out of Sebastopol, notwithstanding the blockade, and captured an English merchantman in the Black Sea; but being discovered, she cut the prize adrift and got back safe to Sebastopol.

Military preparations were making on the Neva.

The Czar had been quite sick.

It is reported that the vast merchant quarter of the city of Riga had been demolished by the military authorities in preparing for defence.

It is also reported that an allied force of 17,000 strong was to be landed in Sweden preparatory to that power declaring war on Russia.

Advices from Constantinople say that the Turkish corps at Kar almost entirely dispered on the approach of the Russians, May 5th.

Letters from Turin state that a contingent force of 25,000 men had been demanded from Sardinia by France for the purposes of the Eastern war.

From Athens it is stated that King Otho has has accepted the Anglo French ultimatum, and has promised to recall the Macorcodante on condition that the allies do not occupy his country. If they persist in their intention to send troops to Athens, he will withdraw the seat of his government into the interior, and will collect his army there.

It is reported from Cronstadt that prayers were read in all the churches of Warsaw for the success of the Greek insurrection.

The adhesion of the Germanic confederation to the Austro-Prussian treaty is secured. A committee has been appointed by the Frankfort Diet to prepare the document of adhesion.

From private telegraphic accounts it is reported that the Russians are menacing Erezeroum. They have recently made a compulsory enrolment of 30,000 Armenians.

From Malta we have a report that the allied fleet had bombarded Kaffa or Theodosia, a Russian port on the Eastern coast of the Crimea.

The English mail at Marseilles brings the Russian treaty with the Affghans. Russia promises "never, till the end of the world, to interfere in the interior concerns of the country;" in return for which promise the Khan of Khiva accords to Russia the right to build fortified barracks in the districts of Hourgani.

A steamer from the fleet brings news that Gustas Varna was bombarded, without effect, on the 22d. Another attack was intended on the 24th.

A telegraphic despatch from Belgrade announces that Silistria held out on the 26th, the Russians having been driven back four times with loss. Tunis furnishes 10,000 to the service of the Porte. The Journal de St. Petersburgh says that two frigates cannonaded Witisland on the 19th, and next day approached Ekenas, but were repulsed. Two thousand are posted near Denwarko, in Epirus.

The Progress of the War.

Extracts from papers received by the Niagara.

Paris, May 22.—I am assured that 86 pieces of artillery, of large calibre and of tremendous power, were to be embarked yesterday and the day before at Toulon and Marseilles. They are said to be intended for Sebastopol. It now seems certain that the plan of a combined attack by sea and land on that celebrated fortress and the Crimea has been decided upon, and that, in fact, we may expect to hear, at a short interval from each other, news of something very important taking place in the Baltic and the Black Sea.

The plan of the campaign, as drawn up by Marshal St. Arnaud at Constantinople, has been received this day by the Minister at War.—Cor. London Times

The following private telegraphic despatch has been received at Paris:

"Stockholm, 20th—The English fleet has destroyed the Fort of Gustafsvern, in the Gulf of Finland. 1,500 Russians have been made prisoners."

The object of Sir Charles Napier and his coadjutor is plain. They intend to destroy the fortresses right and left as they sail up the gulf, to demolish the Russian gun-boats which have been crammed in the inner channel, on the Sweaborg side, and thus step by step concentrate the force of the combined fleets on the destruction of the fortifications of Cronstadt. The Daily News remarking upon this, and upon the formidable and destructive power of a steam fleet when opposed to stone batteries, says:

"The assailing ships when moved by steam (as most of ours are), or assisted by steamers which act as tugs, can at their will take up the positions where the fixed land batteries of the enemy can bring the fewest guns to bear upon them; and when armed, as is also our case, with cannon of a longer range than those mounted on the fortresses they go to act against, can take up places beyond the reach of the enemy's guns. More than this, recent improvements in the construction and arming of our men-of-war enable them to concentrate the whole enormous broadside of a ship like the Duke of Wellington upon an almost incredibly narrow space.

Our ships are thus enabled to crumble the walls and silence the batteries of their antagonists almost without exposing themselves The imperial port of Odessa, with all its stores and shipping, was ruined and destroyed, and many of the defenders slain, while only one life was lost by the English, and only two by the French assailants. Availing themselves of this advantage, the admirals of the allied fleets in the Black Sea, it appears from the most recent trustworthy accounts, are following up the blow at Odessa by relieving the Circassians from the last remains of Russian garrisons on their coast; and in the same way Sir C. Napier appears to have made up his mind, without exposing his crews to unnecessary danger, to take and destroy the seaward forts of Northern Russia one after another. When he has made all sure in the rear, the turn of Cronstadt will come. The number of forts, with numerous guns, which command the channel leading into Cronstadt, are boastfully enumerated whenever an attack upon that citadel is spoken of; but by the tactics upon which the allied admirals are acting, the whole weight of the ships' batteries of the allies can be made to play upon each fort in succession, and from a distance at which its guns cannot injure them. Fort after fort will thus be made to fall in succession, until the way to Cronstadt is cleared; and then its man-of-war harbor, with all the ships therein assembled, will be subjected to the fate of the imperial port of Odessa, its stores and ships." —

A private letter from Stockholm, of the 16th of May, says the Patrie—

"Informs us that on that day a strong cannonade was heard during six hours, which the capture of the fort of Gustafsvern may account for. The same letter announces that much agitation prevailed throughout Finland. The military authorities treat the inhabitants with the greatest brutality, and commit all sorts of exactions."

The Moniteur de la Flotte quotes a letter from an officer on board the French fleet in the Black Sea, giving some account of Nicolaiev, which is, after Sebastopol, the principal naval establishment of Russia in that sea. This information was derived from the crew of one of the Russian vessels lately captured. Since the commencement of hostilities the most formal orders were forwarded to Nicolaiev to complete with all possible activity the ships-of-war lying on the stocks. But these orders could not be executed, for various reasons. Hands and supplies were wanting. The most intelligent foremen, who had been brought from foreign countries, especially from England, by Admiral Lazareff, left the service of Russia, and could not be replaced. The best workmen in the country had been forced to serve on board the fleet, as master carpenters and engineers, and several companies of operatives were transferred to Sebastopol, for the execution of urgent works in that place. The supply of timber, coal, and other articles derived from abroad, being exhausted, there was no possibility of renewing it. Among the ships on the stocks at Nicoliev are five liners, considered unfit for service, but which are now being thoroughly repaired by order of the emperor. These are—the Francis I, 110 guns; the King of Prussia, 84 guns, Omega, 84; John Golden Mouth, 74; and Erisan, 60. Among the vessels now constructing are—the steamship Marshal Paskewitsch, 100 guns; Teflis, a sailing ship of 82 guns; the 56 gun frigates, Crimea, Orthodoxy, and Standard, and the steam corvette Mingrelia. The largest engines, being ordered in America, cannot reach their destination, so that the steamers, for which they are intended, are totally unavailing. Prince Menschikoff visited the arsenals of Nicolaiev towards the close of April, by desire of the emperor, to whom he addressed an account of their situation

The Turkish troops in the neighborhood of Dazardschick suffer much from want of provisions. The inhabitants of the country around are in a state of such destitution that all the necessaries for Mustapha Pasha's troops must be conveyed to him from Constantinople, across Varna. The concentration of troops in Russian Poland continues. According to Russian reports, which are evidently false, 250,000 men to be placed in Poland. General Suchanoff has received orders from St Petersburg to place all the fortresses in Poland on a complete war footing.

A return of the Turkish army in Europe has just been made and presented to the commanders of the English and French armies.—Of regular infantry there are 126 battalions, of chasseurs four battalions, cavalry 64 squadrons, artillery 224 guns. The irregular infantry are 13,745 in number, the cavalry 14,355. The battalions consist of 700 men, the squadrons of from 100 to 145. The number of the artillery is estimated at 4,000. There are besides two battalions of engineers, each battalion composed of two companies, each 300 strong.

The allied armies are in motion, in order to co-operate with Omar Pacha, and form his reserve. A French force must by this time have arrived at Adrianople. A French division is on its march from Gallipoli to Constantinople. The English division of the corps of light infantry at Scutari has received marching orders for Tuesday next. It is thought the route is for Varna.

A private letter from a lady of high rank at St. Petersburg, states that Count Nesselrode had been recently insulted by the people of that capitol on passing through the street in his carriage; he was hissed, hooted, and menaced, and was forced to take refuge in the house of a friend. He was accused by the people of being the cause of the war—of not having taken sufficient care against its casualities, and of having shown indifference and negligence; but whatever be the cause, the symptoms of popular indignation were not to be mistaken. It is probable that the inhabitants of St. Petersburg have already begun to feel more severely than the peasants of the interior the evils which war brings with it. They are nearer to those ports which are most exposed to hostilities, and they must be among the first to suffer. But it is certain that much fermentation prevails in the capital of the Russian Empire.

The Vienna Lloyd of May 20 says:—"Omar Pacha has taken up a position before Shumla, with his troops there concentrated; this is a sign that it is in this district where he intends fighting the first grand pitched battle with the Russians. It is reported that Omar-Pacha has sent a report to Constantinople, in which he says that he may be compelled to sacrifice Silistria if the subsidiary allied troops are not at the Balkan by the end of May at the latest."

St. Petersburg, May 9.—The Augsburg Gazette says that the Russian fleet is ready for action at Cronstadt, and nearly 10,000 men garrison the forts. On the island lying west of the fortress, tents are pitched, where troops find shelter, and all the coast swarms with soldiers, mostly of the guards. They are still working at Paul's Fort.

There has been another bombardment of Odessa by the English fleet:—

"The Tiger, with 16 guns and 250 men on board, stranded in the vicinity of the villa Cortazzi, and was immediately fired upon from the battery erected at this point, and by several gun boats. On the following day two English men-of-war arrived on the spot, and at once opened fire upon the said battery. The second letter speaks of seven English steamers having demanded restitution of the ship and her imprisoned crew, which being refused, they proceeded to bombard the town of Odessa. When this letter was posted, the firing had already lasted six hours, and still continued."

Austria and Prussia are at length fully committed against Russia, unless the Czar, at their earnest solicitation, shall stop his march into the Principalities, and give security for the speedy evacuation of Turkish territory, which he of course will not do until he is compelled to it.

We have no confirmation of the rumored bombardment of Sebastopol. The port was still blockaded by a large force of the combined fleet The plan of operations against the place is said to have been determined upon, namely, to land 30,000 men in the Crimea, while the fleet will attack and destroy Sebastopol, the Anglo-French fleets then to leave the Turco-Egyptian squadron in the Black Sea, and Cronstadt to be attacked by the whole overwhelming forces of the combined fleets

Persia, according to the best authority, will remain neutral; and coercive measures are to be resorted to by the allied powers to quell any further insurrection among the Greeks.

Preparing for the worst, England is now straining every nerve to increase her naval and military forces; and France has called out a conscription of 140,000 men. I may state also that this levy is being enforced with the utmost rigor, and without the relaxations hitherto allowed. In every class the conscripts find excuse more than difficult and exemptions cannot be procured. The service must be performed—the ranks filled.

WAR WITH SPAIN. The New York Evening Post of Saturday evening, has the following from a special correspondent:—

Washington, June 3, 1854.—Preparations for war with Spain, if she will not sell Cuba, go on steadily and firmly.

1. Military and naval stores are being collected in great quantities at all convenient points.

2. All the vessels of war and naval stations are undergoing a thorough inspection.

3. All vessels of war are detained in port.

The idea of reducing the surplus in the treasury by reducing duties—so strongly recommended by the President in his message and by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report—is given up, although the surplus is already nearly doubled.

Appointments.

TENT MEETING. Providence permitting, there will be a Tent Meeting held near Frances Corner, Dartmouth, Mass., commencing about the first of August. Particulars hereafter.

Advent Meetings are held in the School-House known as the "Pine Grove School-House," in Rockland, (village) Maine, every Tuesday and Thursday evening, also on Sunday and evening. J. S. RICHARDS.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige and save us immense labor and perplexity if they will strictly adhere to the following rules:

1. Over all communications designed to be published write, For the World's Crisis.

2. Over all communications not designed for the public write, Private.

3. At the head of all letters write the date, never failing to give the STATE, and also County, if written from the Middle, Western or Southern States.

4. Write all orders for the paper or for books on a page by itself, beginning thus, Order for the Crisis, or, Order for books, as the case may be.

5. In the middle of ... when sending money write the amount, and to whom it is to be credited.

6. Be careful to write names and P. O. addresses in a legible hand.

7. In returning papers write on the paper the name and P. O. address of the person to whom it has been sent.

8. In preparing matter for the Crisis we hope our correspondents will adopt, as the most important and indispensible of all rules, the practice of commending the subject to God, praying fervently for light to be reflected on the pathway of the Church, and for heavenly manna to feed and nurture the little flock unto eternal life; also that sinners may be induced to flee from impending wrath, and take refuge in the ark before the deluge takes them all away.

9. Let the letters and communications be carefully read over, corrected, and, if need be re-written, punctuated and prepared for the press, so far as the writer has ability so to do. If, however, the writer does not understand punctuation, &c., the Editor is just as willing, and if possible more so, to serve the humblest member of the flock in bringing his or her sentiments and feelings before the public, as those who have been favored with higher educational advantages, provided only they write under the influence of the Spirit of God.

"As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten."—Rev. 3: 19.

Art thou sailing, my Brother, on a tressel'rous sea?
Art thou weary in watching for day?
While the rocks and the quicksands are lurking for thee,
Will thy gallant ship hold on her way?
Yes, thou hast a guardian, confidingly trust
To His skill, and He'll bear thee safe home,
Affliction must try thee, but do not distrust;
Tribulation will make thy heart strong.

Then fear not the storm, for the waves rise higher
As nearer the shore she draws;
And the Bride has been tried by the sword and fire,
She has sailed on the bloody seas,
She must still bear the impress of suffering love
In labor, and conflict, and pain,
Until she is pure as the Angels above,
And Christ can a spotless Bride claim.

Is thy pathway, my Sister, by clouds overcast?
Art thou toiling in weakness and pain?
Art thou braving the storm, with its fearful blast?
Must the thorn pierce again, and again?
Yes, the thorn must wound, if the rose you secure;
All the white robed ones, here must be tried;
The dross must be burnt from the precious ore,
And the loving heart purified.

Thou hast welcomed, my Sister, the dew and the flower,
They have cheer'd thee, and were not in vain;
But a far richer boon was the thorn in the bower,
For its lessons still with thee remain;
Does the blessed One say, whom I chasten I love?
Does His pitying eye o'er thee beam?
Yes, He's fitting a mansion for thee above,
Then never, no never, complain.

Press on, my dear Brother, for the nightly shades flee;
One more struggle, and all will be o'er;
Trust on, Sister dear, there's a morning for thee,
Where farewells are breathed no more;
Soon, soon, that glad morning will bring the reward,
When all who have dared to believe
The time that Jehovah has left on record,
Will this year a blest kingdom receive.

Concord Tent Meeting.

This meeting which we believe to be the opening, as it were, of the last Advent campaign in this section, was looked to with great interest, as an important meeting, the influence of which would be likely to extend far and wide. I was unable to attend till Saturday afternoon. On Sunday morning the tide of feeling was so strong among the members of the flock, that it was hard shutting down the gate to give the preachers their chance. We believe great good was accomplished in that prayer meeting, and some members of Congregational Churches became deeply interested, and took an active part, probably for the first time with us.

Among the rest a colored Brother and Sister spoke with deep feeling. That Sister remarked that no one could conceive the feeling it gave her, to hear about "that poor man in Boston." Said she, "we have to suffer here a great deal," but casting a glance toward heaven, she added, with much emotion, "glory to God the GREAT ABOLITIONIST is coming this year." A universal response seemed to flow from every heart, and a spontaneous "AMEN" made the whole encampment ring. The flowing tear and outgushing responses of the Brethren and Sisters on that memorable occasion, spoke the fulness and depth of their emotions; and we trust impressions then made will be permanent on many hearts.

At length the time arrived when it was evidently "the mind of the Spirit", to change the exercise, and preaching commenced. Sermon by Brother Adrian, afternoon by Brother Cummings, and evening by Brother Adrian. Audience large and attentive, and to the credit of the city of Concord we may say, good order reigned without interruption.

A remark made by Brother Cummings struck the congregation with great weight, and produced evidently a deep sensation. It was in reference to the Parable of the ten Virgins. He remarked, that it was well known in the campaign of '43 and 4 there were large and enthusiastic gatherings of Brethren and Sisters in their camp-meetings, but afterward that spirit died away, because the Virgins fell asleep during the tarrying of the Bridegroom. He said, that year before last a Tent-meeting was holden, but comparatively with little interest; last year the interest was on the increase, and this year there were some 200 or 300 men from Maine to hear the first discourse preached on the ground.—This reference to encampments painted the track of the Virgins out so completely before the citizens of Concord, who had witnessed these movements, that it seemed they were almost persuaded to believe the Parable was fulfilled before their eyes. The closing sermon by Brother Adrian on the Trumpets of Rev. left a deep impression, we trust, on the minds of the audience.

The location selected for this Tent-meeting was one of the most delightful I ever saw, overlooking the city, and catching the cooling breezes.

There were about 30 baptized by Bro. Hammon which seemed to transform the Merrimac into a Jordan. The place of baptism also presented most attracting scenery, and thousands lined the shores on either side. The bridge also afforded a cool retreat to a large number of spectators.

I have been informed the parting scene on Monday morning was a season of great interest and profit. J. M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FLORIDA, MASS., April 11, 1854.

For the benefit of those who wish to know the truth, I write the following lines. Some think the coming of the Lord will not be known by any one until they see Him in the clouds of heaven, as they think is proved from this text, Luke 21, 35. "For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth." See v. 3. "And take heed to yourselves, lest at any time, your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkeness, and the cares of this life, so that day come upon you unawares." 36 v. "Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things, and to stand before the Son of man." Here we find a command to take heed, watch and pray.—Take heed to what? to the signs. Watch and pray—to escape all these things.—What things? See 25 v. "Distress of nations with perplexity." 26 v. "Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth, for the powers of heaven shall be shaken." All the worthy ones will escape all these things, and the snare. Here we find proof, that it will not come on God's people unawares, for they will take heed to the signs. They are accepted of God, and will not be taken in the snare; and neither will that day overtake them as a thief. Proof, 1 Thess. 5, 4. "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief." See the three first vs., Matt. 24, 37. "But as the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." Noah knew the time: see Gen. 6, 3, and 7, 4–10. and Dan. 12–10. "But the wise shall understand." Who are the wise? Matt. 7, 24—"Therefore whosoever heareth these sayings of mine and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man, which built his house upon a rock."

E. BLANCHARD.

GREAT FALLS, N. H., Mar. 28, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—There are many here at this time who are inquring for the light of truth in relation to the coming of the Lord this year, and the Crisis gives both the light and the cry, saying, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to to meet him." Surely this is meat in due season to all the Virgins that are looking for their Lord and Master's return. Go on, Brethren and Sisters, sound the Cry, for the Lord has said, "Blessed is that servant, whom his Lord when He cometh shall find so doing." Quite a number have come out lately in this place, and identified themselves with us, and many more are enquring for the truth. Lord help us all to decide fully for him.—Brother Merriam, why will not some of the preaching Brethren give out an appointment for this place? The word would be gladly received. If you feel to come this way, come as soon as possible, and oblige many looking for the Lord in 1854. The Advent meetings are held at Buffum's hall on High street.

A. BAYLES.

BLANDFORD, MASS., April 15, 1854.

How blest the vision, O how cheering
Is the sound of fifty-four;
Then we look for thine appearing,
Then we'll rest and roam no more.

O can the joyful news be true? will Jesus come this year, to give us immortality and raise the sleeping dead? My mind reverts back to last summer, as I stood by the couch of my beautiful dead; she that was so full of life and joyousness, is sleeping there; her laughing blue eyes are closed; her round dimpled limbs, fair as alabaster, straightened for the grave; a sweet smile is on her lips, as though angels were watching her slumbers. She looked too fair to lay away in the grave; but so it must be; her "beauty must consume away in the grave from her dwelling." But as I turn from her last resting place, weeping, that death must have dominion over one so dear, I hear a sound, a joyful sound:—Jesus is coming.—Was there ever music so sweet; again it comes rolling over the mountains, louder, clearer, still:—on it sweeps through the vallies, JESUS IS COMING, and almost unconsciously, my own lips catch the cry. Oh! what music! and now away in the blue dome of Heaven, the melody swells loud and sweet as when "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." And again I turn my gaze toward the grave of my darling, and as I look, the earth heaves and trembles; a moment more, and up springs my sleeping one, beautiful with life and immortality. I feel a soft hand laid upon my head, (surely I know that touch;). I turn, and by me stands my gentle, loving mother: she had been sleeping too; but there she stands, fair and smiling, by my side; no mark of death there, no; for she slept in Jesus, and now has a part in the first resurrection. Oh! hail happy day! Soon may it come, is the prayer of your sister looking for redemption this year.

NANCY M. HENRY.

SALISBURY, March 10, 1854.

Respected Reader:—1st. Are you a professed believer in the Advent of our Lord? 2nd. Do you believe in his personal appearing? 3d. Did you ever believe in the time of his coming, and receive it into your heart, and confess its light to be above the noon-day sun? If so, where are you now? Where are those testimonies emanating from a warm heart? Where are those fervent prayers, which arose like perfumes of a sweet-smelling savor? Where are those solemn vows, while upon the bended knee in solemn prayer, you pledged your faith in the time of the coming of the Lord? In that humble posture you received the evidence of the immediate coming, and with your right hand and your left hand up-lifted toward Heaven, declared before Jehovah, that it was made sure to your heart by the seal of the Holy Spirit. God gave you that which you asked for, and granted you all your requests, in answer to prayer, upon which you gave your plighted faith. O my friend where are you now? Have you gone back into Babylon? Could you not wait patiently that short space of time till midnight? Till the time came again for you to arouse and trim your lamp and "go forth to meet the Bridegroom?"

B. H. C.

WEST WINSTED, CT.

Dear Brother Merriam:—Opposition meets us on every hand, yet while God is for us who can be against us? This hope is dear to me; for it is a sure and a certain hope, a hope big with immortality and glory. What magic in these words! what a charming sound on mortals' ear! It makes the soul rejoice with "joy unspeakable and full of glory," and long for the land of eternal rest, the New Jerusalem, its golden streets, its pearly gates, its river of life, and the fruit of the tree of life.—How grand—how beautiful—how sublime will be the paradise of God! where God Himself is to be the light of the city, and the faithful are to dwell with him forever, even forever and ever! Let me say to all, be faithful. Salem's golden towers, and heaven's eternal mansions are in sight. Yes we are almost home, the palms of victory, and robes of light are waiting for those who are faithful unto the end. O what a thought, earth's scenes to close this year—the grave to yield up its dead, and all our trials and sorrows to flee away, and we be changed and made like Jesus!—Should any read these lines that are not ready for the judgment, get ready—make no delay, for we must soon at that tribunal stand. O get ready and make the judge your friend, for every warning, every admonition you must give an account in that day. For one, I am determined to live for God, love the truth, and try to possess the meek and quiet spirit of Jesus, feeling that it is better to suffer afliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season.

Your Sister looking for the King this year,
H. L. HOLLAND.

HAWLEY, March 13, 1854.

We are almost home. Glory be to Jesus, our troubles and trials are almost ended. Soon the last tear will be shed; in a little while from this we shall see Jesus in all his glory, and be made like him. "Signs there is no mistaking proclaim Messiah near." The signs are in the past; the nations are angry, they are preparing for the battle of that great day.—Soon the four winds will be let loose, every servant of God sealed, probation ended, and those that are filthy will be filthy still; and those that are righteous will be righteous still. O children, let us gird on the whole armor of God; and have our garments pure, and be like unto servants that wait for their Master. I am glad there are some that understand the time when Jesus is coming. Brethren and Sisters, we shall not be in darkness, that that day should overtake us as a thief. Would to God there were more that believes Jesus is coming this year, that they might be ready for the great event.

PHILENA P. BURNELL.

SHIRLEY, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—The messenger published by you has proved a great blessing to my soul while I have been reading its pages, containing the light in relation to the Lord's coming so soon as in '54. In '43 I believed He would come, but was disappointed. Of late my mind has been called to the subject again.—Thank God for the light that shines out through the medium of the Crisis, and other publications. We have got the light, bless God for it. It has shined in the pathway of about thirty in the vicinity of Moosehead Lake; and there is a great desire for the truth here. The Lord send some of the strong Brn. here, is the cry of my soul. The children are strong in the faith; and I have led a number of them into the water. Some others will be baptized soon. S. G. MITCHELL.

We regret that the appointment forwarded with this letter was not observed till too late. Please write another if duty requires.

Brother Merriam:—I have been truly thankful for the privilege of reading the Crisis; so much so that I know not how to express my gratitude. It is truly meat in due season to my poor soul. The truths which it advocates are what I fully believe; and I am glad that I ever embraced them. I was converted to the time of the Lord's coming in '44. And as I believe it was time that brought me out from the world, so I believe it will be time that will be carry me to the judgment, and land me in the kingdom. Glory to God. This year, I am looking for Him who has said unto them that look for Him will He appear the second time without sin unto salvation. Glory to God, we are almost home; soon our trials will have an end; faith will be lost in sight, and prayer be turned to praise. My soul cries out, "Come Lord Jesus, and come quickly." Amen.

Yours, in the faith of speedy redemption,
SUSAN E. TEEPLE.

ST. JOHNSBURY, VT, March 3 1854.

"Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth laborers into his harvest." Luke, x: 2, Matt. ix. 38. Dear Brethren, Are we obeying this instruction of our Lord whom we expect to come this year and gather his elect?—If we are, are we willing to say, "here am I, Lord, send me?" How many of us are willing to take our lives in our hand, and sound the solemn warning, "behold the Bridegroom cometh?" Let us see to it, my brethren, that we do not ask to be excused from duty at our peril. One may say he has not the pecuniary means to go out and sound the cry. "If God so clothe the grass, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?—Another may say, I cannot preach the word, but if such a brother would just ask my aid, I would help him out of his dilemma; for I have more worldly goods than I shall need. But must those who are poor, solicit aid of their brethren? This is not according to the principles of Job; for he said, "the cause that I knew not, I searched out." (Job, 29th, 19.) Now my brethren, the Lord is coming this year, and O let us not be of that class who are of a fearful heart. If we are of the flock, all we have, and are, belongs to the Shepherd and His flock. O I bless the great God, that He has given us a hope that is sure and steadfast. Come, Brethren, take courage; the battle is almost over, we shall soon reach the shore if faithful.—Hallelujah to the Lamb.

From your brother in Christ,

☞ The above Diagram is designed to illustrate the measurement of time from the rise of the l horn, with eyes and a mouth (the civil power of the Greek Empire, or Eastern Rome incorporated the Ecclesiastical Power of the Papacy.—Dan. 7: 8) until the coming of Christ at the resurrection of saints.

The 1290 years, or time, times and the dividing of time, (Dan. 7: 25) measure the period during wh the saints, times and laws were to be given into his hand—The period of the saint's tribulation, we un stand, were shortened to 1260 years, (Rev. 12: 6, 14—11: 2 and 13: 5); but times and laws were to ren in his hand during 1290 years, extending 30 years beyond the 1260. "But the judgment shall sit, and shall take away his dominion to consume and destroy unto the end." 45 years from the close of the make 1335 years, when Daniel will stand in his lot, which must be at the resurrection of the saints.

Christ, speaking of this desolating power—the papacy—says, "Immediately after the tribulatio those days shall the sun be darkened,"—which marks a point previous to which the saints were taken of the hands of the little horn power. Thus we perceive that 1260 years of the 1335 ended prior to 19th of May, 1780, when the sun was darkened. Add 75 years to 1260 and you have 1335 years, which end before May 19th, 1855, according to the evidence from the darkening of the sun. But we have a dant historical evidence that the papal power, i. e. the abomination that maketh desolate, was set up in hence the 1335 days (years) end in 1854, which brings the coming of the Lord and the resurrection of saints the present year.

SAMUEL PAGE.

"Immediately after the tribulation of those days, (1260), shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken."

"And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory."

"And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven, to the other."

"When ye see these things begin to to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh."

"And Jesus spake to them a parable, Behold the fig-tree, and all the trees.—When they now shoot forth, ye see and know of your own selves that summer is now nigh at hand. So likewise, when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand."

"Behold he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him."

PORTLAND, April 9, 1854.

To the Brethren scattered abroad:—I would say the interest in Portland is still good. A great anxiety exists among the people to hear on the great question of the Lord's coming. Our place of worship is thronged when we have preaching on the subject. Also Brother Merriam's mighty messenger, the World's Crisis, is in great demand. Oh it comes clothed with power, bringing the Midnight Cry; Glory to God

I pray God to clothe its lines still with burning truth; and let it speak the Bridegroom nigh. We hope that our true watchmen will not cease to cry, day nor night, until Zion becomes a praise in all the earth. There is a great anxiety for Brother Couch to come here, and tarry a few days. We hope he will come as soon as the way opens.

Yours, in hope of deliverance
this year,

WATERBURY, CONN., April 2, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—Believing the Brn. abroad would like to hear from us since the Conference, I would now say that the bread cast upon the waters is beginning to bear fruit almost every week; some are coming out and embracing the truth as it is in Jesus.

Last Sabbath eight happy souls went down into the water, and were baptized by Bro. Morgan; thus shewing their faith in the death, burial and resurrection of the Savior; and they received the promised gift. There were more that were then detained by sickness that are waiting to go forward in the footsteps of their blessed Redeemer.

The cause here is onward; the church of God's own planting are firm in expecting to see the King in his beauty this year. Yes, soon the redeemed of the world will come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away, and the tongue of the dumb sing for joy. Sometimes we are ready to say,

Can it be such hopes for me,
In this our trying hour;
Will it not fail as once before,
When hope seemed almost sure?

Then we look at the signs of the times, the commencement and ending of the days of tribulation, &c., we say no, it will not fail; it will surely come; it will speak; it will not lie; it has tarried once, but now He comes according to the cry. Yes, pilgrims,

"The morn breaks sweetly o'er thee,
And all its midnight shadows flee,
Tinged are the distant skies before thee
A beacon light hangs out for thee."

A few more days or months at m our trials will be over. Dear Brethren Sisters, that are looking for such things, m the Lord grant that we may realize w manner of person we must be in all h conversation and godliness; let us rem ber that without holiness no one shall the Lord.

Brother Merriam.—In view of shortness of time, and the rapid appro of the Judgment, with a full soul insp with love to God and for my fellow m permit me to say a few words through medium of the Crisis, in behalf of Masetr's cause.

"Be ye therefore sober and watch prayer." We live in a solemn time. how carefully we ought to step; how c ful to search our hearts; to right e wrong; to lay ourselves, our property, all, upon the altar of God, with entire mission to His will. Let all hard with regard to each other be done aw let the mind that was in Christ be in hearts; let us purify ourselves thr faith in God and His word; stand from the world, and be not conformed Beware of false teachers. Let the of God be your standard of truth, an so error; use the ability God has g you to get the truth before our fellow O let there be prevailing prayer in church with God, let it be the praye sincerity and faith. God grant our may be holy, and without spot. A months, and we are clothed with im tality, or lost forever. Dear Brother Merriam:—I am gla acknowledge the receipt of the "Wo Crisis" It rejoiced my heart, and I h feast of fat things; it is meat in due son to me, it is just what we want at time of midnight darkness. Glory t God, He has put the time in His w and the prophets searched diligent know what time, and what manner of And they ministered to us; and C God forbid that we should neglect diligent when we have the promise th the time of the end "knowledge sha increased;" and it is connected with time, and still more, "the wise shal derstand;" and this also refers to time. Amen. Blessed be God, the is an important portion of God's w He has appointed it with an oath. A desired to look into it. It is the mainsp of the advent cause. Blot out the and we become formal. Some are s it will do harm. The cause has bee ing out in Canada West, so that m and others have been obliged to qui field. All the harm the time will do will make us a little unpopular, an may have to suffer—to be scoffed at, should be disappointed. But Bret let us have faith; for he will come a time appointed. The Great Anti-Christian Power,

AS REPRESENTED BY

DANIEL, CHRIST, PAUL AND JOHN:

BY J. COUCH

Concluded.

"When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand:)"—Matt. 24: 15.

8. The Church will depend on the state for support and protection, instead of depending on Christ; therefore the Woman is represented as seated on the Beast; i. e. sustained by the civil power.

Says Gibbon, "The thrones of the East were filled with Catholic Bishops devoted to his interest, the clergy and the monks were gained by his liberality, and the people were taught to pray for their future sovereign, the hope and PILLAR of true religion." This remark of the historian strikingly expresses the dependence of the Church on the civil power for support and protection; for the very idea of a pillar is, that it supports or sustains that which is resting on it.

Having shown what was designated by the great anti-Christian power referred to by our Savior, which he denominates the abomination, and which Daniel presents under the symbol of a little horn with eyes and a mouth, and Paul, as the man of sin seated "in the temple of God," and John under the symbol of a Beast with seven heads and ten horns, to which was given a mouth speaking great things, and also under the emblem of a Woman seated on a beast, and reigning over the kings of the earth, we now inquire how a knowledge of this subject can enable us to understand when the Lord will come, and the world will end, since the Savior evidently instructs us to obtain a knowledge of this subject for that purpose. A knowledge of the time is evidently dependent on an understanding of the prophetic periods which are connected with the history of this anti-Christian power, and these periods are dependent on certain changes in the history of this power for their commencement and termination; therefore an understanding of the history of this power in all its different developments, must give an understanding of the prophetic periods which are connected with the judgment. The chronological periods connected with this subject are given to measure different portions of the history of the anti-Christian power, from the time of its establishment to its final destruction; so that if we can find what portion of its history each period measures, and when that portion begins, we can ascertain when the period commences, and consequently when it will end: and having found when the period will end, we find when that portion of the history will end. Thus the history is given to show where the periods commence, and the periods are given to show where the history ends.

We now turn to the first period given in connection with this subject, (Dan. 7: 25) "And he shall speak great words against the most High, and shall wear out the saints of the most High, and think to change times and laws: and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time."

The portion of history measured by this prophetic period, is evidently the exercise of its power to wear out the saints, and to change times and laws. The expression, "they shall be given into his hand," is evidently a figurative expression to convey the idea that he would at that time obtain the power to control and govern the saints, times and laws according to his own will; and as the prophecy shows, that this power was exercised by the horn while having eyes and a mouth, and by the Woman while seated on the Beast, neither of them can exercise it alone; therefore it cannot be exercised before the union is formed between Church and State, nor after that union is dissolved.

We now inquire how long this power would be exercised by Church and State united? The chronological period given to measure this portion of the history, is, "time, times and the dividing of time."—It is evident from the periods given in Dan. 9th to show the time of Christ's first Advent, that a day is symbolical of a year; and learned men generally admit that the periods presented in Daniel, giving the time of his second Advent, are to be understood in the same manner. They also maintain that the term, "time," is to be understood as designating a year; "times," two years; and "the dividing of time," a part of the fourth year, reckoning 360 days to a year. Therefore we have three prophetic years, and part of the fourth; and as the text does not show us how much of the fourth is to be reckoned, we only learn from the text that it is between three and four prophetic years. Three prophetic years (1180 days) represent 1180 years, and four prophetic years represent 1440 years; therefore this power must be exercised for a period not less than 1180, nor more than 1440 years.—But as God does not reveal truths in a manner so indefinite, without an explanation, we may expect to find more definite instruction in some portion of the revelation upon this subject. On turning to Dan. 12th, where more specific instruction is given by the prophet on the same subject, we find the following, "And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days." Dan. 12: 11.—From this passage we learn the fact, that from the time when the abomination is set up, there shall be 1290 days, (years).—As he does not show us in this text what the period measures, it is evidently an explanation of instruction previously given; and as this period is generally understood to measure the civil power of the papacy, and as that power is given in the seventh of Daniel in connection with "time, times and the dividing of time," the 1290 days are evidently an explanation of that period. The period in the seventh ch. is shown to commence at the point where the Church and State obtain the power to change the laws and wear out the saints, and in the 12th ch. is explained as commencing when the abomination is set up, and the abomination is shown to be set up when the Woman takes her seat on the Beast, (Rev. 17.) The historical development of this prophecy we understand to be when the Greek kingdom submitted to the Catholic Church, which we have proved from history to be in A. D. 519. Therefore the prophetic period shows that this portion of the history will terminate 1290 years from 519. But what portion of its history have we shown that the period measures? The wearing out (or persecution) of the saints and the changing of times and laws. But we have learned from the testimony of Christ, that those days of tribulation were shortened; and as this is the first number given to measure the tribulation, it must be the period shortened. But we enquire if it be shortened what is its length after it is shortened?

By reference to instruction given on this subject afterward by John, Rev. 13th, where he gives a description of the same power and persecution, we find the war or persecution was to continue forty and two months, which is 1260 days, 30 days less than the period given by Daniel to measure the same tribulation. Therefore the 1260 days are given to measure the tribulation of the Church, and that tribulation must continue 1260 days.

We now inquire where the 1260 days commenced? They must commence with the 1290 because they are 1260 days of the 1290, the latter number being shortened, and if shortened the portion of time cut off could not be in the midst, but at the end of those days; and as we have proved the 1290 to have commenced in 519, the 1260 must begin at the same point, consequently will end in 1779.

Jesus, in order to demonstrate the termination of this portion of the history by evidences, as it were, visible and tangible, of which he would have the control himself, so that the Church would not be obliged to depend on the testimony of chronographers, placed as a monument the darkening of the Sun to show that the tribulation was ended. This darkening occurred in 1780.

As it is important to ascertain whether the darkening of the sun on the 19th of May, 1780, was the fulfilment of this sign, we would say, the question of the fulfilment or non-fulfilment of this passage hinges on the exact fit of the event to the prophecy. It must be chronologically exact, i. e. come in at the time represented. 2. It must be exact in the order of events; and 3. there must be a perfect correspondence of the event to the representation. This sign was given in 1780 at the end of the 1260 days of tribulation; therefore it was exact in its chronological order. It occurred after the events predicted by our Savior as preceding the darkening of the sun had been fulfilled, and prior to the events which were predicted as subsequent to the darkening of the sun; therefore it was exact in respect to the order of events. If therefore it corresponds perfectly to the description given by our Savior, it must have been the darkening referred to. We are informed that the Greek word rendered "darkened," implies no such idea as that the light of the sun should be extinguished; but that its rays should be intercepted; literally, that the sun should be shaded, which was the very event that transpired; while in respect to the moon it is said, "the moon shall not give her light." This implies the entire absence of all lunar rays to illuminate the earth; and although on the night subsequent to the darkening of the sun, the moon was nearly at the fall, not a ray of light from that luminary was perceptible to the eye.

But some object to this fulfilment, that it was not novel, universal or supernatural. We do not conceive, however, that this objection has great weight. Suppose we test it by referring to other predictions in the same chapter; e. g. wars, famines, pestilences, earthquakes, &c. It is not necessary that these wars, or famines, or pestilences, or earthquakes should be of a new class—out of the order of nature—or that they should extend over all the earth in order to fulfil the prediction; neither is it essential that the darkening of the sun should be an infraction of nature's laws, or of universal extent, in order to fulfil the prediction. If it occurred at the right point both in relation to chronology and the order of events, and the occurrence was precisely such as was predicted, then the fulfilment is perfect, and to deny it is unbelief.

Again, inasmuch as Jesus says immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, he must refer to a given point in the history of the Church; therefore the idea that the sun has been darkened in different ages of the world as a fulfilment of this prophecy, is inadmissible. Once more, if we have not yet had that sign given, we have not had the first sign of our Lord's coming; therefore have no authority for expecting his immediate return; and more than that, if we have not had the darkening of the sun which was to occur immediately after the tribulation inasmuch as the Church in our day has not been subject to the persecution to which Christ alludes, it is evident the tribulation is not yet begun; a doctrine which would certainly not be very consoling to the Church, especially after having heard the blessed announcement, "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God; speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished."

But do the 1290 days end at the same point? If the 1290 were given only to measure the tribulation, the thirty years could not constitute a part of the prophetic period after it was shortened, because there would be nothing for it to measure; but as the 1290 days (years) were given to measure not only the tribulation, but also the dominion or power to change times and laws, and the Savior said the days should be shortened only in reference to the tribulation; therefore the thirty years continue to measure that power during the time it holds dominion. 1290 years from 519 carry us to 1809. We now inquire what we may expect, according to the prophecy, to happen in 1809.—As the period was to measure the time during which the Woman was to be seated on the Beast, and the abomination to continue in its exalted position, and the union of Church and State to remain exercising civil power conjointly, we may expect in 1809 the imperial government with which the Church is connected to refuse any longer to submit to the dictation of the Church, as it had submitted 1290 years before; and as the Church received the civil rulers to their communion for submitting in 519, we may expect they will reject them from their communion in 1809.

Says Allison, "It was officially proclaimed as the fixed determination of the emperor, (Napoleon) never to infringe upon the spiritual authority of the pope, nor even to permit again the temporal sovereignty of the Church.

And in consequence of this decision, the 'Code Napoleon,' 'The Conscription,' and the Continental system were introduced in their full vigor.

The pope excommunicated Bonaparte, in return for the confiscation of his whole dominion."

Says Scott, "A proclamation of the consultum, issued upon the 10th of June, 1809, in consequence of the imperial rescript, declared that the temporal dominion of Rome had passed to Napoleon, but she would still continue to be the residence of the visible head of the Catholic Church.

On the very night when the proclamation of the new functionaries finally divested him of his temporal principality, the head of the Church assumed his spiritual weapons, and in the name of God from whom he claimed authority, by missives drawn up by himself and sealed with the seal of the fisherman, declared Napoleon, emperor of the French, with his adherents, favorers, and counsellors, to have incurred the solemn doom of excommunication, which he proceeds to launch against them accordingly."

I now inquire what portion of the history is covered by the 45 days, (years,) that remain between the close of the 1290 years in 1809, and the end of the days, (or 1335 years,) in 1854. "Blessed is he that waiteth, and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days," (Dan. 12: 12). The portion of history then covered by the 45 days, (years,) is the waiting season, the expecting time, when the saints arrive at the time of partial deliverance, then complete and final deliverance is to be expected—the judgment has set on the little horn, and its dominion is taken away—they are to wait until it shall be destroyed by the brightness of his coming. The vision is unsealed in the time of the end—the light begins to shine, and the saints are to wait for the fulfilment of the promise. In our age of the world the words of the Apostle are emphatically significant: "Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat? Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless." (2 Pet. 3: 11–14). The position of the Church is now subsequent to the tribulation, the darkening of the sun, and the appearing of the signs that portend the immediate approach of the Savior, when Jesus told them to look up, and lift up their heads; for their redemption draweth nigh. Having seen the dawn of the morning, the day-star having risen in their hearts, they are to wait for the bursting glories of everlasting day, when the sun of righteousness shall arise with healing in his wings.

Says the Angel to Daniel, "But go thou thy way till the end be; for thou shalt rest and stand in thy lot at the end of the days." Dan. 12: 13.

The rest here referred to must mean rest in ordinary sleep, or rest from the service of God, or rest in the grave. If the first, then the antithetical part of the verse which represents him as standing in his lot, or as Stuart renders it, "thou shalt stand up FOR thy lot," Gesenius, "and arise TO thy lot," would imply his being aroused from sleep: if it mean rest from the service of God, then evidently the antithesis would be a revival of religion in his heart; but if it mean repose in the grave, then the standing in his lot must imply a resurrection from the dead.

In respect to the first interpretation, the length of time (1335 days) preclude the idea of its being natural sleep; in respect the second, the idea is absurd.

The third, and only rational interpretation conceivable, is that it alludes to rest in the grave, and that at the end of the 1335 days that rest would be broken, and Daniel rise up for his lot or inheritance by a resurrection from the dead.

The starting point of the 1335 days must be the same with that of the 1290 days, or no starting is given, and the period becomes completely unintelligible, which would be an impeachment on the wisdom and goodness of God in giving a chronological period without the possibility of its being understood.

Glory to God, that we have not now to rest 1335 years before receiving our inheritance with the saints in light. We do not now see a land that is "very far off;" but nigh at hand. If we are correct in our calculations in respect to the rise of the Great Anti-Christian power in 519, then the waiting time will end this year, and all who have waited in the sense of the prophecy, i. e, in anxious and confident expectation, will have part in the first resurrection, and enter into the new earth beautified and glorified with the presence of the Lamb. O! beloved Brethren and Sisters, can we be so nigh the goal? Is it possible the congregating of the elect on the mount of God is so near at hand?—Have we almost arrived within reach of the jasper walls, and jeweled gates of the New Jerusalem? O how holy and unblamable should be our lives and conversation, that our "faith and hope might be in God." "Seeing that ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth," "see that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently." Let us consecrate our lives and our substance to that blessed Savior who has offered His life a ransom for us, cheerfully bearing the cross and enduring the tribulation, that we may be counted worthy to escape the scenes of violence and desolation that are coming on the earth, and receive an inheritance pure and undefiled, and that fadeth not away.

WEST WINSTED, May 11th, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I am still "looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ," and looking with increased interest from week to week.

I see no way to avoid the concluion that in a few months we shall "see the King in his beauty," and have our "vile bodies fashioned like unto His glorious body."

"Praise the Lord, for his wonderful works unto the children of men" and for the prospect of being "joint heirs with the King of Kings, and Lord of Lords."

How plain the great truths relative to the immediate coming of the Savior, are now shining forth amid the surrounding darkness; and how different the feelings of those who are looking for the speedy appearing of Jesus, from those who stand opposed. I do thank the good Lord for sending his servants to Winsted last June, to arouse the sleeping ones. Their message was truly meat in due season.

How true the sentiment in Brother Brewer's excellent hymn, "The midnight cry in mercy sounds."

A word about my pilgrimage. The last stopping place noticed in my former epistle, was Worcester; where the bright cloud overshadowed us, and peace sat smiling upon the countenance of the christian, as we met from day to day to worship "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity."

My next appointment was at East Otis, Mass., Sabbath, April 2d. At this place we always expect a heavenly feast when we come together to worship the Lord of hosts. Within a few months East Otis has been changed from a moral desert to a delightful oasis in earth's dreary waste, where Zion's pilgrims love to stop and rest themselves, while journeying to the plains of Paradise, where dwells the King of glory, our elder Brother. We believe this King has several relatives in East Otis, who are not ashamed to be recognized as identified with His interests.

Wednesday morning April 5th, made a call at the M. E. Church in North Blandford, kindly opened for the benefit of those who are interested in the return of the sinner's Friend. Though traveling was bad, the house was well filled with attentive listeners. The next morning we had meeting in the school house, as the "Lord's house" was wanted for other purposes.

We "eat with Publicans and sinners" who treated us with much kindness, and expressed an interest in the welfare of the cause of our Master, whom we entreat to bless the seed sown in North Blandford.

Saturday evening April 8th, met the lovers of Jesus in Waterbury Conn., at Samaritan Hall, where they meet every Sabbath, and had an interesting season. Sabbath, we changed the meeting to Hotchkiss' large Hall which was well filled with an attentive audience.

In the evening the house was crowded to overflowing to hear the review of a sermon preached against our position by the pastor of the First Congregational Church, in the city of Waterbury. The good Lord helped his servant in throwing the stones of truth against the beautiful glass house, erected as a shelter for the people in the coming storm; until some became alarmed for their safety, and fled to the Rock of Ages which was cleft to take them in, where all are safe. Praise the Lord, "truth though crushed to earth will rise again."

There were four pillars to this glass house of the "orthodox" Preacher. He says there are "Four arguments, which singly and combined, seem to me to have great weight, and show that Christ's second advent is not so near as some imagine. 1st. The physical resources of our earth are only beginning to be developed. The coal beds are an instance. They contain a supply of fuel sufficient for the wants of the race for hundreds of thousand of years after the forests shall all have been felled. Now it seems to me to be an impeachment of the divine wisdom, to say that just at this moment, when these treasures and the forces of nature are beginning to be appled to their proper uses, God is about to destroy the world and render them useless." I wonder what he would have said if he had lived in the days of the flood.

2d. "God took four thousand years to prepare for Christ's first advent, then what ages will be required for the development of the scheme." We believe the Lord speaks of cutting His work short in righteousness.

3d. "Redemption has as yet been applied to but a small portion of the inhabitants of the world. Ages of peace may be confidently anticipated, and the number of the lost will be to the number of the saved, as the small dust in the balance."

We think the Savior says, "Broad is the road that leadeth to destruction, and many there be that go in thereat, and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it."

4th. "Prophecy confirms this anticipation. It seems clearly to fortell the conversion of the world. These and such as these are the reasons which persuade me that, instead of being on the very eve of the world's destruction, we are yet in the early morning of its existence."

Says Paul, "When they shall say peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them, but ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief." Says the Savior, "But and if that evil servant shall say in his heart my Lord delayeth his coming, the Lord of that servant will come in a day when he looketh not for him."

I am not at loss to choose my position in this matter.

This professed watchman farther says, "In conclusion, I remark, It is folly to give ourselves up to calculations respecting the time of Christ's second coming.—They take off the attention from more important themes." It is true that this glorious theme of Jesus' coming does take the mind off from politics, fairs, and festivals, beautiful churches, fashionable society and large salaries; and fixit on the "sure word of prophecy," leading us to live with an eye single to the glory of God.

In the afternoon, two were "buried with Christ in baptism." The church in Waterbury are growing in grace, and ardently looking for the coming of Jesus this year.

Brother Merriam we are almost home. Praise the Lord of glory.

Your brother in Christ,
M. GRANT.

The World's Crisis.

LOWELL, JUNE 21, 1854.

Notice.

Some inquiries have been made why the notice of Bro. Cummings' Tent Meeting was not given in the last week's Crisis. The reason was that we commence striking off our papers on Tuesday evening, but the notice of the Tent Meeting was not received until Wednesday following. Inquiry has also been made why I did not publish communications from Bro. Cummings, the reason for which is that no such communications have, to my knowledge, been received or written. The question has also been asked why communications from Bro. C.'s friends have not been published. In reply to that I would say, that we were not aware of having any correspondents who are not Bro. C.'s friends; if there are any such we hope they will cease to write.

Come, Brethren, let us have done forever with all these jealousies and evil surmisings. "Wherefore laying aside all malice, and all guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil speakings, as newborn babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby." 2 Pet. 2: 1, 2. Bro. Cummings and myself have not perhaps thought precisely alike in regard to starting a paper; but if the enemy has sought to create an alienation of feeling on that account, he is for this time completely foiled. Lyman Beecher once remarked, that "he should think the Devil would get tired of fomenting divisions in the Churches; for out of every one he made two;" but that has not been the result in this case, for upon mutual consultation we find brotherly love continues; and our mutual confidence, I trust, is strengthened. Bro. C. is very anxious that nothing should go into the Crisis that is wrong; and I am equally anxious, that there should be nothing in it but what is right; so if he points out any thing wrong, it helps me to keep it right, and, thank God, we work together well. The only provocation we have is to "provoke one another to love and good works;" and the worst wish we indulge toward each other is, that we may meet together in the midst of light and love and glory this year in the kingdom of God.

The World in readiness for the coming of Christ.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S IMAGE—THE FEET AND TOES.

Many are looking with intense interest to the movements in the political world, and expecting some great battles or some revolutionary movements, will prepare the way for the coming of the Lord. But it is to be feared that we may overlook the great event at issue, and be taken in a snare at the time of his coming; for like a "snare it shall come upon all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth."

Some suppose that future Revolutions are yet to develop the feet and toes of Nebuchadnezzar's Image; but nothing is more clear than that this is all fulfilled to the letter. I think this can be easily shown. Many expositions have been given upon this portion of prophecy; and some of them have had the effect to confuse the mind, and lead us to look for a future fulfilment, while the fulfilment is already in the past. This error will doubtless prove fatal to many. They will look for too much from the movements of the nations.

We will attempt to give an exposition of a part of the vision of the image; but for the sake of brevity, we shall be under the necessity of passing lightly over much that would aid us in sustaining our position.

To get at the point with as few words as possible, we will consider the fact, that the state of the world as it then was, and as it was to be, was presented to the king under the symbol of a great image. It is unnecessary to remark upon the head of gold, the breast and arms of silver, and the belly and thighs of brass. No one disputes that these represent the successive kingdoms of Assyria, Medo-Persia, and Grecia. But we wish briefly to notice the legs of iron; and will then pass to the feet. Many, I fear, have fallen into an error in respect to this division of the image. It is a matter of history that there were two divisions of the Roman Empire, which was the kingdom represented. This fact has led some to suppose that the two legs represented the two divisions separately; but if this will not hold true, of course we shall be willing to renounce it, although there is a plausibility about it which, at first sight, is very fascinating. But let us examine it. The brass division of the image represents the third or Grecian kingdom, and continues until the legs of iron are developed. The legs represent Rome; but Rome was not always in a divided state. The division of this empire between the two sons of Constantine did not take place until the fourth century; and soon after this division the western portion began to decline, and ultimately fell a prey to the Northern barbarians. The other division continued for nearly a thousand years, when it was overthrown by the Turks. Now if the two legs of the image represented the two divisions of the Empire, what part of the image represented the Empire before it was divided? But, says one, the Roman kingdom was not known in prophecy till it became connected with the Church, and this was about the time of the division.—This position cannot help you, brother, for certainly Rome was known in prophecy as a persecuting power centuries before this division was dreamed of; and other kingdoms are noticed in prophecy, that were much less intimately connected with the Church. And again, if we look for all this minute correspondence between the symbol, and the things represented, it would lead us to further difficulties. It would lead us to look for the feet in some divided form of government; and furthermore for the toes, five on each foot. We find nothing that would correspond with this interpretation in the former conditions of the world, nor in its condition at present. But, says the objector, we are looking for this condition to be brought about through the agency of impending revolutions. Then we must postpone the advent of our Lord for a long time certainly. But the Lord can work wonders. True, but there is no necessity for wonders in this case. It is all perfectly plain; yet if we were to look for future revolutions to develop, or create the feet and toes of Daniel's image, in the state in which this view would lead us to expect them, it would certainly be looking for a greater wonder than ever appeared in all the revolutions of the kingdoms of earth. The same principle would throw us into difficulties in regard to past events. It would lead us to look for the hands and even the fingers in the Medo-Persian kingdom.—But let us be candid, and take the most consistent course, and we shall find no difficulty.

It is evident from the nature of symbols, that the head of gold in the image, represented the Assyrian or Babylonian kingdom in a general sense, without regard to divisions, or factions; the silver represented the Medo-Persian kingdom on the same principle. The brass represented Grecia in its general features; and the iron represented Rome in a general sense, both before and after the division in the days of Constantine. The feet represented a state of things that was to succeed Rome in its original form, not exactly a separate kingdom as I shall hereafter endeavor to show, but a combination of powers united for a specific object. The toes represent ten kingdoms connected in some way with the feet. In the days of the kingdoms represented by the toes, the image shall be smitten on the FEET, and THEY shall be ground to powder; and THEN the rest of the image shall be broken in pieces according to the prophecy. We will now proceed to examine the feet and toes of the image, and ascertain whether they are to be found among the nations of the earth, and whether they are in asituation for the last great blow which is to demolish all earthly king-kingdoms.

We cannot look for the development of the feet prior to the breaking up of the Roman Empire, when the original Roman power undergoes a change which is represented by the clay. We find that this breaking up took place prior to 519. A power then arose, which is symbolized by a horn, (Dan. vii.,) which becomes prominent among the divisions of the Empire. It has been proved beyond question, by Advent writers, that this power at its commencement, is the Eastern or Greek division. It is represented as having eyes and a mouth, which denote its union with the Church. This power, in its civil capacity, is doubtless the same as that represented by the feet of the image, for both are the weakened and restricted remnant of the Roman power. The Little Horn power was made strong by its union with the Church; but no such auxiliary is noticed in the vision of the image. It is merely represented in its weakened state.

The same power is brought to view in Rev. xvii., under the symbol of a beast upon which a woman or the Church, is seated. Here we find the characteristics more clearly delineated.

In order to get a distinct understanding of this power, we must take our position with John in the "wilderness." The wilderness doubtless represents the period of time, during which the saints were in the hand of the Little Horn, which commenced when the Church and State were united in 519, and ended with the tribulation in 1779, just prior to the darkening of the sun. When this period commenced, the true Church "fled into the wilderness," where she remained during the forty and two months of persecution, while the witnesses were in sackcloth; John stands in this wilderness and bears an explanation of the beast. He is said to be the beast that was, and is not, and yet is. Of this peculiarity we shall speak hereafter. He is called a scarlet colored beast. This, doubtless has reference to his exceeding destructiveness; for under the direction of the Woman that sits upon him he has spilt the blood of from 50 to 60 millions of mankind! How truly was it said of this power, under the other symbol, that he should wear out the saints of the Most High. The next peculiarity we notice is, he had seven heads These are explained to have a double meaning: They are called seven mountains and relate to the geographical position of the Church, or Woman. But another explanation of the seven heads is justified, we are told, by the original Greek, and also by some English versions. This explanation makes them to mean, also, seven kings. By kings we understand dynasties, or lines of kings, which gave their power to support the apostate church, or the woman seated upon the beast. These kings did not all exist at a time, nor did the beast possess all his heads at a time. This is very evident; for John from his position in the wilderness saw that five had fallen and one existed, and one was to come into existence.—It is said the beast ascends out of the bottomless pit, and goes into perdition

We find upon examination of history that seven distinct dynasties have supported the papal harlot, and executed her will in deeds of blood and crime. These are as follows.

1, the Greeks, 2, the Franks, 3, the Germans, 4, the Neapolitans, 5, the Spaniards, 6, the Austrians, 7, the French or Napoleon dynasty.

When John saw the beast, five heads had fallen; consequently, the 6th, or Austrian head was standing. It continues to uphold the papal power, or sustain the woman, until the victorious arms of Napoleon destroyed the Austrian ascendancy in Italy. Bonaparte then took upon himself the responsibility of sustaining the harlot.—But in the year 1809, the time had come for Church and State to be disunited. The 1290 years were fulfilled. Napoleon then displaced the woman from her position—he disunited church and state—he took away the civil power of the pope; and since that time, the woman, having no civil power to sustain her, has sit upon "many waters," which are explained to be "peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues." Thus were church and state disunited, but the Napoleon power was still the beast, for it was the dynasty that had once supported the harlot. But in 1815, this dynasty was crushed by the allied powers of Europe, and the beast was not. It went into nonentity. Now while it remains in the abyss, before it ascends out of the bottomless pit, preparatory to going into perdition, we will look for the development of the ten kingdoms.

The beast power, and the power represented by the feet of the image, are the same; and the ten toes must arise from this power, for they are called "the toes of the feet,". It is plain that ten kingdoms do arise from this power, because it is noticed that the beast had ten horns.

Now we find that in the year 1815, Italy, which was part of the beast power, was divided into ten small kingdoms, and these kingdoms possess all the peculiarities noticed in the ten horns of the beast, in the xvii of Rev., and also all the characteristics noticed in the toes of the image. These ten states which are 1, Sardinia, 2, Lombardo Venitian Kingdoms, 3, Parma, 4, Modena, 5, States of the church, 6, Lucca, 7, Tuscany, 8, the Kingdom of Naples, 9, San Marino, and 10, Milan, will not unite with each. They hate the harlot and are ready to make war with her at any moment; and this probably, is to be the work of Mazini, who has lately gone to Italy. They will receive power as kings, one prophetic hour with the beast which has ascended out of the abyss, for God has put it into their hearts to fulfill his will.

A few words more upon the beast and the readiness which he is in to receive the final blow from the stone "cut out of the mountain without hands," or, what is the same, to go into perdition. He is called the beast that was, and is not, and yet is. He was, in the days of Napoleon, and in the days of previous supporters of the papal church. When the Napoleon dynasty was crushed, he was not; but in 1848 he ascended out of the bottomless pit.—The Bonaparte dynasty was revived, and all the "world wondered" Napoleon 3d is the eighth, but of the seven, he has emphatically ascended out of the abyss, and is very soon to go into perdition. He and all other nations that are allied with him are identified with the feet of the image. They are going, at the instigation of the three unclean spirits, up to the valley of Jehosephat, merely to be smitten by the "stone." There is no battle to be fought necessarily but the battle of the GREAT DAY; and no victory to be won, except one by the KING of KINGS.

Now, dear reader, we subject the foregoing thoughts to your consideration, begging that you will carefully consider them; for we feel confident that the chariot of the coming King will not be necessarily delayed for any revolution yet in the future. The feet are getting ready to be smitten, and I cannot see how this smiting can be delayed even till the coming fall. The types seem to point to the tenth of the seventh month; but let us watch that it may not overtake us as a thief.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WEST STAFFORD.

What is brotherly love? Is it to love those who believe, speak, and write, on all points according to our opinion of truth? or is it to love the image of Jesus where ever it is found? The apostle tells the Romans, (15: 7,) to receive one another, as Christ received them, to the glory of God: and I suppose that whatever was written beforetime was written for our instruction. We will see if there was any diversity of opinion in the Roman Church.

Rom. 14, 1–6, "Him that is weak in the faith, receive, but not to doubtful disputation. For one believeth that he may eat all things; another who is weak, eateth herbs. Let not him that eateth, despise him that eateth not, and let not him which eateth not judge him that eateth; for God hath received him."

"Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? to his own master he standeth or falleth, yea he shall be holden up; for God is able to make him stand. One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. He that regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it. He that eateth, eateth to the Lord; for he giveth God thanks; and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks.

Did not Christ receive us with as great a diversity of opinion as there was in the Roman Church? Yes greater. We are differently constituted, and were differently educated. Some of us were brought up and educated by Congregationalists, some by Baptists, others by Methodists; and so on. But when we came to Jesus, He received us with all our different views.—He received us to the glory of God, and some of us have been in His school for years! and if we are true disciples, we have in all sincerity, tried to know the mind of Christ—to understand His word, as He would have us undartand it, that we might do His will, and be prepared for His coming, and Kingdom. But we have come to different conclusions after all. We have not come into the unity of the faith, the time for this has not yet arrived: nor will it until the Lord shall bring again Zion Then shall the watchmen see eye to eye; and not only the watchmen, but the people also. In the few past years, when there has been such a multitude of different and distracting views, how often has the weary pilgrim rejoiced that the time was near at hand, when the Lord would bring again Zion; and has been led to cry with the poet,

The exhortation of the apostle, I think still applicable to us; "Receive ye one another as Christ also received us, to the glory of God." Then we are to receive one another with all our different views and opinions still, for we acknowledge no Priest, Bishop, or Pope, to lord it over our consciences, or tell us what we must, or must not believe.

One believes the thousand years to be in the past: shall he receive none as brethren who see it in the future? or shall those who see it in the future acknowledge none as brethren who do not agree with them?

One believes the Lord will come in '54: another, that He is soon coming, and both are looking at the same signs in the east, to bring the long expected event. Shall each require the other to believe as he does? or denounce him as a foolish virgin? shall we not rather let brotherly love continue.

Let us take heed lest we reject some of Christ's little ones, and it be said to us in that day, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my little ones, ye have done it unto me."

We have a little more excellent advice, in the same chapter from which I have quoted, Rom. 14, 10–13, 19. "But why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at naught thy brother? for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ. For it is written, As I live saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God; so then every one of us shall give account of himself to God. Let us not therefore judge one another any more; but judge this rather, that no man put a stumbling block or an occasion to fall, in his brother's way. Let us therefore follow after the things which make for peace, and the things wherewith we may edify one another."

Yours, looking for the Lord,

E. A. BARTLETT.

Dear Brethren:—We have now entered upon that grand and awful time for which we have been looking for these 13 years past. We have watched with the deepest interest, the gradual progress of events, and the corresponding condition of the human mind, and we have not watched in vain. The words of our Saviour are fulfilled before our eyes, a fearful looking after those things that are coming on the earth everywhere exists; the last moral condition of the human mind is developed. From the king on the throne, to the beggar in the street, there is the same involuntary outburst of feeling. As a demonstration of this characteristic mark, I present you with the following from political journals. "Every observer of men and things must feel conscious that a momentous crisis in the affairs of mankind is rapidly approaching. Every thing seems trembling beneath some impending doom, some tremendous power, that is about to burst upon the world. There is little to tell us whether the coming strife will be fraught with good or evil. But that some great change, some universal transition, is near at hand, is as plainly to be felt as the sullen breath of the gathering storm.—There is an oppressive sultriness and heaviness in the moral atmosphere, a hurrying to and fro of the animate world, a clattering and clamoring, an intense energy and activity, that presage the rushing tornado, or the rumbling earthquake.—We see the giant thunder-columns towering above the horrizon, massive, sullen, and grand; and we hear the low, stifled rumble, and feel the deep, subdued quiver, beneath our feet. The sunlight assumes a sickly hue, a veil of quiet gloom envelopes the face of nature; and wherever we turn our eyes, we are greeted with the scowl of portentous preparation. All Europe is one boiling cauldron of revolutionary elements—China has long been torn and tossed by contending forces—the Indies and Southern Africa have not slept for years—Australia is a new volcanic continent over which the lava tide may sweep at any moment. South America is still rolling and rocking as if shaken by an earthquake—Mexico bids fair to be swallowed up, and the United States, the land of security, trembles to its very base.

"In the absence of all proof against a great moral and political revolution, why conjure up evidence to prove what is manifest in every thing around us? We have but to look and see that a sublime change is already begun. We have but to look into the mirror of truth, and behold the shadow of the approaching reality. The education, actions, words, thought and feeling of men, all bear witness that we are tending towards a new order of things—and experience, and faith in the progressive operations of nature, tell us that it will be one far above anything ever yet realized by mankind. But the birth of the new era will not be a pangless one.—Pain, and suffering, and tears, and blood will consecrate and baptize the darling of ages. We shudder and shrink from the thought; but we yearn for the event, as parent never yet yearned for the sight of offspring."

Oh how blind the world is in regard to the character of the event which is coming. Brethren, awake, arise, "behold the Bridegroom cometh," and cometh this year.

ISAAC ADRIAN.

BRIMFIELD, JUNE 12.

"Fear not little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Fear not, ye who have sacrificed all for the truth, lest you shall come to want.—He, who regards the sparrow as he falls to the ground, He who numbers the hairs of your head, will never suffer you to want; for if there were no other means, He will send the ravens to feed you as He did Elijah. I believe it; thank the God of heaven. "Fear not," the reproach of men, nor their revilings—their day of dishonor and shame is coming: let them heap upon you their epithets, God will cause it to work for good, if we love Him. "Fear not," when manifold temptations come upon you, or when you are passing through deep waters of affliction; nor when sorrow's dark waves almost overflow you. That God that made the sun to stand still—that God that made a passage through the Red Sea—that God that will in a few days say, "it is done," will guide you safely through, until your feet are placed upon the immortal shore. "Fear not," though friends dear as life forsake you—though your brethren cast you out with the name of the majesty of heaven upon their hypocritical lips—God, Jesus Christ, the angels, and every saint under heaven is on your side. More are those that are with us, than they that are with them. "Fear not," in view of the coming conflict: it is what will bring our long looked for Messiah. Salvation is coming; rejoice, yea, rejoice ye lonely weary pilgrims, in prospect of speedy deliverance. Keep his sayings, every one that is written in the book of God. Let not your hearts be troubled; He will come and save you. The seventh vial is about to be poured out upon this guilty world; but blessed be the name of God, the little flock will be hid in that day safe in Isaiah's chambers. While the slain of the Lord will be from one end of the earth to the other, God will be the portion and safety of the "little flock," therefore do not fear. Amen and Amen.

S. M. BASSET.

CHAMPLAIN, N. Y., June 12.

Brother Merriam:—It does truly cheer my heart to hear the glorious news of my Saviour's so near approach, to take his waiting, longing children home. Praised be God, there are yet faithful watchmen on the walls of Zion that can tell us what of the night—what its signs of promise are, and whereabouts we are on our journey. Bless the Lord, there are some that can see we are coming into harbor.—Oh is it true that we are so near home? that in a few short months we shall sit down in the kingdom of God, and be permitted to drink from life's flowing river, and pluck the fruit from life's fair tree, and with immortal tongues shout the high praises of Him who has redeemed us with His own blood? Oh! while I write, I begin to feel something of that flame of love which I felt in my heart in '44; and my prayer to God is that He would fan it to a mighty flame in all our hearts, that it may burn up all the base desires of sin. Oh ye afflicted, tempted, tried ones, lift up your heads and rejoice, knowing that your redemption draweth nigh. I, with you, was one that expected to see the Lord in '44, and deeply too, did I feel the disappointment; but my trust in His word was unshaken; and while He tarried, I resolved in my soul to wait for Him. Our hope, Brethren, has long been deferred, the night has been a long and dreary one, but the morning soon cometh; very soon we shall hear the voice from the throne, saying, it is done. Oh! sinner, leave the paths of worldly folly, and turn to Christ that you may obtain admittance with all the blood washed holy band into the city of our God. May God enable us fully to do His will, that we may have a right to the tree of life, and enter in through the gates into the City.

HANNAH M. HAIR.

Great Meeting at Union Mills, Ind., June 2, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—We are having a grand and glorious meeting here. It commenced at the appointed time with a good representation of brethren from abroad. Brethren Berrick, Couch, and Howell from the East, arrived in good time, in health, strong in God, and the power of His truth. Our attendance has been large and attentive from the beginning, and the truth is sweeping all before it. All glory to God, we have at last struck the old landmark that Daniel heard about; but he did not understand, because it was closed up and sealed unto the time of the end; but the seals are off, and the book is open, and we are now eating it up. Glory to God how sweet! O it sweetens every thing; yes, and makes its own bitter sweet.

It takes hold of our ministering brethren here, like a death stroke, and a healing balm, this looks, to be sure, rather paradoxical, but you will understand it, and the rest will when they eat it.

...ise the Lord for what I see and feel on this subject. Sinners are converted and baptized daily; back... are waking up, and the people are moved as by the roaring of mighty ...ings.

... and Sister Eastman and Judkins ... us, strong in faith and rejoicing ... Brethren Chaplin, Clark, Sey... ...ll and Stone, preachers of the ... with us; and all, I believe, are ... or under a solemn conviction of ...

Morganon. J. C. BYWATER.

PAINSPOINT, May 29, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I have had the opportunity, through the mercy of God, of listening to the last notes of warning by Brn. Burnham and Morgan here in the grove. It is cheering indeed to the lonely pilgrim to see the evidences from God's word and the signs of the times, that Michael is so soon to stand up, and every one of God's people to be delivered—that the second wo is past and the third wo so soon to come. The Savior told his people when they see the signs begin to come to pass to lift up their heads, for their redemption draweth nigh. It seems the signs are almost past; and we are looking, loving, hoping and waiting, I believe understandingly, through faith in God's word, for the consummation of our hope soon to be realized.

Yours, in hope of speedy redemption.

ROBERT CHOWN.

ROXBURY, March, 23, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I take this opportunity to express my sincere thanks to you for sending me the Crisis, and my prayer is that you may be rewarded at the resurrection of the just. I can truly say it brings glad tidings to my weary soul to think Jesus is so soon coming to deliver his tried ones. I am one who sighs for home; I long for the time to come when the enemy will no longer triumph, when the wicked will cease from troubling, and the weary will be forever at rest. I feel truly that the signs there is no mistaking proclaim our great deliverer near, when he that shall come will come and not tarry. Oh, glory be to God in the highest; if we are faithful a little while longer, we shall lay down the cross and wear the conqueror's crown.

HARRIET STODDARD.

GOFFSTOWN, N. H., June 12th, '54.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I was in Manchester last Sunday, with the brethren, and the Lord was with us in power. I baptized four happy souls, and they are now rejoicing in God. At the close of the third meeting, five more rose for prayers, and in the evening two of them spoke and told their feelings to the people. To God be all the glory. O dear brethren, time is short, what is done must be done soon. Jesus is coming in the seventh month, Jewish time, without fail; yes surely it is so; and my inquiry is, shall I be saved in the kingdom with the saints? O I want to be there. The third invitation is now given for supper; soon the door will be shut. O Lord, save the people from sin, and prepare them for the kingdom. Brethren, be faithful to God till Jesus comes, and then we shall be saved in His kingdom, Amen.

Your brother, sighing for home,

BENJAMIN P. MANNING.

A Russian journal announces a new levy of troops in the kingdom of Poland—where the army is to be raised to a million of soldiers. MORTALITY IN NEW YORK. There were 415 deaths in New York city last week which were 105 more than in the corresponding week of 1853. Among the deaths there were twelve cases of cholera.

Air—Eden of Love.

Arouse ye, my brethren, awake from your sadness,
The Savior is coming, the kingdom is near,
Your harps tune anew with the sweet strains of gladness,
The City Jerusalem soon will be here.
The night is far spent, and the auspicious morning
Rolls onward in haste with its heralds of warning,
Your souls now with patience and meekness adoring,
Our toils will be over this year, aye, this year.

O, who, who can tell of the joys of the blest ones
That reign in eternity, holy and free;
Where naught will be heard save the warblings and rich tones
Of saints and of angels, in sweet harmony?
No more for our hope will the worldling deride us,
The bitter farewell ne'er again shall divide us,
With seraphs and saints, and Immanuel beside us,
Forever and ever; we happy shall be.

Our sighings all ended, our sins all forgiven,
Our songs of redemption in rich anthems ring;
Our Savior our joy, and his smile be our heaven,
The name of embassador changed now to King;
The cross for the crown, and the sword sheathed forever.
Bright diadems sparkling with gems from life's river
We'll cast at the feet of our glorious deliverer,
While with loud alleluias the kingdom will ring.

Then haste ye away, and repeat the glad story,
The cry, lo! He cometh! with loud echo's swell,
For ye shall soon join in the rapturous glory
Of seraphic legions, where ransomed ones dwell,
The haven of rest we are more swiftly nearing,
The promise is sure, and the prospect is all cheering,
The green fairy fields of our sweet home appearing,
I'll meet you in glory, farewell, oh farewell!

The Paris Patrie says: "The last letters from different Russian provinces announce that marked agitation prevails both in St. Petersburg and several of the neighboring towns. Trade was suffering intensely, and misery was on the increase. A recent fact strikingly illustrates both the fears of the Russian Government and its method of proceeding. A tradesman of the capital having failed, closed his shop situated in one of the most frequented quarters of the city. This circumstance, apparently so ordinary, excited a sensation, and the Government arrested the tradesman and transported him at once to Siberia for having failed at such a time, and thus betrayed the uneasy state of trade. The police found upon inquiry that the immediate cause of the failure was a claim by a nobleman for a sum of money due to him. This nobleman was fined 15,000 roubles, and ordered to leave St. Petersburg and reside on his property."

The survey for the defences from Bujuk-Tehekedji to Derkos are progressing rapidly. From the Sea of Marmora to the Black, the projected line extends for 27 miles. A lake, spread out in some seasons into a vast marsh, almost joins the sea at the Western end, and precludes for several miles all possibility of the passage of a hostile army. The water is four feet deep, and the bottom soft and muddy.

At the other extremity another lake is situated which would equally bar an enemy's passage, and between these two there is a line of undulating hill and valley, which, though destitute of any strong natural means of defence, may be made impassable by the skill of modern engineers and the bravery of its defenders. Gen. Baraguay d'Hilliers calculates that 40,000 men will be sufficient to defend it,—of whom 5,000 would watch the two extremes, and 30,000 would occupy the centre. It was considered that these lines well defended, would remain a permanent defence to Constantinople.

The exchange of couriers between London and Stockholm is very frequent. Two special messengers passed through Hamburgh on the 24th of May; one coming from London, the other from Stockholm; both were the bearers of despatches for the respective governments. Important negotiations are pending between these two courts, and they seem to be on the eve of conclusion.

DEFENCE OF ST. PETERSBURGH. Letters from St. Petersburgh, received at Vienna, state that the Czar is in a state of great dejection, approaching to bewilderment. In Vienna this feeling is pardonably attributed to the conclusion of the Austro-Prussian treaty, which it is imagined has astonished the Russian Monarch.—The same letters state that the St. Petersburg journals are permitted to mention Austria and her public with marks of contempt. According to the Russian correspondent of the Vienna Presse, writing on the 15th, the news of the bombardment of Odessa had much shaken the confidence of the people, and the severity of the police had not succeeded in improving the public feeling, as the preparations for the defence of the capital plainly show that the fall of Cronstadt is not considered beyond the bounds of possibility. Fifteen out of the seventy stone bridges which cross the Neva are to be broken down, and the granite material thrown into the river; on those remaining heavy artillery are to be placed. Four new pontoon bridges are to be constructed. The whole of the so-called Admiralty side, the Jauskory side, and the Newsky-Prospect is to be fortified, and the magnificent buildings used as barracks. For some days before the letter was written, the Emperor had been indisposed. It is added that he is much alarmed for his highly prized fleet, "and this makes him so much out of humor."

ITALY. Letters from Turin state that a contingent of 25,000 men has been demanded from the Sardinian Government by France, for the purpose of the Eastern war. Sardinia is stated to have replied that, although quite prepared to co-operate with the Western Powers, the present state of its finances could not afford so large an increase of the army. However the contingent of recruits, which is not due till the end of November, will be called out the present month.

Garibaldi is at Nice with his family, where he will remain some time for the recovery of his health.

The Neapolitan Government has ordered the observance of the neutrality required by the Western Powers. Neapolitans are forbidden to take service as privateers.

GREECE. A private letter from Volo of the 15th mentions a fact which shows that the Greeks have not only violated all international law by the insurrection they excited in the Turkish provinces, but that they have committed the most odious cruelties. It appears that some days previous to the date of the letter just mentioned a detachment of 150 Turkish soldiers having been surprised by a division of the Greek liberators, amounting to 1500 men, took refuge in a church. The Greeks paid no respect to the sanctity of their own place of worship. They closed up every issue, set fire to the sacred edifice, and burned the Turks alive in it.

The vast merchant quarter of the city of Riga has just been leveled to the ground by order of the military authorities, who fear a landing of the Anglo-French forces. All the working part of the citizens, even women, children and old men, were set to work to dig trenches, and throw up mounds of earth at the gates of the city. As the workmen were not able to make gunboats, they have pressed of Revel and Libau.

The French force now in the Baltic consists of eight ships-of-the-line, Inflexible (flag ship), 92 guns; Duguescelon, 92 guns; Gemappes, 92; Hercule, 92; Tage, 92; Breslau, 86; Trleent, 80; Duperre, 80. Also, 4 frigates, Andromaque, 60; Poursuivant, 50; Virginie, 50; Zenolle, 50. Three steamers, Darien, 14; Souffler, 6; and Lucifer, 6. Eight other ships are daily expected to join, which will make the force of the French fleet in the Baltic 1200 guns and 14,000 men.

BROOKLYN AND NEW YORK RIOTS.—The spirit of lawlessness seems to be rampant just now. Last Sunday, Brooklyn and New York cities were disgraced by fearful riots, and the peace and sanctity of the day utterly destroyed by scenes of violence and blood. About 30 persons were wounded by pistols, clubs, &c., and about 50 Irishmen were arrested.

In N. Y. city Sunday was also a day of the most intense excitement. There was street preaching and some skirmishing during the afternoon, in different places.—During the discourse in the Park at about 4 o'clock, where some 5000 persons were assembled, an alarm of fire was given, and multitudes immediately rushed towards the fire. This being extinguished, two engine companies, which had long cherished ill will towards each other, commenced a fight. This was quelled by the police, but was afterwards renewed by the original parties, supported by several hundred partizans on either side. Thirty thousand people, it is said, lined the streets, and it required a strong police force to arrest the progress of the fight.—[Boston Traveler.

☞ It may be interesting to observe here, that, according to the last census of the Russian empire, the population was given at 60,000,000 men. This census was taken last year, and on those figures has the present conscription been based.—During 1853 there were born 962,380 male and 927,300 female children. The deaths were 1,396,840. The excess of births over deaths was, therefore, 493,340. The revenues of the state for the same year were given at 180,000,000 roubles. That amount did not, however, show the whole receipts of the government; for there are 270,000,000 roubles which, derived from the produce of domains, regalias, and various other small fiscal additions, swelled the total imperial revenue to 450,000,000 roubles. The privy purse of the Emperor was estimated at the moderate sum of 6,000,000 roubles. It must, nevertheless, be born in mind that Nicholas Romanoff is under no parliamentary restriction in regard to the expenditure of the public money. Indeed, there is no such conjunctive term as "the public money" known in the Russian language. All that belongs to a Russian subject belongs also to the Emperor. His majesty is at liberty—and the law sanctions the act—to draw on his people at any moment for any sum which he may require for his own domestic use or for special national purposes.

FAMINE IN THE IONIAN ISLANDS. Recent accounts from Zante and Cephalonia, in the Ionian Islands, represent the condition of the inhabitants to be deplorable in the extreme. The currant crop, their main dependence, is cut off again, for the fourth season in succession; and all classes are involved in a common calamity, of destitution and suffering. Add to this failure of the staple crop of the islands, the Russian war and the Greek Insurrection, which have closed their usual avenues for food against them—their grain being obtained from Russian ports, and their other provisions from Turkish—and that the immense armies and navies gathered in their neighborhood are likely to absorb every thing in the provision line—and it will be readily seen that the condition of the Ionians must be deplorable and destitute indeed, unless help can be obtained from abroad.

☞ We extract the following in relation to the riots in New York and Brooklyn June 11. We understand some three or four regiments of soldiers were under arms on that day, besides an extra police force of 200 men.

"Another occurrence of much moment was the bloody riot in Brooklyn, N. Y., on Sunday, in which some thirty persons were more or less seriously injured by fire arms, stones, and clubs. The fight was between the "Know Nothings," and the Irish; the latter being, in this case, the aggressors, though excited by false reports of the intentions of their enemies to attack them. On the same day, designed by our Maker as a day of rest and devotion to religious interests, two riots occurred in New York city, between hostile fire companies, which required the strong arm of the police to suppress. The frequent recurrence of these scenes of lawlessness and violence are alarming indications of the depreciation of the moral tone of the community, and naturally fill the hearts of thoughtful men with fear and trembling for the stability of our republican institutions, since the only foundation of these is the intelligence and morality of the community."

Could language express more perfectly the idea conveyed by our Saviour, "Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth."

THE Czar Nicholas is making extraordinary preparations to receive the allied fleet, both at Cronstadt at St. Petersburgh. An ex-Alderman in New York, who has recently returned from Russia, in a communication to the Evening Post, says the Czar has fourteen hundred thousand men under arms, available at any moment.—He describes the entire population as filled with enthusiasm for the prosecution of the war, which is regarded as a sort of crusade for the defence of the Greek Church. Demidoff has already voluntarily proffered to the Emperor the gift of a million of rubles, equivalent to $750,000. Another nobleman has done the same, while the various officers in command have insisted on offering the half of their salaries.—Even the most delicate ladies in the upper classes are engaged in performing succor—[Sat. Obituary.

Died, in Shirley, May 28, Ann S, eldest daughter of Noah and Sarah T. Fairbrother, aged 6 years and 7 months. Her sickness was of 3 weeks duration, and during that time her sufferings were severe. There seemed to be something remarkable impressed on her mind at so early an age. She would often say, when asked if she wished to die, that she was "going home," and would often say she had rather die than to get well; but, as she expressed it in her child-like manner, would say, "I want the Lord to do just as he has a mind to." She acquired a great love of learning to read in the Bible; and one of her favorite chapters was the 22d of Rev. During her illness she would ask me questions concerning that "river of the water of life," spoken of in the chapter, and would often say, "I am going home to die no more, to be sick no more, I am going home in '54."

It is truly painful to think of the sufferings of our departed ones. We have now been called the fourth time to witness the death of our dear children, but we rejoice in hope of soon meeting them where separation will never more be known.

The little forms we loved so dear
Now sleep in death's embrace;
We would not call them back again
From their quiet resting place.

NOTICE. Dear Brethren,—The Lord is soon to come and judge the world in righteousness and establish his kingdom on the earth, and we have but a short time to warn our fellow men. As we are commanded to work while the day lasts, we have fitted out a Tent that will accommodate about one thousand persons for the purpose of going out into "highways and hedges" to sound the alarm; and we want to keep it in the field all the time, (if the Lord will), and do all the good we can. Therefore, those that know of a field of labor where good can be done, and wish to have a Tent Meeting, will please write to me immediately, so that I can make the necessary arrangements in order to meet the wishes of the Brethren.

BUFFALO, April 30, 1854.

Meetings of the believers in the speedy coming of Christ will be held at the hall, on the corner of Mohawk and Main sts., (entrance on Mohawk st.) three times on the Sabbath and once during the week, (Wednesday evening). Ministering Brethren are requested to make their appointments here as for other places.—All the Brethren who come this way will please call on Dr. A. Decker, at No. 293 Washington st., where they will be provided for.

Advent Brethren hold regular meetings at Lyceum Hall, in Lawrence, on Sundays, also on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday evenings.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige and save us immense labor and perplexity if they will strictly adhere to the following rules:

1. Over all communications designed to be published write, For the World's Crisis.

2. Over all communications not designed for the public write, Private.

3. At the head of all letters write the date, never failing to give the STATE, and also County, if written from the Middle, Western or Southern States.

4. Write all orders for the paper or for books on a page by itself, beginning thus, Order for the Crisis, or, Order for books, as the case may be.

5. At the close of each letter containing money write the amount, and to whom it is to be credited.

6. Be careful to write names and P. O. addresses in a legible hand.

7. In returning papers write on the paper the name and P. O. address of the person to whom it had been sent.

8. In preparing matter for the Crisis we hope our correspondents will adopt, as the most important and indispensible of all rules, the practice of commending the subject to God, praying fervently for light to be reflected on the position of the Church, and for heavenly manna to feed and nurture the little flock unto eternal life—also that sinners may be induced to flee from impending wrath, and take refuge in the ark before the deluge takes them all away.

9. Let the letters and communications be carefully read over, corrected, and, if need be re-written, punctuated and prepared for the press, so far as the writer has ability so to do. If, however, the writer does not understand punctuation, &c., the Editor is just as willing, and if possible more so, to serve the humblest member of the flock in bringing his or her sentiments and feelings before the public, as those who have been favored with higher educational advantages, provided only they write under the influence of the Spirit of God.

The World's Crisis.

LOWELL, JUNE 21, 1854.

Notice.

Some inquiries have been made why the notice of Bro. Cummings' Tent Meeting was not given in the last week's Crisis. The reason was that we commence striking off our papers on Tuesday evening, but the notice of the Tent Meeting was not received until Wednesday following. Inquiry has also been made why I did not publish communications from Bro. Cummings, the reason for which is that no such communications have, to my knowledge, been received or written. The question has also been asked why communications from Bro. C.'s friends have not been published. In reply to that I would say, that we were not aware of having any correspondents who are not Bro. C.'s friends; if there are any such we hope they will cease to write.

Come, Brethren, let us have done forever with all these jealousies and evil surmisings. "Wherefore laying aside all malice, and all guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil speakings, as newborn babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby." 2 Pet. 2 : 1, 2. Bro. Cummings and myself have not perhaps thought precisely alike in regard to starting a paper; but if the enemy has sought to create an alienation of feeling on that account, he is for this time completely foiled. Lyman Beecher once remarked, that "he should think the Devil would get tired of fomenting divisions in the Churches; for out of every one he made two;" but that has not been the result in this case, for upon mutual consultation we find brotherly love continues; and our mutual confidence, I trust, is strengthened. Bro. C. is very anxious that nothing should go into the Crisis that is wrong; and I am equally anxious, that there should be nothing in it but what is right; so if he points out any thing wrong, it helps me to keep it right, and, thank God, we work together well. The only provocation we have is to "provoke one another to love and good works;" and the worst wish we indulge toward each other is, that we may meet together in the midst of light and love and glory this year in the kingdom of God.

The World in readiness for the coming of Christ.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S IMAGE---THE FEET AND TOES.

Many are looking with intense interest to the movements in the political world, and expecting some great battles or some revolutionary movements, will prepare the way for the coming of the Lord. But it is to be feared that we may overlook the great event at issue, and be taken in a snare at the time of his coming; for like a "snare it shall come upon all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth."

Some suppose that future Revolutions are yet to develop the feet and toes of Nebuchadnezzar's Image; but nothing is more clear than that this is all fulfilled to the letter. I think this can be easily shown. Many expositions have been given upon this portion of prophecy; and some of them have had the effect to confuse the mind, and lead us to look for a future fulfilment, while the fulfilment is already in the past. This error will doubtless prove fatal to many. They will look for too much from the movements of the nations.

We will attempt to give an exposition of a part of the vision of the image; but for the sake of brevity, we shall be under the necessity of passing lightly over much that would aid us in sustaining our position.

To get at the point with as few words as possible, we will consider the fact, that the state of the world as it then was, and as it was to be, was presented to the king under the symbol of a great image. It is unnecessary to remark upon the head of gold, the breast and arms of silver, and the belly and thighs of brass. No one disputes that these represent the successive kingdoms of Assyria, Medo-Persia, and Grecia. But we wish briefly to notice the legs of iron; and will then pass to the feet. Many, I fear, have fallen into an error in respect to this division of the image. It is a matter of history that there were two divisions of the Roman Empire, which was the kingdom represented. This fact has led some to suppose that the two legs represented the two divisions separately; but if this will not hold true, of course we shall be willing to renounce it; although there is a plausibility about it which, at first sight, is very fascinating. But let us examine it. The brass division of the image represents the third or Grecian kingdom, and continues until the legs of iron are developed. The legs represent Rome; but Rome was not always in a divided state. The division of this empire between the two sons of Constantine did not take place until the fourth century; and soon after this division the western portion began to decline, and ultimately fell a prey to the Northern barbarians. The other division continued for nearly a thousand years, when it was overthrown by the Turks. Now if the two legs of the image represented the two divisions of the Empire, what part of the image represented the Empire before it was divided? But, says one, the Roman kingdom was not known in prophecy till it became connected with the Church, and this was about the time of the division.—This position cannot help you, brother, for certainly Rome was known in prophecy as a persecuting power centuries before this division was dreamed of; and other kingdoms are noticed in prophecy, that were much less intimately connected with the Church. And again, if we look for all this minute correspondence between the symbol, and the things represented, it would lead us to further difficulties. It would lead us to look for the feet in some divided form of government; and furthermore for the toes, five on each foot. We find nothing that would correspond with this interpretation in the former conditions of the world, nor in its condition at present. But, says the objector, we are looking for this condition to be brought about through the agency of impending revolutions. Then we must postpone the advent of our Lord for a long time certainly. But the Lord can work wonders. True, but there is no necessity for wonders in this case. It is all perfectly plain; yet if we were to look for future revolutions to develop, or create the feet and toes of Daniel's image, in the state in which this view would lead us to expect them, it would certainly be looking for a greater wonder than ever appeared in all the revolutions of the kingdoms of earth. The same principle would throw us into difficulties in regard to past events. It would lead us to look for the hands and even the fingers in the Medo-Persian kingdom.—But let us be candid, and take the most consistent course, and we shall find no difficulty.

It is evident from the nature of symbols, that the head of gold in the image, represented the Assyrian or Babylonian kingdom in a general sense, without regard to divisions, or factions; the silver represented the Medo-Persian kingdom on the same principle. The brass represented Grecia in its general features; and the iron represented Rome in a general sense, both before and after the division in the days of Constantine. The feet represented a state of things that was to succeed Rome in its original form, not exactly a separate kingdom as I shall hereafter endeavor to show, but a combination of powers united for a specific object. The toes represent ten kingdoms connected in some way with the feet. In the days of the kingdoms represented by the toes, the image shall be smitten on the FEET, and THEY shall be ground to powder; and THEN the rest of the image shall be broken in pieces according to the prophecy. We will now proceed to examine the feet and toes of the image, and ascertain whether they are to be found among the nations of the earth, and whether they are in a situation for the last great blow which is to demolish all earthly king-kingdoms.

We cannot look for the development of the feet prior to the breaking up of the Roman Empire, when the original Roman power undergoes a change which is represented by the clay. We find that this breaking up took place prior to 519. A power then arose, which is symbolized by a horn, (Dan. vii.,) which becomes prominent among the divisions of the Empire. It has been proved beyond question, by Advent writers, that this power at its commencement, is the Eastern or Greek division. It is represented as having eyes and a mouth, which denote its union with the Church. This power, in its civil capacity, is doubtless the same as that represented by the feet of the image, for both are the weakened and restricted remnant of the Roman power. The Little Horn power was made strong by its union with the Church; but no such auxiliary is noticed in the vision of the image. It is merely represented in its weakened state.

The same power is brought to view in Rev. xvii., under the symbol of a beast upon which a woman or the Church, is seated. Here we find the characteristics more clearly delineated.

In order to get a distinct understanding of this power, we must take our position with John in the "wilderness." The wilderness doubtless represents the period of time, during which the saints were in the hand of the Little Horn, which commenced when the Church and State were united in 519, and ended with the tribulation in 1779, just prior to the darkening of the sun. When this period commenced, the true Church "fled into the wilderness," where she remained during the forty and two months of persecution, while the witnesses were in sackcloth; John stands in this wilderness and bears an explanation of the beast. He is said to be the beast that was, and is not, and yet is. Of this peculiarity we shall speak hereafter. He is called a scarlet colored beast. This, doubtless has reference to his exceeding destructiveness; for under the direction of the Woman that sits upon him he has spilt the blood of from 50 to 60 millions of mankind! How truly was it said of this power, under the other symbol, that he should wear out the saints of the Most High. The next peculiarity we notice is, he had seven heads. These are explained to have a double meaning. They are called seven mountains and relate to the geographical position of the Church, or Woman. But another explanation of the seven heads is justified, we are told, by the original Greek, and also by some English versions. This explanation makes them to mean, also, seven kings. By kings we understand dynasties, or lines of kings, which gave their power to support the apostate church, or the woman seated upon the beast. These kings did not all exist at a time, nor did the beast possess all his heads at a time. This is very evident; for John from his position in the wilderness saw that five had fallen and one existed, and one was to come into existence.—It is said the beast ascends out of the bottomless pit, and goes into perdition

We find upon examination of history that seven distinct dynasties have supported the papal harlot, and executed her will in deeds of blood and crime. These are as follows.

1, the Greeks, 2, the Franks, 3, the Germans, 4, the Neapolitans, 5, the Spaniards, 6, the Austrians, 7, the French or Napoleon dynasty.

When John saw the beast, five heads had fallen; consequently, the 6th, or Austrian head was standing. It continues to uphold the papal power, or sustain the woman, until the victorious arms of Napoleon destroyed the Austrian ascendancy in Italy. Bonaparte then took upon himself the responsibility of sustaining the harlot.—But in the year 1809, the time had come for Church and State to be disunited. The 1290 years were fulfilled. Napoleon then displaced the woman from her position—he disunited church and state—he took away the civil power of the pope; and since that time, the woman, having no civil power to sustain her, has sit upon "many waters," which are explained to be "peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues." Thus were church and state disunited, but the Napoleon power was still the beast, for it was the dynasty that had once supported the harlot. But in 1815, this dynasty was crushed by the allied powers of Europe, and the beast was not. It went into nonentity. Now while it remains in the abyss, before it ascends out of the bottomless pit, preparatory to going into perdition, we will look for the development of the ten kingdoms.

The beast power, and the power represented by the feet of the image, are the same; and the ten toes must arise from this power, for they are called "the toes of the feet,". It is plain that ten kingdoms do arise from this power, because it is noticed that the beast had ten horns.

Now we find that in the year 1815, Italy, which was part of the beast power, was divided into ten small kingdoms, and these kingdoms possess all the peculiarities noticed in the ten horns of the beast, in the xvii of Rev., and also all the characteristics noticed in the toes of the image. These ten states which are 1, Sardinia, 2, Lombardo Venitian Kingdoms, 3, Parma, 4, Modena, 5, States of the church, 6, Lucca, 7, Tuscany, 8, the Kingdom of Naples, 9, San Marino, and 10, Milan, will not unite with each. They hate the harlot and are ready to make war with her at any moment; and this probably, is to be the work of Mazini, who has lately gone to Italy. They will receive power as kings, one prophetic hour with the beast, which has ascended out of the abyss, for God has put it into their hearts to fulfill his will.

A few words more upon the beast and the readiness which he is in to receive the final blow from the stone "cut out of the mountain without hands," or, what is the same, to go into perdition. He is called the beast that was, and is not, and yet is. He was, in the days of Napoleon, and in the days of previous supporters of the papal church. When the Napoleon dynasty was crushed, he was not; but in 1848 he ascended out of the bottomless pit.—The Bonaparte dynasty was revived, and all the "world wondered" Napoleon 3d is the eighth, but of the seven, he has emphatically ascended out of the abyss, and is very soon to go into perdition. He and all other nations that are allied with him are identified with the feet of the image. They are going, at the instigation of the three unclean spirits, up to the valley of Jehosephat, merely to be smitten by the "stone." There is no battle to be fought necessarily but the battle of the GREAT DAY; and no victory to be won, except one by the KING of KINGS.

Now, dear reader, we subject the foregoing thoughts to your consideration, begging that you will carefully consider them; for we feel confident that the chariot of the coming King will not be necessarily delayed for any revolution yet in the future. The feet are getting ready to be smitten, and I cannot see how this smiting can be delayed even till the coming fall. The types seem to point to the tenth of the seventh month; but let us watch that it may not overtake us as a thief.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WEST STAFFORD.

What is brotherly love? Is it to love those who believe, speak, and write, on all points according to our opinion of truth? or is it to love the image of Jesus where ever it is found? The apostle tells the Romans, (15 : 7,) to receive one another, as Christ received them, to the glory of God: and I suppose that whatever was written beforetime was written for our instruction. We will see if there was any diversity of opinion in the Roman Church.

Rom. 14, 1–6, "Him that is weak in the faith, receive, but not to doubtful disputation. For one believeth that he may eat all things; another who is weak, eateth herbs. Let not him that eateth, despise him that eateth not, and let not him which eateth not judge him that eateth; for God hath received him."

"Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? to his own master he standeth or falleth, yea he shall be holden up; for God is able to make him stand. One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. He that regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it. He that eateth, eateth to the Lord; for he giveth God thanks; and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks.

Did not Christ receive us with as great a diversity of opinion as there was in the Roman Church? Yes greater. We are differently constituted, and were differently educated. Some of us were brought up and educated by Congregationalists, some by Baptists, others by Methodists; and so on. But when we came to Jesus, He received us with all our different views.—He received us to the glory of God, and some of us have been in His school for years! and if we are true disciples, we have in all sincerity, tried to know the mind of Christ—to understand His word, as He would have us undartand it, that we might do His will, and be prepared for His coming, and Kingdom. But we have come to different conclusions after all. We have not come into the unity of the faith, the time for this has not yet arrived: nor will it until the Lord shall bring again Zion Then shall the watchmen see eye to eye; and not only the watchmen, but the people also. In the few past years, when there has been such a multitude of different and distracting views, how often has the weary pilgrim rejoiced that the time was near at hand, when the Lord would bring again Zion; and has been led to cry with the poet,

The exhortation of the apostle, I think still applicable to us; "Receive ye one another as Christ also received us, to the glory of God." Then we are to receive one another with all our different views and opinions still, for we acknowledge no Priest, Bishop, or Pope, to lord it over our consciences, or tell us what we must, or must not believe.

One believes the thousand years to be in the past; shall he receive none as brethren who see it in the future? or shall those who see it in the future acknowledge none as brethren who do not agree with them?

One believes the Lord will come in '54: another, that He is soon coming, and both are looking at the same signs in the east, to bring the long expected event. Shall each require the other to believe as he does? or denounce him as a foolish virgin? shall we not rather let brotherly love continue.

Let us take heed lest we reject some of Christ's little ones, and it be said to us in that day, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my little ones, ye have done it unto me."

We have a little more excellent advice, in the same chapter from which I have quoted, Rom. 14, 10–13, 19. "But why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at naught thy brother? for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ. For it is written, As I live saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God; so then every one of us shall give account of himself to God. Let us not therefore judge one another any more; but judge this rather, that no man put a stumbling block or an occasion to fall, in his brother's way. Let us therefore follow after the things which make for peace, and the things wherewith we may edify one another."

Yours, looking for the Lord,

E. A. BARTLETT.

Dear Brethren:—We have now entered upon that grand and awful time for which we have been looking for these 13 years past. We have watched with the deepest interest, the gradual progress of events, and the corresponding condition of the human mind, and we have not watched in vain. The words of our Saviour are fulfilled before our eyes, a fearful looking after those things that are coming on the earth everywhere exists; the last moral condition of the human mind is developed. From the king on the throne, to the beggar in the street, there is the same involuntary outburst of feeling. As a demonstration of this characteristic mark, I present you with the following from political journals. "Every observer of men and things must feel conscious that a momentous crisis in the affairs of mankind is rapidly approaching. Every thing seems trembling beneath some impending doom, some tremendous power, that is about to burst upon the world. There is little to tell us whether the coming strife will be fraught with good or evil. But that some great change, some universal transition, is near at hand, is as plainly to be felt as the sullen breath of the gathering storm.—There is an oppressive sultriness and heaviness in the moral atmosphere, a hurrying to and fro of the animate world, a clattering and clamoring, an intense energy and activity, that presage the rushing tornado, or the rumbling earthquake.—We see the giant thunder-columns towering above the horrizon, massive, sullen, and grand; and we hear the low, stifled rumble, and feel the deep, subdued quiver, beneath our feet. The sunlight assumes a sickly hue, a veil of quiet gloom envelopes the face of nature; and wherever we turn our eyes, we are greeted with the scowl of portentous preparation. All Europe is one boiling cauldron of revolutionary elements—China has long been torn and tossed by contending forces—the Indies and Southern Africa have not slept for years—Australia is a new volcanic continent over which the lava tide may sweep at any moment South America is still rolling and rocking as if shaken by an earthquake—Mexico bids fair to be swallowed up, and the United States, the land of security, trembles to its very base.

"In the absence of all proof against a great moral and political revolution, why conjure up evidence to prove what is manifest in every thing around us? We have but to look and see that a sublime change is already begun. We have but to look into the mirror of truth, and behold the shadow of the approaching reality. The education, actions, words, thought and feeling of men, all bear witness that we are tending towards a new order of things—and experience, and faith in the progressive operations of nature, tell us that it will be one far above anything ever yet realized by mankind. But the birth of the new era will not be a pangless one.—Pain, and suffering, and tears, and blood will consecrate and baptize the darling of ages. We shudder and shrink from the thought; but we yearn for the event, as parent never yet yearned for the sight of offspring."

Oh how blind the world is in regard to the character of the event which is coming. Brethren, awake, arise, "behold the Bridegroom cometh," and cometh this year.

ISAAC ADRIAN.

BRIMFIELD, JUNE 12.

"Fear not little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Fear not, ye who have sacrificed all for the truth, lest you shall come to want.—He, who regards the sparrow as he falls to the ground, He who numbers the hairs of your head, will never suffer you to want; for if there were no other means, He will send the ravens to feed you as He did Elijah. I believe it; thank the God of heaven. "Fear not," the reproach of men, nor their revilings—their day of dishonor and shame is coming: let them heap upon you their epithets, God will cause it to work for good, if we love Him. "Fear not," when manifold temptations come upon you, or when you are passing through deep waters of affliction; nor when sorrow's dark waves almost overflow you. That God that made the sun to stand still—that God that made a passage through the Red Sea—that God that will in a few days say, "it is done," will guide you safely through, until your feet are placed upon the immortal shore. "Fear not," though friends dear as life forsake you—though your brethren cast you out with the name of the majesty of heaven upon their hypocritical lips—God, Jesus Christ, the angels, and every saint under heaven is on your side. More are those that are with us, than they that are with them. "Fear not," in view of the coming conflict: it is what will bring our long looked for Messiah. Salvation is coming; rejoice, yea, rejoice ye lonely weary pilgrims, in prospect of speedy deliverance. Keep his sayings, every one that is written in the book of God. Let not your hearts be troubled; He will come and save you. The seventh vial is about to be poured out upon this guilty world; but blessed be the name of God, the little flock will be hid in that day safe in Isaiah's chambers. While the slain of the Lord will be from one end of the earth to the other, God will be the portion and safety of the "little flock," therefore do not fear. Amen and Amen.

S. M. BASSET.

CHAMPLAIN, N. Y., June 12.

Brother Merriam:—It does truly cheer my heart to hear the glorious news of my Saviour's so near approach, to take his waiting, longing children home. Praised be God, there are yet faithful watchmen on the walls of Zion that can tell us what of the night—what its signs of promise are, and whereabouts we are on our journey. Bless the Lord, there are some that can see we are coming into harbor.—Oh is it true that we are so near home? that in a few short months we shall sit down in the kingdom of God, and be permitted to drink from life's flowing river, and pluck the fruit from life's fair tree, and with immortal tongues shout the high praises of Him who has redeemed us with His own blood? Oh! while I write, I begin to feel something of that flame of love which I felt in my heart in '44; and my prayer to God is that He would fan it to a mighty flame in all our hearts, that it may burn up all the base desires of sin. Oh ye afflicted, tempted, tried ones, lift up your heads and rejoice, knowing that your redemption draweth nigh. I, with you, was one that expected to see the Lord in '44, and deeply too, did I feel the disappointment; but my trust in His word was unshaken; and while He tarried, I resolved in my soul to wait for Him. Our hope, Brethren, has long been deferred, the night has been a long and dreary one, but the morning soon cometh; very soon we shall hear the voice from the throne, saying, it is done. Oh! sinner, leave the paths of worldly folly, and turn to Christ that you may obtain admittance with all the blood washed holy band into the city of our God. May God enable us fully to do His will, that we may have a right to the tree of life, and enter in through the gates into the City.

HANNAH M. HAIR.

Great Meeting at Union Mills, Ind., June 2, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—We are having a grand and glorious meeting here. It commenced at the appointed time with a good representation of brethren from abroad. Brethren Berrick, Couch, and Howell from the East, arrived in good time, in health, strong in God, and the power of His truth. Our attendance has been large and attentive from the beginning, and the truth is sweeping all before it. All glory to God, we have at last struck the old landmark that Daniel heard about; but he did not understand, because it was closed up and sealed unto the time of the end; but the seals are off, and the book is open, and we are now eating it up. Glory to God how sweet! O it sweetens every thing; yes, and makes its own bitter sweet.

It takes hold of our ministering brethren here, like a death stroke, and a healing balm, this looks, to be sure, rather paradoxical, but you will understand it, and the rest will when they eat it.

[illegible] the Lord for what I see and feel on this subject. Sinners are converted and baptized daily; backsliders are waking up, and the people are moved as by the roaring of mighty [illegible]ings. [illegible] out strait and clear on the time of [illegible] this year, and you may ex[illegible] [h]ear my reasons soon.

[illegible] and Sister Eastman and Judkins [illegible] us, strong in faith and rejoicing [illegible] Brethren Chaplin, Clark, Sey[illegible] [illegible]ll and Stone, preachers of the [illegible] with us; and all, I believe, are [illegible] or under a solemn conviction [illegible].

I t[illegible] [i]f I became settled on time, you [illegible] from me. I am now settled in [illegible] that 1854 brings the Lord, or brings us to the year of redemption, and my faith is based on testimony that cannot be gainsaid; and it causes in me a joy that is unspeakable and full of glory. More anon. J. C. BYWATER.

PAINSPOINT, May 29, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I have had the opportunity, through the mercy of God, of listening to the last notes of warning by Brn. Burnham and Morgan here in the grove. It is cheering indeed to the lonely pilgrim to see the evidences from God's word and the signs of the times, that Michael is so soon to stand up, and every one of God's people to be delivered—that the second wo is past and the third wo so soon to come. The Savior told his people when they see the signs begin to come to pass to lift up their heads, for their redemption draweth nigh. It seems the signs are almost past; and we are looking, loving, hoping and waiting, I believe understandingly, through faith in God's word, for the consummation of our hope soon to be realized.

Yours, in hope of speedy redemption.

ROBERT CHOWN.

ROXBURY, March, 23, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I take this opportunity to express my sincere thanks to you for sending me the Crisis, and my prayer is that you may be rewarded at the resurrection of the just. I can truly say it brings glad tidings to my weary soul to think Jesus is so soon coming to deliver his tried ones. I am one who sighs for home; I long for the time to come when the enemy will no longer triumph, when the wicked will cease from troubling, and the weary will be forever at rest. I feel truly that the signs there is no mistaking proclaim our great deliverer near, when he that shall come will come and not tarry. Oh, glory be to God in the highest; if we are faithful a little while longer, we shall lay down the cross and wear the conqueror's crown.

HARRIET STODDARD.

GOFFSTOWN, N. H., June 12th, '54.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I was in Manchester last Sunday, with the brethren, and the Lord was with us in power. I baptized four happy souls, and they are now rejoicing in God. At the close of the third meeting, five more rose for prayers, and in the evening two of them spoke and told their feelings to the people. To God be all the glory. O dear brethren, time is short, what is done must be done soon. Jesus is coming in the seventh month, Jewish time, without fail; yes surely it is so; and my inquiry is, shall I be saved in the kingdom with the saints? O I want to be there. The third invitation is now given for supper; soon the door will be shut. O Lord, save the people from sin, and prepare them for the kingdom. Brethren, be faithful to God till Jesus comes, and then we shall be saved in His kingdom, Amen.

Your brother, sighing for home,

BENJAMIN P. MANNING.

A Prussian journal intimates that the grand duke Michael is expected in Wallachia, and that the Persian ambassador at St. Petersburg has demanded his passports. A Russian journal announces a new levy of troops in the kingdom of Poland—where the army is to be raised to a million of soldiers. A despatch from Vienna, dated the 13th inst., announces that the armies of Italy and Gallacia are put on a war-footing.

MORTALITY IN NEW YORK. There were 415 deaths in New York city last week; which were 105 more than in the corresponding week of 1853. Among the deaths there were twelve cases of cholera.

Air—Eden of Love.

Arouse ye, my brethren, awake from your sadness,
The Savior is coming, the kingdom is near,
Your harps tune anew with the sweet strains of gladness,
The City Jerusalem soon will be here.
The night is far spent, and the auspicious morning
Rolls onward in haste with its heralds of warning,
Your souls now with patience and meekness adoring,
Our toils will be over this year, aye, this year.

O, who, who can tell of the joys of the blest ones
That reign in eternity, holy and free;
Where naught will be heard save the warblings and rich tones
Of saints and of angels, in sweet harmony?
No more for our hope will the worldling deride us,
The bitter farewell ne'er again shall divide us,
With seraphs and saints, and Immanuel beside us,
Forever and ever; we happy shall be.

Our sighings all ended, our sins all forgiven,
Our songs of redemption in rich anthems ring;
Our Savior our joy, and his smile be our heaven,
The name of embassador changed now to King;
The cross for the crown, and the sword sheathed forever.
Bright diadems sparkling with gems from life's river
We'll cast at the feet of our glorious deliverer,
While with loud alleluias the kingdom will ring.

Then haste ye away, and repeat the glad story,
The cry, lo! He cometh! with loud echo's swell,
For ye shall soon join in the rapturous glory
Of seraphic legions, where ransomed ones dwell,
The haven of rest we are more swiftly nearing,
The promise is sure, and the prospect is all cheering,
The green fairy fields of our sweet home appearing,
I'll meet you in glory, farewell, oh farewell!

The Paris Patrie says: "The last letters from different Russian provinces announce that marked agitation prevails both in St. Petersburg and several of the neighboring towns. Trade was suffering intensely, and misery was on the increase. A recent fact strikingly illustrates both the fears of the Russian Government and its method of proceeding. A tradesman of the capital having failed, closed his shop situated in one of the most frequented quarters of the city. This circumstance, apparently so ordinary, excited a sensation, and the Government arrested the tradesman and transported him at once to Siberia for having failed at such a time, and thus betrayed the uneasy state of trade. The police found upon inquiry that the immediate cause of the failure was a claim by a nobleman for a sum of money due to him. This nobleman was fined 15,000 roubles, and ordered to leave St. Petersburg and reside on his property."

The survey for the defences from Bujuk-Tehekedji to Derkos are progressing rapidly. From the Sea of Marmora to the Black, the projected line extends for 27 miles. A lake, spread out in some seasons into a vast marsh, almost joins the sea at the Western end, and precludes for several miles all possibility of the passage of a hostile army. The water is four feet deep, and the bottom soft and muddy.

At the other extremity another lake is situated which would equally bar an enemy's passage, and between these two there is a line of undulating hill and valley, which, though destitute of any strong natural means of defence, may be made impassable by the skill of modern engineers and the bravery of its defenders. Gen. Baraguay d'Hilliers calculates that 40,000 men will be sufficient to defend it,—of whom 5,000 would watch the two extremes, and 30,000 would occupy the centre. It was considered that these lines well defended, would remain a permanent defence to Constantinople.

The exchange of couriers between London and Stockholm is very frequent. Two special messengers passed through Hamburgh on the 24th of May; one coming from London, the other from Stockholm; both were the bearers of despatches for the respective governments. Important negotiations are pending between these two courts, and they seem to be on the eve of conclusion.

DEFENCE OF ST. PETERSBURGH. Letters from St. Petersburgh, received at Vienna, state that the Czar is in a state of great dejection, approaching to bewilderment. In Vienna this feeling is pardonably attributed to the conclusion of the Austro-Prussian treaty, which it is imagined has astonished the Russian Monarch.—The same letters state that the St. Petersburg journals are permitted to mention Austria and her public with marks of contempt. According to the Russian correspondent of the Vienna Presse, writing on the 15th, the news of the bombardment of Odessa had much shaken the confidence of the people, and the severity of the police had not succeeded in improving the public feeling, as the preparations for the defence of the capital plainly show that the fall of Cronstadt is not considered beyond the bounds of possibility. Fifteen out of the seventy stone bridges which cross the Neva are to be broken down, and the granite material thrown into the river; on those remaining heavy artillery are to be placed. Four new pontoon bridges are to be constructed. The whole of the so-called Admiralty side, the Jaaskory side, and the Newsky-Prospect is to be fortified, and the magnificent buildings used as barracks. For some days before the letter was written, the Emperor had been indisposed. It is added that he is much alarmed for his highly prized fleet, "and this makes him so much out of humor."

ITALY. Letters from Turin state that a contingent of 25,000 men has been demanded from the Sardinian Government by France, for the purpose of the Eastern war. Sardinia is stated to have replied that, although quite prepared to co-operate with the Western Powers, the present state of its finances could not afford so large an increase of the army. However the contingent of recruits, which is not due till the end of November, will be called out the present month.

Garibaldi is at Nice with his family, where he will remain some time for the recovery of his health.

The Neapolitan Government has ordered the observance of the neutrality required by the Western Powers. Neapolitans are forbidden to take service as privateers.

GREECE. A private letter from Volo of the 15th mentions a fact which shows that the Greeks have not only violated all international law by the insurrection they excited in the Turkish provinces, but that they have committed the most odious cruelties. It appears that some days previous to the date of the letter just mentioned a detachment of 150 Turkish soldiers having been surprised by a division of the Greek liberators, amounting to 1500 men, took refuge in a church. The Greeks paid no respect to the sanctity of their own place of worship. They closed up every issue, set fire to the sacred edifice, and burned the Turks alive in it.

The vast merchant quarter of the city of Riga has just been leveled to the ground by order of the military authorities, who fear a landing of the Anglo-French forces. All the working part of the citizens, even women, children and old men, were set to work to dig trenches, and throw up mounds of earth at the gates of the city. As the workmen were not able to make gunboats, they have pressed of Revel and Libau.

The French force now in the Baltic consists of eight ships-of-the-line, Inflexible (flag ship), 92 guns; Duguescelon, 92 guns; Gemappes, 92; Hercule, 92; Tage, 92; Breslau, 86; Trieent, 80; Duperre, 80. Also, 4 frigates, Andromaque, 60; Poursuivant, 50; Virginie, 50; Zenolle, 50. Three steamers, Darien, 14; Souffler, 6; and Lucifer, 6. Eight other ships are daily expected to join, which will make the force of the French fleet in the Baltic 1200 guns and 14,000 men.

BROOKLYN AND NEW YORK RIOTS.—The spirit of lawlessness seems to be rampant just now. Last Sunday, Brooklyn and New York cities were disgraced by fearful riots, and the peace and sanctity of the day utterly destroyed by scenes of violence and blood. About 30 persons were wounded by pistols, clubs, &c., and about 50 Irishmen were arrested.

In N. Y. city Sunday was also a day of the most intense excitement. There was street preaching and some skirmishing during the afternoon, in different places.—During the discourse in the Park at about 4 o'clock, where some 5000 persons were assembled, an alarm of fire was given, and multitudes immediately rushed towards the fire. This being extinguished, two engine companies, which had long cherished ill will towards each other, commenced a fight. This was quelled by the police, but was afterwards renewed by the original parties, supported by several hundred partizans on either side. Thirty thousand people, it is said, lined the streets, and it required a strong police force to arrest the progress of the fight.—[Boston Traveler.

☞ It may be interesting to observe here, that, according to the last census of the Russian empire, the population was given at 60,000,000 men. This census was taken last year, and on those figures has the present conscription been based.—During 1853 there were born 962,380 male and 927,300 female children. The deaths were 1,396,840. The excess of births over deaths was, therefore, 493,340. The revenues of the state for the same year were given at 180,000,000 roubles. That amount did not, however, show the whole receipts of the government; for there are 270,000,000 roubles which, derived from the produce of domains, regalias, and various other small fiscal additions, swelled the total imperial revenue to 450,000,000 roubles. The privy purse of the Emperor was estimated at the moderate sum of 6,000,000 roubles. It must, nevertheless, be born in mind that Nicholas Roman off is under no parliamentary restriction in regard to the expenditure of the public money. Indeed, there is no such conjunctive term as "the public money" known in the Russian language. All that belongs to a Russian subject belongs also to the Emperor. His majesty is at liberty—and the law sanctions the act—to draw on his people at any moment for any sum which he may require for his own domestic use or for special national purposes.

FAMINE IN THE IONIAN ISLANDS. Recent accounts from Zante and Cephalonia, in the Ionian Islands, represent the condition of the inhabitants to be deplorable in the extreme. The currant crop, their main dependence, is cut off again, for the fourth season in succession; and all classes are involved in a common calamity, of destitution and suffering. Add to this failure of the staple crop of the islands, the Russian war and the Greek Insurrection, which have closed their usual avenues for food against them—their grain being obtained from Russian ports, and their other provisions from Turkish—and that the immense armies and navies gathered in their neighborhood are likely to absorb every thing in the provision line—and it will be readily seen that the condition of the Ionians must be deplorable and destitute indeed, unless help can be obtained from abroad.

☞ We extract the following in relation to the riots in New York and Brooklyn June 11. We understand some three or four regiments of soldiers were under arms on that day, besides an extra police force of 200 men.

"Another occurrence of much moment was the bloody riot in Brooklyn, N. Y., on Sunday, in which some thirty persons were more or less seriously injured by fire arms, stones, and clubs. The fight was between the "Know Nothings," and the Irish; the latter being, in this case, the aggressors, though excited by false reports of the intentions of their enemies to attack them. On the same day, designed by our Maker as a day of rest and devotion to religious interests, two riots occurred in New York city, between hostile fire companies, which required the strong arm of the police to suppress. The frequent recurrence of these scenes of lawlessness and violence are alarming indications of the depreciation of the moral tone of the community, and naturally fill the hearts of thoughtful men with fear and trembling for the stability of our republican institutions, since the only foundation of these is the intelligence and morality of the community."

Could language express more perfectly the idea conveyed by our Saviour, "Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth."

THE Czar Nicholas is making extraordinary preparations to receive the allied fleet, both at Cronstadt at St. Petersburgh. An ex-Alderman in New York, who has recently returned from Russia, in a communication to the Evening Post, says the Czar has fourteen hundred thousand men under arms, available at any moment.—He describes the entire population as filled with enthusiasm for the prosecution of the war, which is regarded as a sort of crusade for the defence of the Greek Church. Demidoff has already voluntarily proffered to the Emperor the gift of a million of rubles, equivalent to $750,000. Another nobleman has done the same, while the various officers in command have insisted on offering the half of their salaries.—Even the most delicate ladies in the upper classes are engaged in performing succor—[Sat. Obituary.

Died, in Shirley, May 28, Ann S., eldest daughter of Noah and Sarah T. Fairbrother, aged 6 years and 7 months. Her sickness was of 3 weeks duration, and during that time her sufferings were severe. There seemed to be something remarkable impressed on her mind at so early an age. She would often say, when asked if she wished to die, that she was "going home," and would often say she had rather die than to get well; but, as she expressed it in her child-like manner, would say, "I want the Lord to do just as he has a mind to." She acquired a great love of learning to read in the Bible; and one of her favorite chapters was the 22d of Rev. During her illness she would ask me questions concerning that "river of the water of life," spoken of in the chapter, and would often say, "I am going home to die no more, to be sick no more, I am going home in '54."

It is truly painful to think of the sufferings of our departed ones. We have now been called the fourth time to witness the death of our dear children, but we rejoice in hope of soon meeting them where separation will never more be known.

The little forms we loved so dear
Now sleep in death's embrace;
We would not call them back again
From their quiet resting place.

NOTICE. Dear Brethren,—The Lord is soon to come and judge the world in righteousness and establish his kingdom on the earth, and we have but a short time to warn our fellow men. As we are commanded to work while the day lasts, we have fitted out a Tent that will accommodate about one thousand persons for the purpose of going out into "highways and hedges" to sound the alarm; and we want to keep it in the field all the time, (if the Lord will), and do all the good we can. Therefore, those that know of a field of labor where good can be done, and wish to have a Tent Meeting, will please write to me immediately, so that I can make the necessary arrangements in order to meet the wishes of the Brethren.

BUFFALO, April 30, 1854.

Meetings of the believers in the speedy coming of Christ will be held at the hall, on the corner of Mohawk and Main sts., (entrance on Mohawk st.) three times on the Sabbath and once during the week, (Wednesday evening). Ministering Brethren are requested to make their appointments here as for other places.—All the Brethren who come this way will please call on Dr. A. Decker, at No. 293 Washington st., where they will be provided for.

Advent Brethren hold regular meetings at Lyceum Hall, in Lawrence, on Sundays, also on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday evenings.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige and save us immense labor and perplexity if they will strictly adhere to the following rules:

1. Over all communications designed to be published write, For the World's Crisis.
2. Over all communications not designed for the public write, Private.

☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞

3. At the head of all letters write the date, never failing to give the STATE, and also County, if written from the Middle, Western or Southern States.

☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞ ☞

4. Write all orders for the paper or for books on a page by itself, beginning thus, Order for the Crisis, or, Order for books, as the case may be.
5. At the close of each letter containing money write the amount, and to whom it is to be credited.
6. Be careful to write names and P. O. addresses in a legible hand.
7. In returning papers write on the paper the name and P. O. address of the person to whom it had been sent.
8. In preparing matter for the Crisis we hope our correspondents will adopt, as the most important and indispensible of all rules, the practice of commending the subject to God, praying fervently for light to be reflected on the position of the Church, and for heavenly manna to feed and nurture the little flock unto eternal life—also that sinners may be induced to flee from impending wrath, and take refuge in the ark before the deluge takes them all away.
9. Let the letters and communications be carefully read over, corrected, and, if need be re-written, punctuated and prepared for the press, so far as the writer has ability so to do. If, however, the writer does not understand punctuation, &c., the Editor is just as willing, and if possible more so, to serve the humblest member of the flock in bringing his or her sentiments and feelings before the public, as those who have been favored with higher educational advantages, provided only they write under the influence of the Spirit of God.

Painspoint, May 29, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I have had the opportunity, through the mercy of God, of listening to the last notes of warning by Brn. Burnham and Morgan here in the grove. It is cheering indeed to the lonely pilgrim to see the evidences from God's word and the signs of the times, that Michael is so soon to stand up, and every one of God's people to be delivered—that the second wo is past and the third wo so soon to come. The Savior told his people when they see the signs begin to come to pass to lift up their heads, for their redemption draweth nigh. It seems the signs are almost past; and we are looking, loving, hoping and waiting, I believe understandingly, through faith in God's word, for the consummation of our hope soon to be realized.

Yours, in hope of speedy redemption.

Robert Chown.

Roxbury, March, 23, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I take this opportunity to express my sincere thanks to you for sending me the Crisis, and my prayer is that you may be rewarded at the resurrection of the just. I can truly say it brings glad tidings to my weary soul to think Jesus is so soon coming to deliver his tried ones. I am one who sighs for home; I long for the time to come when the enemy will no longer triumph, when the wicked will cease from troubling, and the weary will be forever at rest. I feel truly that the signs there is no mistaking proclaim our great deliverer near, when he that shall come will come and not tarry. Oh, glory be to God in the highest; if we are faithful a little while longer, we shall lay down the cross and wear the conqueror's crown.

Harriet Stoddard.

Goffstown, N. H., June 12th, '54.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I was in Manchester last Sunday, with the brethren, and the Lord was with us in power. I baptized four happy souls, and they are now rejoicing in God. At the close of the third meeting, five more rose for prayers, and in the evening two of them spoke and told their feelings to the people. To God be all the glory. O dear brethren, time is short, what is done must be done soon. Jesus is coming in the seventh month, Jewish time, without fail; yes surely it is so; and my inquiry is, shall I be saved in the kingdom with the saints? O I want to be there. The third invitation is now given for supper; soon the door will be shut. O Lord, save the people from sin, and prepare them for the kingdom. Brethren, be faithful to God till Jesus comes, and then we shall be saved in His kingdom, Amen.

Your brother, sighing for home,

Benjamin P. Manning.

☞ Bro. J. French is authorized to receive money for the Office of the Crisis, so that Brethren at the Tent Meetings in Maine, which he may attend, can forward their money by him if they please. Ed.

☞ Some account of the Tent Meeting in Westfield, Mass., may be expected next week.

A Prussian journal intimates that the grand duke Michael is expected in Wallachia, and that the Persian ambassador at St. Petersburg has demanded his passports. A Russian journal announces a new levy of troops in the kingdom of Poland—where the army is to be raised to a million of soldiers. A despatch from Vienna, dated the 13th inst., announces that the armies of Italy and Gallacia are put on a war-footing.

Mortality in New York. There were 415 deaths in New York city last week; which were 105 more than in the corresponding week of 1853. Among the deaths there were twelve cases of cholera.

Air—Eden of Love.

Arouse ye, my brethren, awake from your sadness,
The Savior is coming, the kingdom is near,
Your harps tune anew with the sweet strains of gladness,
The City Jerusalem soon will be here.
The night is far spent, and the auspicious morning
Rolls onward in haste with its heralds of warning,
Your souls now with patience and meekness adoring,
Our toils will be over this year, aye, this year.

O, who, who can tell of the joys of the blest ones
That reign in eternity, holy and free;
Where naught will be heard save the warblings and rich tones
Of saints and of angels, in sweet harmony?
No more for our hope will the worldling deride us,
The bitter farewell ne'er again shall divide us,
With seraphs and saints, and Immanuel beside us,
Forever and ever; we happy shall be.

Our sighings all ended, our sins all forgiven,
Our songs of redemption in rich anthems ring;
Our Savior our joy, and his smile be our heaven,
The name of embassador changed now to King;
The cross for the crown, and the sword sheathed forever.
Bright diadems sparkling with gems from life's river
We'll cast at the feet of our glorious deliverer,
While with loud alleluias the kingdom will ring.

Then haste ye away, and repeat the glad story,
The cry, lo! He cometh! with loud echo's swell,
For ye shall soon join in the rapturous glory
Of seraphic legions, where ransomed ones dwell,
The haven of rest we are more swiftly nearing,
The promise is sure, and the prospect is all cheering,
The green fairy fields of our sweet home appearing,
I'll meet you in glory, farewell, oh farewell!

The Paris Patrie says: "The last letters from different Russian provinces announce that marked agitation prevails both in St. Petersburg and several of the neighboring towns. Trade was suffering intensely, and misery was on the increase. A recent fact strikingly illustrates both the fears of the Russian Government and its method of proceeding. A tradesman of the capital having failed, closed his shop situated in one of the most frequented quarters of the city. This circumstance, apparently so ordinary, excited a sensation, and the Government arrested the tradesman and transported him at once to Siberia for having failed at such a time, and thus betrayed the uneasy state of trade. The police found upon inquiry that the immediate cause of the failure was a claim by a nobleman for a sum of money due to him. This nobleman was fined 15,000 roubles, and ordered to leave St. Petersburg and reside on his property."

The survey for the defences from Bujuk-Tehekedji to Derkos are progressing rapidly. From the Sea of Marmora to the Black, the projected line extends for 27 miles. A lake, spread out in some seasons into a vast marsh, almost joins the sea at the Western end, and precludes for several miles all possibility of the passage of a hostile army. The water is four feet deep, and the bottom soft and muddy.

At the other extremity another lake is situated which would equally bar an enemy's passage, and between these two there is a line of undulating hill and valley, which, though destitute of any strong natural means of defence, may be made impassable by the skill of modern engineers and the bravery of its defenders. Gen. Baraguay d'Hilliers calculates that 40,000 men will be sufficient to defend it,—of whom 5,000 would watch the two extremes, and 30,000 would occupy the centre. It was considered that these lines well defended, would remain a permanent defence to Constantinople.

The exchange of couriers between London and Stockholm is very frequent. Two special messengers passed through Hamburgh on the 24th of May; one coming from London, the other from Stockholm; both were the bearers of despatches for the respective governments. Important negotiations are pending between these two courts, and they seem to be on the eve of conclusion.

Defence of St. Petersburgh. Letters from St. Petersburgh, received at Vienna, state that the Czar is in a state of great dejection, approaching to bewilderment. In Vienna this feeling is pardonably attributed to the conclusion of the Austro-Prussian treaty, which it is imagined has astonished the Russian Monarch.—The same letters state that the St. Petersburg journals are permitted to mention Austria and her public with marks of contempt. According to the Russian correspondent of the Vienna Presse, writing on the 15th, the news of the bombardment of Odessa had much shaken the confidence of the people, and the severity of the police had not succeeded in improving the public feeling, as the preparations for the defence of the capital plainly show that the fall of Cronstadt is not considered beyond the bounds of possibility. Fifteen out of the seventy stone bridges which cross the Neva are to be broken down, and the granite material thrown into the river; on those remaining heavy artillery are to be placed. Four new pontoon bridges are to be constructed. The whole of the so-called Admiralty side, the Janskory side, and the Newsky-Prospect is to be fortified, and the magnificent buildings used as barracks. For some days before the letter was written, the Emperor had been indisposed. It is added that he is much alarmed for his highly prized fleet, "and this makes him so much out of humor."

Italy. Letters from Turin state that a contingent of 25,000 men has been demanded from the Sardinian Government by France, for the purpose of the Eastern war. Sardinia is stated to have replied that, although quite prepared to co-operate with the Western Powers, the present state of its finances could not afford so large an increase of the army. However the contingent of recruits, which is not due till the end of November, will be called out the present month.

Garibaldi is at Nice with his family, where he will remain some time for the recovery of his health.

The Neapolitan Government has ordered the observance of the neutrality required by the Western Powers. Neapolitans are forbidden to take service as privateers.

Greece. A private letter from Volo of the 15th mentions a fact which shows that the Greeks have not only violated all international law by the insurrection they excited in the Turkish provinces, but that they have committed the most odious cruelties. It appears that some days previous to the date of the letter just mentioned a detachment of 150 Turkish soldiers having been surprised by a division of the Greek liberators, amounting to 1500 men, took refuge in a church. The Greeks paid no respect to the sanctity of their own place of worship. They closed up every issue, set fire to the sacred edifice, and burned the Turks alive in it.

The vast merchant quarter of the city of Riga has just been leveled to the ground by order of the military authorities, who fear a landing of the Anglo-French forces. All the working part of the citizens, even women, children and old men, were set to work to dig trenches, and throw up mounds of earth at the gates of the city. As the workmen were not able to make gunboats, they have pressed of Revel and Libau.

The French force now in the Baltic consists of eight ships-of-the-line, Inflexible (flag ship), 92 guns; Duguescelon, 92 guns; Gemappes, 92; Hercule, 92; Tage, 92; Breslau, 86; Trleent, 80; Duperre, 80. Also, 4 frigates, Andromaque, 60; Poursuivant, 50; Virginie, 50; Zenolle, 50. Three steamers, Darien, 14; Souffler, 6; and Lucifer, 6. Eight other ships are daily expected to join, which will make the force of the French fleet in the Baltic 1200 guns and 14,000 men.

Brooklyn and New York Riots.—The spirit of lawlessness seems to be rampant just now. Last Sunday, Brooklyn and New York cities were disgraced by fearful riots, and the peace and sanctity of the day utterly destroyed by scenes of violence and blood. About 30 persons were wounded by pistols, clubs, &c., and about 50 Irishmen were arrested.

In N. Y. city Sunday was also a day of the most intense excitement. There was street preaching and some skirmishing during the afternoon, in different places.—During the discourse in the Park at about 4 o'clock, where some 5000 persons were assembled, an alarm of fire was given, and multitudes immediately rushed towards the fire. This being extinguished, two engine companies, which had long cherished ill will towards each other, commenced a fight. This was quelled by the police, but was afterwards renewed by the original parties, supported by several hundred partizans on either side. Thirty thousand people, it is said, lined the streets, and it required a strong police force to arrest the progress of the fight.—[Boston Traveler.

☞ It may be interesting to observe here, that, according to the last census of the Russian empire, the population was given at 60,000,000 men. This census was taken last year, and on those figures has the present conscription been based.—During 1853 there were born 962,380 male and 927,300 female children. The deaths were 1,396,840. The excess of births over deaths was, therefore, 493,340. The revenues of the state for the same year were given at 180,000,000 roubles. That amount did not, however, show the whole receipts of the government; for there are 270,000,000 roubles which, derived from the produce of domains, regalias, and various other small fiscal additions, swelled the total imperial revenue to 450,000,000 roubles. The privy purse of the Emperor was estimated at the moderate sum of 6,000,000 roubles. It must, nevertheless, be born in mind that Nicholas Romanoff is under no parliamentary restriction in regard to the expenditure of the public money. Indeed, there is no such conjunctive term as "the public money" known in the Russian language. All that belongs to a Russian subject belongs also to the Emperor. His majesty is at liberty—and the law sanctions the act—to draw on his people at any moment for any sum which he may require for his own domestic use or for special national purposes.

Famine in the Ionian Islands. Recent accounts from Zante and Cephalonia, in the Ionian Islands, represent the condition of the inhabitants to be deplorable in the extreme. The currant crop, their main dependence, is cut off again, for the fourth season in succession; and all classes are involved in a common calamity, of destitution and suffering. Add to this failure of the staple crop of the islands, the Russian war and the Greek Insurrection, which have closed their usual avenues for food against them—their grain being obtained from Russian ports, and their other provisions from Turkish—and that the immense armies and navies gathered in their neighborhood are likely to absorb every thing in the provision line—and it will be readily seen that the condition of the Ionians must be deplorable and destitute indeed, unless help can be obtained from abroad.

☞ We extract the following in relation to the riots in New York and Brooklyn June 11. We understand some three or four regiments of soldiers were under arms on that day, besides an extra police force of 200 men.

"Another occurrence of much moment was the bloody riot in Brooklyn, N. Y, on Sunday, in which some thirty persons were more or less seriously injured by fire arms, stones, and clubs. The fight was between the "Know Nothings," and the Irish; the latter being, in this case, the aggressors, though excited by false reports of the intentions of their enemies to attack them. On the same day, designed by our Maker as a day of rest and devotion to religious interests, two riots occurred in New York city, between hostile fire companies, which required the strong arm of the police to suppress. The frequent recurrence of these scenes of lawlessness and violence are alarming indications of the depreciation of the moral tone of the community, and naturally fill the hearts of thoughtful men with fear and trembling for the stability of our republican institutions, since the only foundation of these is the intelligence and morality of the community."

Could language express more perfectly the idea conveyed by our Saviour, "Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth."

The Czar Nicholas is making extraordinary preparations to receive the allied fleet, both at Cronstadt at St. Petersburgh. An ex-Alderman in New York, who has recently returned from Russia, in a communication to the Evening Post, says the Czar has fourteen hundred thousand men under arms, available at any moment.—He describes the entire population as filled with enthusiasm for the prosecution of the war, which is regarded as a sort of crusade for the defence of the Greek Church. Demidoff has already voluntarily proffered to the Emperor the gift of a million of rubles, equivalent to $750,000. Another nobleman has done the same, while the various officers in command have insisted on offering the half of their salaries.—Even the most delicate ladies in the upper classes are engaged in performing succor—[Sat. Obituary.

Died, in Shirley, May 28, Ann S, eldest daughter of Noah and Sarah T. Fairbrother, aged 6 years and 7 months. Her sickness was of 3 weeks duration, and during that time her sufferings were severe. There seemed to be something remarkable impressed on her mind at so early an age. She would often say, when asked if she wished to die, that she was "going home," and would often say she had rather die than to get well; but, as she expressed it in her child-like manner, would say, "I want the Lord to do just as he has a mind to." She acquired a great love of learning to read in the Bible; and one of her favorite chapters was the 22d of Rev. During her illness she would ask me questions concerning that "river of the water of life," spoken of in the chapter, and would often say, "I am going home to die no more, to be sick no more, I am going home in '54."

It is truly painful to think of the sufferings of our departed ones. We have now been called the fourth time to witness the death of our dear children, but we rejoice in hope of soon meeting them where separation will never more be known.

The little forms we loved so dear
Now sleep in death's embrace;
We would not call them back again
From their quiet resting place.

Therefore, those that know of a field of labor where good can be done, and wish to have a Tent Meeting, will please write to me immediately, so that I can make the necessary arrangements in order to meet the wishes of the Brethren.

Buffalo, April 30, 1854.

Meetings of the believers in the speedy coming of Christ will be held at the hall, on the corner of Mohawk and Main sts., (entrance on Mohawk st.) three times on the Sabbath and once during the week, (Wednesday evening). Ministering Brethren are requested to make their appointments here as for other places.—All the Brethren who come this way will please call on Dr. A. Decker, at No. 293 Washington st., where they will be provided for.

Advent Brethren hold regular meetings at Lyceum Hall, in Lawrence, on Sundays, also on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday evenings.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige and save us immense labor and perplexity if they will strictly adhere to the following rules:

1. Over all communications designed to be published write, For the World's Crisis.

2. Over all communications not designed for he public write, Private.

3. At the head of all letters write the date, never failing to give the STATE, and also County, if written from the Middle, Western or Southern States.

4. Write all orders for the paper or for books on a page by itself, beginning thus, Order for the Crisis, or, Order for books, as the case may be.

5. At the close of each letter containing money write the amount, and to whom it is to be credited.

6. Be careful to write names and P. O. addresses in a legible hand.

7. In returning papers write on the paper the name and P. O. address of the person to whom it had been sent.

8. In preparing matter for the Crisis we hope our correspondents will adopt, as the most important and indispensible of all rules, the practice of commending the subject to God, praying fervently for light to be reflected on the position of the Church, and for heavenly manna to feed and nurture the little flock unto eternal life—also that sinners may be induced to flee from impending wrath, and take refuge in the ark before the deluge takes them all away.

9. Let the letters and communications be carefully read over, corrected, and, if need be re-written, punctuated and prepared for the press, so far as the writer has ability so to do. If, however, the writer does not understand punctuation, &c., the Editor is just as willing, and if possible more so, to serve the humblest member of the flock in bringing his or her sentiments and feelings before the public, as those who have been favored with higher educational advantages, provided only they write under the influence of the Spirit of God.

Pilgrim.

Pilgrim—the night is dark, and dreary,
But over yonder mountain's height
One glimmering star shines on to cheer thee,
Gilding thy path with welcome light;
And in the East the purple dawning
Portends a speedy, beauteous day,
Yes Pilgrim, hail the coming morning,
The night shades quickly hie away.

What though the tear-drops still do linger
Within thy kindly beaming eye,
For some ungrateful, reckless wanderer,
Jesus will wipe those tears away;
What though the bosom heaves with sorrow
O'er loved ones thou hast warn'd in vain,
Trust still in God, a brighter morrow
Will bring release from care, and pain.

Deck thy calm brow with wreaths of kindness,
Scatter thy blessings all around;
The sunshine wins more hearts from blindness
Than Sinai's thunders' threat'ning sound,
O plume thy wings for life and glory,
For brighter scenes lie just before,
Than ere was told in song, or story,
On Eden's fair immortal shore.

Rejoice, the term of thy probation
Within thy prison home, ends here;
And Jesus with a full salvation
Comes, the lone pilgrim's heart to cheer;
Then once more from the bending willows
Take down thy long neglected harp,
And warble forth thy sweetest sonnet
'Till hope inspires the loneliest heart.

O let it ring in joyful praises;
For Zion's King returns this year;
We'll walk no more earth's dreary mazes,
When our deliverer shall appear;
All glory, honor be to Jesus,
The sinner's glorious, heavenly friend;
He comes to comfort, comes to save us;
Loud hallelujahs to the Lamb.

VESTA N. CUDWORTH.

CORRESPONDENCE.

GOSHEN, N. H., April 4, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I am disposed to bring in my testimony in favor of the Lord's speedy coming. Holy writ seems to me to be plain on this point. The Lord says he will come, "and will not tarry." He saith, "Surely I come quickly." "But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only." Now let us believe this just as it reads; let us not add to, or take from.—Let us read further;—"But as the days of Noah were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. For as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day when Noah entered into the ark; and knew not until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. Therefore, be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh." Oh how blessed, and happy that servant will be, whom his Lord, when he cometh shall find so doing! "But and if that evil servant shall say in his heart, My Lord delayeth his coming; and shall begin to smite his fellow servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken; the Lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of, and shall cut him asunder, and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites and unbelievers; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." Let us not be found fighting against God, when Jesus comes. "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God!" Just prior to Christ's coming, we are told, that "There shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud, with power and great glory. And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh." These things are plain, and easy to be understood by the spiritually minded. God, by the mouth of his holy Prophet, Daniel, says; "The wicked shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand; "But the wise shall understand." Paul says; "But ye, Brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief." If we are not of the night, nor of darkness, then, "let us not sleep, as do others, but let us watch and be sober."—And in this "trying time," let us put on the "whole armor of God," that we may be able to fight manfully the "battles of the Lord;" remembering always, that it is not by might, "nor by power of man," but by the Spirit of God, that the work is accomplished. I rejoice that the wicked will soon "cease from troubling, and the weary children of God are soon to be at rest," not for a night, but forever and ever. Seeing then, that we are looking for these things, "what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness.

The story of Noah and the flood is no fiction. At length the long expected day arrived to show that his declarations to the children of men were not in vain. The wicked world scoffed, they exulted, and they mocked the man of God, while he was faithfully warning them of their approaching destruction. But they mocked on still, they laughed him to scorn, and they derided him! "And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. And it repented the Lord that He had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart. And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created, from the face of the earth; both man and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air; for it repenteth me that I have made them." "But Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord; for he was a just man, and upright in his generation, and he walked with God. And God looked upon the earth, and behold it was corrupt. And God said unto Noah, the end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and behold, I will destroy them with the earth." And God made his word good to Noah, and also to the wicked antediluvians. The tremendous morning came; the heavens gathered blackness, the lightnings flashed, and the thunders rolled over the world! Word was spread, that Noah and his family had entered into the ark; then the world began to look serious!—Presently, floods of water poured from the clouds of heaven. The wicked now begin to turn their eyes towards Noah's ark; some stand doubting; others still scoffing. The waters continue to increase, day by day. Soon the channels of the rivers are full to overflowing. Soon the cities and the villages are all inundated, and some of the inhabitants hasten to the surrounding hills; and others in the paleness of death are seen making their way towards the ark! But it is too late!! Time was when the ark was open, and they might have entered in, but that time is past!—Where are now those tongues which derided the enormous ark, and the man of God who made it? They doubtless had heaped upon Noah for more than a century the character of a fool and a madman. But would they not, (if they could,) give a thousand worlds for his condition now!—The waters roar; the ark is taken up; they sink, and are seen no more! That blessed family are safe now. They sail over the heads of their revilers and persecutors. And now it is my humble opinion that similar terrors will seize an unbelieving world when the Son of man appears. "As it was in the days of Noah, so shall the coming of the Son of man be. For as in the days which were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered the ark, and knew not until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall the coming of the Son of man be." When we reflect on the wretched antediluvians, we perceive their folly in not believing God, and are ready to say with the Jews, if we had lived in their days, we should not have done as they did. But poor sinners repeat the same folly now! God has told them that He will destroy the world; and to convince them that the destruction is coming, He has set forth a spiritual ark. He has sent out preachers of righteousness to warn them of approaching danger. The circumstances are very similar; the destruction is as certain; and it is very near; and there is no escape but in the ark. Still sinners will not believe. They spend their precious time in worldly pursuits, and scoffing at the serious work of real christians, and in contemning the ark of Christ's salvation. Greater madness and inconsistency never existed before the flood, than is practiced at the present day! I can truly say that I believe the time will soon come, when christians will not be deemed madmen, or insane for their concern to secure an interest in Christ. When it will appear that the servants of God did not believe, and labor, and bear reproach in vain. The time is coming, when they who are now as secure, as bold, as hard hearted as those stupid wretches before the flood, would give ten thousand worlds, if they had them, for the place of the meanest Christian whom they now despise. O, sinners, hypocrites, and nominal professors, if you will believe God in season, now is your time to avoid the terrors of that day! rush to the ark and make sure of salvation by believing in the Lord Jesus Christ.—By all the solemnities of that coming scene I entreat, I beseech you to hasten into the ark. Come, for the floods are rising. Come quickly, or the next hour, or the next moment even, may be forever too late! Dear Brother, "Cry aloud, spare not; lift up thy voice like a trumpet; shew my people their transgressions, and the house of Jacob their sins."

Yours in the faith of Christ's speedy coming.

SOUTH BEND, May 21, 1854.

Dear Bro. Merriam: I do rejoice that I hear the Lord is doing a great work in many places, and souls are being converted to God. I can say for one, that I bless the Lord for the Crisis; it is an ever welcome messenger to me. I take a great satisfaction in perusing its contents. The spirit it manifests meets my approbation. Instead of contention and strife, it is love, peace and unity. My prayer is that God may protect it from controversy and vain strivings, and that he may guide and direct all that write for the Crisis, in spreading the truth for the benefit of its readers. I am looking and confidently expecting the blessed King in his beauty to reign on earth this year. Oh, how blessed to contemplate the coming of Jesus so soon, attended by the bright, shining ones, and the dead awaking to life, and Angels descending to gather the saints home! Oh may we not be "of little faith," but step out on the truth as we see it advanced, independent of the scoffs of the world, have faith in God's word, watch and pray, and live so that our lives may tell for truth and God. That the spirit of our blessed Redeemer may lead us into all truth, is the prayer of your unworthy sister in Christ.

SO. SANGERVILLE, ME., March 13, 1854.

Brother Merrian:—As it ever cheers the hearts of the true and faithful to learn of the welfare of the church, in these last moments of time, I would say we are making some advancement in this place, by believing and obeying God, and His written word, and going out to meet the Bridegroom. The first Advent preaching in this place, was a course of lectures by Bro. Hemmenway, some 18 months ago. Tho' met by opposition from all quarters, there were SOME to receive it, and since that time the strong-holds of Satan have been giving way, and the good cause progressing. We have had some considerable addition to our numbers this winter, under the labors of some of God's faithful and fearless servants, who have not "shunned to declare the whole counsel of God.—Several have "turned from nature's darkness into the astonishing and marvelous light of the gospel." The interest here in meetings is good. When the question is asked, if we believe the Lord is coming this year? we can all as one, say yes.—And to the evidence presented to prove it, we can respond Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

The Crisis comes to us a welcome messenger, and is well adapted to our wants, to cheer us on our pilgrimage, and furnish us with useful information. May it carry the warning note of mercy to many poor, perishing souls, and be heeded by them, while there is room to repent. O! I am glad I ever heard the midnight Cry. I am glad I am living to hear the gospel preached in its native, pure and simple state.—To be living now is glorious indeed! I love the contest, for I expect it will soon be over; when all the children, the dear children will be gathered into the Kingdom, no more to go out forever. May God keep us by His unerring counsel, that we may be presented to the Father, "without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing," is my prayer continually, Amen.

Yours, going home this year.

MIDDLEBURY, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I can say that the Crisis has been a great advantage to me; while I am perusing its columns, it makes me rejoice, and I pray God that He will send His spirit with it wherever it goes. O Brethren, it is time we were up and doing. Soon we shall be brought before the bar of God, there to give a strict account of the deeds done in the body.—We can see that the nations are getting angry, and God's wrath is come, and shall we be able to stand? Let us strive to have our loins girt about with truth, so when Christ shall appear we can say, "lo this is our God, we have waited for Him, and He will save us." When I hear my Brethren bring out the sacred word to show that Jesus will come this year, my heart responds, "even so, come, Lord Jesus." Then shall I see the friends that are lying in their dusty beds, which have fallen asleep in Jesus. Oh blessed morn! the morn that brings immortality—the morn the saints are to "take the Kingdom and possess it forever, even forever and ever." Oh glory to God, we have got almost home; soon our trials will be over, soon the last tear will be shed, then we shall sing the song of the redeemed.

Yours in hope of immortality,

JAMES RICHARDSON.

PROPHETIC PERIODS—1260, 1290, 1335 Years of Daniel and John.

The daily sacrifice taken away, and the Abomination of Desolation set up, or the Saints given unto the hand of the Little Horn.........519.

1260 years of tribulation.—Rev. 11: 2, 3, and 12: 6, 14, and 13: 5. The sun darkened May 19, 1780, to show its termination. 1779.

1290 years, or time times and the dividing of time—or time times and a part, in which the TIMES and LAWS are in the hands of the Little Horn. 1809. Napoleon takes away the civil power of the Little Horn.

Fall of the Stars 1833.

1335 years, reaching from the setting up of the Abomination of Desolation, or the time when the Saints' times and laws were given into the hand of the Little Horn, to the end, when Daniel with all the Saints will stand in their lot..........1854.

THE END.

☞ The above Diagram is designed to illustrate the measurement of time from the rise of the little horn, with eyes and a mouth (the civil power of the Greek Empire, or Eastern Rome incorporated with the Ecclesiastical Power of the Papacy.—Dan 7: 8) until the coming of Christ at the resurrection of the saints.

The 1290 years, or time, times and the dividing of time, (Dan 7: 25) measure the period during which the saints, times and laws were to be given into his hand—The period of the saint's tribulation, we understand, were shortened to 1260 years, (Rev. 12: 6, 14—11. 2 and 13: 5); but times and laws were to remain in his hand during 1290 years, extending 30 years beyond the 1260. "But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion to consume and destroy unto the end." 45 years from the close of the 1290 make 1335 years, when Daniel will stand in his lot, which must be at the resurrection of the saints.

Christ, speaking of this desolating power—the papacy—says. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened,"—which marks a point previous to which the saints were taken out of the hands of the little horn power. Thus we perceive that 1260 years of the 1335 ended prior to the 19th of May, 1780, when the sun was darkened. Add 75 years to 1260 and you have 1335 years, which must end before May 19th, 1855, according to the evidence from the darkening of the sun. But we have abundant historical evidence that the papal power, i. e. the abomination that maketh desolate, was set up in 519, hence the 1335 days (years) end in 1854, which brings the coming of the Lord and the resurrection of the saints the present year.

PLAINVILLE, ONON. CO., N. Y.

Dear Brother Merriam:—We are still striving for the kingdom in this place, though I am afraid that some will not be thorough enough in duty; for it is a warfare in these last days, and requires great energy to stem the torrent of opposition. "Through tribulation deep, the way to glory is." We shall have to keep our eye out for the rocks and sand bars, as we are about to enter the harbor of eternal rest. I hope that the children of God will remember the words of Holy Writ, (viz.) "My grace is sufficient for thee:" and thereby cling to God and His blessed word, and so live that we may meet in the kingdom of God.

Your unworthy Brother, looking for immortality and an immortal Kingdom soon.

JOHN T. ONGLEY.

ROCKLAND, ME., 1854.

Dear Brethren:—THE LORD IS COMING! The very thought, when cherished, inspires a gladness—a degree of satisfaction, and an earnest desire to know the will of the good Lord, that we may be enabled to do it, and to be found of Him in peace.

Let us faithfully endeavor to convince our neighbors and acquaintances of the truht—the present truth—the sanctifying truth, which, if believed, will ensure our salvation!—but if disbelieved, will prove our destruction!! We can accomplish much, either for or against the cause of Christ. May the Lord help us that we may endure only a little while longer!—I never felt so peaceful within—so free from excitement of any kind—so much like lying passive in the hands of the Lord, and I truly think that we are just about to enter in to the kingdom of God. Hallelujah! Amen.

JOEL S. RICHARDS.

NORTHFIELD, MASS, 1854.

Dear Brethren and Sisters, "scattered abroad,"—As we are fast approaching the day when the Lord will judge this ungodly world, I feel as though I wanted to say a word of comfort to the weary pilgrims. Brethren and Sisters, when I think what awaits God's children, it encourages me to hold on to the arm of the Lord, which is strong; and I rely on his blessed promises, which send so many comforts to my waiting soul. Brethren, it is a blessed consideration to me that this year will speak our troubles ended. Glory to God on high for his marvelous light. The word says that we are not "Children of the night, but of the day; therefore let us not sleep as do others, but let us watch and be sober." We must remember that "if we deny Him, he will also deny us." God grant that we may so live here that when the Master comes to number his jewels, we may be of that number. There are many, at the present day, that profess to "know God, but in works deny him." I would say to such, beware, "lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping;" but "watch thou in all things," "endure hardness" as good soldiers, "for in that he himself hath suffered being tempted, he is able to succor them that are tempted.—Seeing that God is able to deliver out of all our trials and temptations, let us not cast away our confidence which hath great recompense of reward; for ye have need of patience, that after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise.—For yet a little while and He that shall come will, come and will not tarry. Praise God, that he will come, and come this year.—Yes, I believe that those that are ready, will realize what it is to sit down to the marriage supper of the Lamb. "Wherefore gird up the loins of your minds, be sober, and hope to the end; for the grace that is to be brought unto you, at the revelation of Jesus Christ; as obedient children, not fashioning yourselves according to the former lusts in your ignorance; but as He which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation.' Amen.

In the world to come, the inhabitants shall no more say, I am sick.

"We'll gladly exchange a world like this,
Where death triumphant reigns;
For a beautiful home in that land of bliss,
Where all is happiness, joy and peace,
And nothing can enter that pains.
There is no more sorrow, and no more night,
For the darkness shall pass away,
The crucified Lamb is its glorious light,
And the saints shall walk with him in white,
In that happy endless day."

"Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire, shall be dissolved; and the elements shall melt with fervent heat! Nevertheless, we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."—My prayer is, "Come, Lord Jesus," come QUICKLY. Amen.

Yours, waiting for the Lord this year.

A. J. SMITH.

WARE, April 30, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—What a glorious thought, that we are going home this year to die no more! Can it be possible that we are so near our journey's end? Oh how watchful and prayerful ought we to be, abstaning from all appearance of evil, that we quench not the spirit. Laying up in store for ourselves a good foundation against the time to come, that we may lay hold on eternal life. That we may study to shew ourselves approved unto God. I sometimes fear I shall not be able to gain a seat in the kingdom, but when I feel sad and desponding, I can go to my Saviour, and He will remove all doubts and fears. Some people say if Christ were upon earth that they might converse with Him, they would esteem it a privilege. Thank God we can go to Him, and talk with Him, and He will hear and answer our requests, if we only go in faith, believing. I should have no desire to stay in this poor sin-cursed earth, if it were not for the hope I have of soon seeing Jesus, and being made like Him. Oh what a responsibility rests upon us to clear our skirts from the blood of sinners, and to warn our friends of the approaching danger, for the Lord is certainly coming. Oh can there not be some more souls saved? May the Lord bless His children, and keep them safe till His appearing, is the prayer of your unworthy sister in the Lord.

MARY.

DEMONT, ME., 1854.

Brother Merriam:—I thank God that I have heard the midnight cry; it prompts me to duty, and has caused me to search the word of the living God. I find as follows: "pure religion and undefiled before God and the fathers, is this, to visit the fatherless, and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." 1 John 3: 17. "But whoso hath this world's goods and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him." Matt. 5: 42.—"Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away." Luke 12: 33. "Sell that ye have and give alms; provide yourselves bags which wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that faileth not, where no thief approacheth, neither moth corrupted, for where our treasure is, there will our hearts be also." Luke 6: 30-34. "Give to every man that asketh of thee; and of him that taketh away thy goods ask them not again. And as ye would that men should do to you do ye also to them likewise. And if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to secure what thank have ye?—for sinners also lend to sinners to receive as much again." Luke 3: 11. "He answereth and saith unto them, he th[illegible] two coats, let him impart to him th[illegible] none; and he that hath meat let him [illegible] wise." Luke 11: 41. "But rath[illegible] alms of such things as ye have; a[illegible] hold, all things are clean unto you." [illegible] 10: 11. "Then Jesus beholding h[illegible] ed him, and said unto him, one thi[illegible] lackest: go thy way, sell whatsoe[illegible] hast, and give to the poor, and [illegible] have treasures in heaven: and c[illegible] up the cross, and follow me." [illegible] 21. "Then Jesus said unto hi[illegible] wilt be perfect, go and sell tha[illegible] and give to the poor, and th[illegible] a treasure in heaven: and c[illegible] fol-low me." James 2: 15, 16[illegible] or sister be naked, and d[illegible] ly food, and one of you say [illegible] them depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled;—notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body what doth it profit?" Matt. 6: 19. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal." 1 Tim. 6: 17, 18. "Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God who giveth us richly all things to enjoy: that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate."

I hope we all shall discharge our duty in relation to this important point, we cannot tell how much good may be done if the wants of the needy are supplied. I render sincere thanks to God for the present truth, and the Brethren for instruction.

GILMAN L. HAMMONS.

NORTH PALERMO, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—It is with pleasure that I improve the present opportunity to say to you, that I am still looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ. O how it cheers our hearts to know that we have almost attained to the consummation of our hope. Blessed be God that He has given us His word to be a light to our feet, and a lamp to our path in these last perilous times. How careful we ought to be that every step we take here is pointed out by light from the word of God.

It has been a source of rejoicing to me that God is making use of so many means to send the last notes of warning to this doomed world, and more especially for light that shines out from the pages of the Crisis, for I believe it is one of the most effectual messengers that could have been sent out by the Church. The wide-spread circulation, and the eagerness with which it is sought, are evidences of this fact which cannot be misunderstood. My prayer to God is, that you may have wisdom to direct you in the right discharge of all the duties devolving on you; and also that the brethren and sisters may still hold up your hands, and cause the last message to be faithfully proclaimed.

Yours in hope, expecting deliverence this year.

A. B. GRANT.

SOUTH CHINA, ME., April 26th, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—I do believe with all my heart that "the Lord himself will descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: And the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord." This, I do believe, will take place in a few weeks. O praise the Lord, I do look with delight to that day of rest, when I, with all God's saints if we prove faithful, and hold out to the end, shall have a right to the tree of life, eat, and live forever. O glory be to God; I do feel that I am a pilgrim and a stranger in this land of woe. When I see so many falling away, I think there will be but few saved. O how it stands us in hand to be ready. I pray that we might be kept from this hour of temptation. My heart is glad to think that Jesus is so nigh, and I will wait with patience, bearing the reproach for Christ's sake. As the Jews stumbled at Christ's first Advent, so the Gentiles will stumble at His second Advent. They thought that Christ would come as a great King, and the reason why they did not receive Him was, because He did not come in the manner they expected, and because they rejected Christ, He also rejected them, and so it will be at His second Advent. O may the Lord help us to take heed to the sure word of prophecy, as to a light that shineth in a dark place. I would warn sinners to flee from the wrath to come, and lay hold on eternal life, for the Lord is coming out of His place to destroy the wicked.

Yours, hoping soon to see the Lord.

THE WORLD'S CRISIS,

PUBLISHED FOR GRATUITOUS CIRCULATION, BY BELIEVERS IN THE SPEEDY COMING OF JESUS CHRIST.

S. J. VARNEY, Printer, . . . 27 Central St.

☞ All communications, letters, &c., should be directed to "Jonas Merriam, Editor of the World's Crisis, Lowell, Mass."

☞ We have received and hastily glanced at a tract entitled, "The Church not in darkness, or the duties of the times," by H. L. Hastings.

Believing it would be profitable to our readers, we give a few extracts and then refer them to the tract itself:

But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that Day should overtake you as a thief.—1 Thess. v., 4.

A deep sense of the vast responsibilities resting upon a servant of God, prompts me to express the thoughts that stir my inmost soul. A fearful prospect lies before me—a world slumbering on perdition's fiery brink,—a church drowsily proclaiming my Lord delayeth his coming—clouds, darker than ever have mantled earth's sky since the first beaming of Bethlehem's star, gathering along the horizon,—pent-up surges of desolation, fire, and blood, pressing against their yielding barriers—and beyond all the rest, the day of God, the mighty judgment, the awful destruction that awaits the ungodly, and the triumphant deliverance of the ransomed of the Lord. These are the scenes that rise before me—the visions that crowd my path in the busy whirl of human activity, or in the place of privacy and of prayer. These are the coming events that cast their shadows o'er my path, and the premonition of whose approach I read in the book of providence and in the Book of God.

The sword cometh—How can I hold my peace? The Judge standeth before the door—How can I be silent?

The Day alluded to in this passage is more definitely named in the preceding verses. For the consolation of those of the Thessalonians whose hearts were bleeding with bereavement, the Apostle undertakes to dispel their anguish by dispelling their ignorance, "concerning those who are asleep" in Jesus. Looking downward and pointing to earth's world-wide charnel house, he sees and traces from the rock-hewn tomb of Joseph of Arimathea, a single brilliant ray of light and hope.—Here was a torch for the hand of faith and a light for the eye of hope. If God had brought Christ from the dead, then those who are "in Christ" must also be brought. The living shall have no pre-eminence at last over those who in former ages had lived and died in the Lord. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven—a mighty shout shall proclaim his victorious power and majesty—the awful voice of the Arch-angel, and the swelling echoes of the far-resounding trump of God, shall proclaim alike perdition to the sinner and deliverance to the saint. What a scene ensues!—forth from their graves burst the unnumbered saints of God—earth and ocean teem with an immortal host—each living saint feels a sudden thrill,—it is "the power of an endless life"—and lo! this mortal puts on immortality.

And now they ascend. Slowly, calmly they rise!—earth sinks and recedes from their view—the deep despairing wail of the ruined world sounds fainter and fainter in the distance—while around them and above them burst on their ears the enrapturing harmonies of Cherubim and Seraphim. Still they ascend—the vast and radiant cloud of glory unfolds a gorgeous portal, and attendant angels escort them within it. Still they come, an innumerable company from every land and clime—from prisons, dens, and deserts; from vallies and from hills. Oh, how beauteous are their glittering ranks! And now the last one has arrived. The shout of joy goes up—the Savior's smile is seen, the Savior's greeting heard—the pierced hand wipes away the lingering tear—the dead and the living are together once more—the prophets and the apostles meet—martyrs behold their martyred Lord. Sinners saved gaze upon their Savior, and so are they for ever "with the Lord."

Calmly and kindly does the Apostle turn and place this glowing page before the mourners' weeping eye, bidding them to "comfort one another with these words." Blessed words,—consoling thoughts.—They have been the "oil of joy" to mourning hearts for eighteen hundred years, and still they "hush the low complaining sigh,"—still they "dry the flowing tear,"—still they make the place of weeping a place of joy, and bind about the tomb the flowers of never fading hope.—Still they illuminate the path that lies along the dark valley. Still they strengthen those who stand beside the dying.—Still they comfort those who weep above the dead. Never shall the Christian's eye cease to contemplate the picture; never shall his heart cease to thrill with the anticipation—never shall his hope cease to embrace the promise, until the rent heavens disclose the majestic form of the descending King—the quaking earth deliver up its sleeping captives at his call, and the saints from every age and clime, unite in singing the song of Moses and the Lamb,

> "Far from a world of grief and sin,
> With God eternally shut in."

Concerning this "great and terrible day of the Lord," we are not left destitute of further information. Information, too, that is amply sufficient to stir the deep and swelling surges of emotion within every pious soul. Strangely hardened must be the heart that can behold unmoved the approach of the tremendous scene, and strangely perverted must be that Christianity that can view without the intensest awe and solemnity, the coming of that day of clouds and darkness, of judgment and of wrath—or that can anticipate without delight that day of deliverance, of triumph, of joy, of songs and of crowns, for "all that love His appearing."

The events of that great day are most graphically sketched by the Apostle Peter, in the concluding chapter of his last epistle. Carrying the lustful scoffers of the last day backward on the track of time, to the antediluvian world, he, by that awful example, reproves their impious mockery.—He teaches us that the same God who condemned that world, condemns this, and "the same word" that overwhelmed that with water, shall desolate this by fire.—Notwithstanding the patience and compassion of God — notwithstanding his "long-suffering to us ward,"— notwithstanding his unwillingness that one guilty rebel "should perish,"—notwithstanding his mercy holds open the door of refuge, and his love bids and entreats sinners to enter therein—notwithstanding all this, yet "the day of the Lord" must and "will come as a thief in the night;" wickedness must find a shore to its foaming wave; impiety must be smitten on its brazen front; oppression must be punished; blasphemy must be hushed; and righteousness, so long abased and abused, must triumph at last. Hence "the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night."—And in that day the ascending fires of wrath shall reach the very heavens—awful thunderings shall tell their dissolution and departure: "The elements shall melt" like wax within the glowing furnace: earth, too, shall be molten before the presence of her God, and shall roll, an orb of fire within a sky of flame, while "the works that are therein," the products of human pride, and power, and cruelty, shall perish with the enemies of the Most High, amid those all-devouring flames.

But beyond all this, a vision of purity and peace rises in brightness before the prophet's eye. God's curse hath devoured the earth, his blessing shall restore it. No longer groaning beneath the burden of sin; no longer charred and molten by the fires of wrath, her desolateness is exchanged for the verdure of Eden; perfection blooms where barrenness reigned; Carmel and Lebanon are faint types of its blushing beauty and unfading green; the glory of God floods it with one sea of radiant splendor, and peace waves her olive branch from shore to shore. Righteousness, too, is there—not as a visitant, merely—not as a contrasting spot amid surrounding corruption—not as exemplified in the character of a single "Man of sorrows," but as, the prevailing principle, the constant disposition, the ruling thought of an innumerable, peaceful, and adoring throng. There, on a throne "established in righteousness," reigns a righteous king "over all the earth." There the people are "all righteous, they inherit the land forever." There the "righteous flourish." There the "work of righteousness is peace, and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance forever." There the pilgrim finds his home, the Christian his rest, the martyr his crown, and the mourner his joy, in that "new heavens and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

This, then, is a brief, a faint and an imperfect sketch of those tremendous scenes that go to fill up, and add grandeur and importance to the "great and terrible day of the Lord." It is this day, concerning which the church of God "are not in darkness;" it is this day which shall not come upon them "as a thief." It is this day that shall be put far off by a dreaming world, and which, coming suddenly, shall find them sleeping, and overwhelm them with consternation and despair. It is this day for which the Church of God are to look, it is this day for which the children of Satan will not look. It is this day for which the Church of God should watch—it is this day for which the children of Satan will not watch. It is this day for which the Church of God seek to prepare—it is this day for which the wicked will not prepare. This day will bring deliverance to the saint and perdition to the sinner. WHAT WILL IT BRING TO YOU?

* * * * * *

A solemn weeper overlooks the city of Jerusalem from an adjacent height.—"How oft would I have gathered you—but ye would not. * * * Your house is left unto you desolate." These are the pathetic utterances that issue amid tears and sighs, which speak the anguish of an affectionate heart. A warning too is spoken in the ears of those disciples that gather around him. "When ye see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then flee!"

Years passed away ere that sight was beheld. But at length they saw it. The Roman eagles glittered in the surrounding valleys, and destruction seemed inevitable. Suddenly that army withdrew itself, and then with all haste the followers of Christ fled from that devoted city. The village of Pella afforded them a resting place.—But the Jews were heedless. Notwithstanding the command of Jesus, that those who were in the adjacent countries should not enter into the city, they continued to come. The appoined feast congregated the multitudes of that hypocritical nation, and again a Roman force environed the city of blood and violence. The horrors of that fearful siege no tongue can tell.—The violence that reigned—the sedition that prevailed—the intestine divisions that consumed their strength—the determined energy of those assaults, and the wild fury of that resistance—the wasting famine—the loathsome pestilence—the intolerable hunger, compelling women to devour even their infant children—the nauseous stench of the unburied dead—the awful warning, "Woe, woe to Jerusalem," that was uttered by that haggard man who trod the ramparts of the city until slain himself—the fierce and final struggle—the burning of the temple—the overthrow of the charred tottering walls—the tortures and sufferings of the captives—the cruelty of the captors—the passing of the ploughshare of destruction over the very ground on which that city stood—all these and other circumstances of unmitigated suffering, stand too full upon the page of history to require a repetition.

But the important fact is that not ONE Christian perished there. ELEVEN HUNDRED THOUSAND Jews were destroyed in the siege. NINETY-SEVEN THOUSAND were carried away captive, and NOT ONE Christian among them all. Why was all this? It was because the Church of God were apprized of the predetermined desolation, and made their escape.

THOUGHTS ON THE JUDGMENT OF THE HORN POWER.

BY J. S. BREWER.

What a day we are now living in! The bible student can now behold passing in grand and solemn review before the eye of his faith, the beginning of the end.—Let any one survey the broad outlines of prophecy, as engraven on the pages of holy writ, by the pen of inspiration, and they cannot fail to see the unmistakable evidences of the speedy coming of the Just One.

The Lord declared by the prophet (Dan. 7) that four kingdoms shall arise. Of these kingdoms Babylon was the first, Medo-Persia the second, Greece the third, and Rome the fourth. The third, or Grecian kingdom was to be divided into four parts, which accordingly came to pass; for about B. C. 300 these vast dominions were divided between Alexander's four principal Generals as follows: Ptolemy, had Egypt—Cassander, Greece—Seleucus, Syria—Lysimichus, Macedon. Was it fulfilled to the letter? It was. Will the remiander be? It will. The fourth, or Roman kingdom, was to conquer these four divisions, and accordingly we learn from history, that all of these divisions were conquered as early as B. C. 30. Rome coquered the world. See Luke 2: 1.

This kingdom was to be divided into ten parts. Was it so divided? It was. What are their names, and can they be identified? yes. The Vandals in Africa—Gepidae in Dacia—Saxons in Britian—Britons in Britain—Suevi in Portugal and Gallacia—Ostrogoths in Italy—The Alemanni on the Rhine and Danube—Burgundians in the southeast of Gaul—Franks in Gaul, and the Visgoths in Spain.

Three of these horns were to be plucked up. Were they plucked up?—yes. When? By the Vandals in A. D. 534, the Goths, 552, Alemanni, 554.—A power was to arise among them to speak great words against the Most High. Did it arise? yes. When? In A. D. 519. How long was it to continue? 1290 years. What was it to do? To wear out the saints, and speak great words. Has there been such an abomination? yes. Where? At Rome. Did the pope speak great words? yes. What words? Read the following. "Marcellus in the Lateran Council and with its full approbation, called Pope Julius, God on earth."

In the Extraordinary Titles of the popes, chap. 2d, vol iv, Jacobatius and Durand say, "The Pontiff possesses a plenitude of power, and none dare say unto him any more than to God, what doest thou? He can change the nature of things, and make nothing out of something, and something out of nothing."

Another orator styled Pope Leo, the possessor of all power in heaven and in the earth, who presided over all the kingdoms of the globe.

When Pope Gregory excommunicated King Henry, he published a series of papal constitutions, in which the claims of the Roman Pontiffs to supremacy over the sovreigns of the earth, were asserted in the plainest terms, also, that he alone can be called universal, he alone has a right to imperial ornaments, that princes are bound to kiss his feet, and his only, no book can be called canonical without his authority, and that his sentence canbe annulled by none, BUT THAT HE MAY ANNUL THE DECREES OF ALL. Has the horn spoken great words? yes, we are right so far. When did his reign commence? In 519. How? By the consent of the Greek Emperor. When? The Emperor, the Empress, the Senate, the Court, the Patriarch, the Pope's Legates, went into the great Church and partook of the Holy Eucharist. Then commenced the days of tribulation on the church.

When was his dominion to end? when did the judgment set on him? answer, at the termination of the 1290 years. Did it? yes. In the year 1809, Napoleon in his imperial edict says, we are directed to make known to Pius vii, that he is utterly prohibited from holding any communication whatever with any ecclesiastics in France, or any other subject of the Emperor, under the penalty of disobedience both on his part and theirs. Advising him also, that he is NO LONGER THE ORGAN of the PAPACY. (Bower, Vol. 2d, page 425.) Goodrich in his Church History, says, pages 183–4—"The revolutionary torrent, which was thus set in motion, destroyed law, government and religion in France, and laid waste the ROMAN CHURCH both there and in neighboring countries. Her PRIESTS were MASSACRED, her silver shrines and saints were tunred into money for the payment of the troops, her bells were converted into cannons, and her churches and convents into barracks for soldiers. From the ATLANTIC to the ADRIATIC she presented but one appalling spectacle. She had shed the blood of saints and prophets, and GOD NOW gave her BLOOD TO DRINK." Did the judgment set? YES, on her.

Marsh's Ec. His, page 300, says, "Priest and altar were overturned, and BLOOD once esteemed sacred, flowed to the horses bridles, * * * no tongue can tell the woes of the nation."

The Hon. Gerard Noel says, "can the overthrow of the monastic orders, plunder of the church property, the destruction of religion by legislative enactment, and the massacre of a hundred thousand of her clergy be consistent with any reasonable estimate of domination and power." Under such terrfiic judgment upon the persecutor, can we refuse to admit that the period of 1260 years has terminated its course? Truly this looks like the judgment sitting on the horn. "But the judgment shall sit and THEY shall take away his dominion to consume and destroy unto the end." Did THEY take away his dominion? Yes, THEY—the horns or kings did take away his dominion.

Austria commenced it. See Coxe's House of Austria, Vol. 3, White's His. p. 444–458, also Coxe's House of Austria, pages 490–491–493. See Historical Extracts, pages 48–49 &c.

It was to consume unto the end. "The pillage of the papal states," says Mr. Bickersteth, "by the French in 1797, was such as to drain them of specie, and to take away all precious stones and jewels they could find." The French Ambassador wrote to Napoleon, stating, "discontent is at its highest in the papal states, the payment of 30,000,000f, stipulated by the treaty of Tolentino, at the close of so many losses, has totally exhausted the old carcass, we are making it consume by a slow fire. There was a time when monarchs trembled with fear, and turned pale at the Horn; but now they pay no more regard to the roaring of his Bulls, than they do to the bleating of a lamb.

Says Goodrich, "As a temporal prince the political power of the Pope is now regarded with absolute contempt by all the European Governments; but it is [illegible] ed by them as as a matter of policy."—Without the shadow of a doubt the judgment did sit, and they took away his dominion to destroy and consume unto the end. Then in 1809, just 1290 years from 519, as God had declared, the time of the end commenced. Then many commenced running to and fro. Then many began to preach on the coming of Christ.—The angel of the Apocalypse (Rev. xiv: 6, 7,) began to cry, "fear God, and give glory to Him; for the hour of His judgment is come." No one will say that was the judgment of the great day, but the judgment on that power. Now Babylon had fallen, her power was gone. No longer give glory to the pope, no longer fear the pope, his reign is ended, glory to God; amen, we know we are right on this point. The 1335 days end this year, this is the year of full release.

GRANBY, May 13th, 1854.

Dear Brethren and Sisters in the Lord: I feel as though I was related to all that love the Lord, being made nigh by the blood of Christ. O how blessed it is to feel that we are adopted into the family of God, sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. Praised be His name that I ever was begotten again to a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, that I ever had the evidence of my acceptance with God, and the enjoyment of his favor. I believe I can say with sincerity, that I had rather have the favor of God than the friendship of the world. The friendship of the world is enmity with God, but He has chosen His people out of the world; therefore the world knoweth us not. O let me have the approbation of God, and know that I belong to the church of the first born, and whose names are written in heaven, and I care not for the good name of a popular, world-loving church. "That which is highly esteemed among men is an abomination in the sight of God." O how my heart is pained when I see those who profess the name of Christians, live in direct opposition to the mild and lovely spirit of Chrise, and trample on the truth of the bible, treating with insult and abuse, those who love Christ and his appearing. I feel as though such people had no title to the name of christian, any more than the unbelieving Jews had a claim to being the seed of Abraham. Christ told them they were of their father the Devil, and that they did his works; and I think many of the nominal professors of the present day would be as severely rebuked by our Saviour if He were on the earth. By our fruits we are to be known; O then, let us bring forth the fruits of the Spirit, and we shall know that we are of the truth. Let us who have named the name of Christ, depart from iniquity, let us see to it that we do not give occasion to the adversary to speak reproachfully, let us live by every word of God. Seek to be holy in all manner of conversation. I am glad we have so much evidence that the Lord is soon coming.—Although the great mass of the world are blind to their future destiny, the true people of God can lift up their heads and rejoice, knowing that their redemption draweth nigh. If this is the glad year of the redeemed, my heart responds, Amen, even so come Lord Jesus, and come quickly. The groaning creation waits and sighs for deliverence, the blood of the dear martyrs crieth for vengeance, the saints of every age and clime are weeping on account of the absence of their loved Redeemer, and longing for his return, the Saviour Himself, is waiting and expecting till His enemies are made His footstool.—O sinners, you who have no part nor lot in this matter, will you rush on heedless, when every thing is speaking in thunder tones the Lord is coming? How can you look upon that slighted Saviour, when he comes to judge the world in righteousness? O you will then stand speechless. Repent, I entreat of you, while you have an opportunity; for very soon it will be too late. Rely upon it, the nations are now rushing together for the last great battle; and soon the sealing time will be over, then, those who are righteous will be righteous still, those that are filthy will be filthy still. O fly to Christ for refuge, that you may be sheltered from the storm which is now rising to [illegible] the world. The kingdoms of this world are crumbling to atoms, to make way for the glorious, peaceful, everlasting kingdom of our Lord. O who would not want a home in that happy land? How many will soon wish they had embraced the christian's hope; but alas it is too late, mercy has taken its flight, and the doom of the sinner must be realized. O then come to Jesus while he is waiting to be gracious. He pleads, he invites, he offers to you life, accept it while you may, or soon you will cry for rocks and mountains to fall upon you to hide you from the face of Him who sitteth on the throne, for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?

Your sister in hope of life,

MARY L. PRATT.

GARDINER, Me., May 10, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I am still striving for the kingdom, and rejoicing in hope of speedy redemption through Christ from all these scenes of sorrow, sickness, pain and death, and of an abundant entrance into God's everlasting kingdom to dwell with my Savior and glorified ones on the new earth forever and ever, "where no sorrow can ever come, nor heart be sad." O, praise God for the bright prospect before us.

I have just returned from a visit to my friends on Sandy river; and while I have traveled from place to place witnessing the different scenes, as they were presented to my view, my heart has been pained within me to see the darkness that is spreading itself over the land. O how few are watching for the coming of the Savior, waiting for that blessed hope, "the return of the master," how few are walking in the light of divine truth, living in obedience to all of God's commands, even among those who profess to be Christians. My prayer is, that God will send some one that way to give the warning voice, and sound the alarm to the inhabitants of that region, that they may see the solemn, the grand and awful events that are just upon us, and may escape the snare that is coming upon them that dwell on the earth. While there I was called to sympathise with an afflicted and bereaved Uncle and Aunt, for the loss of their little daughter, Clara Ann Thomas. She died May 1, aged 9 years, 1 month and 3 days. Her decease was sudden and unexpected, she was sick but a short time. Thus in an hour, as it were, the fond hopes and anticipations of her father, mother, brothers and sisters were blighted. Death, the enemy of all mankind, has gained the victory, and that once lovely form, blooming with the vigor of youth, is now pale, cold, and lifeless, housed away in the silent tomb. And must she always remain in that lonely cell, a prisoner of death? Ah! no, no, praise God, she will not long remain there. Jesus, he who is almighty in power, and whose purposes will be accomplished, has promised to open the grave, to release the prisoner, and to destroy him that had the power of death. O what sweet consolation to soothe the aching heart. Yes, father and mother, your daughter shall live again. Brothers and sisters, your little sister shall come again from the land of the enemy, clothed with immortal beauty, to die no more, to be sick no more, to suffer no more at all. O then, dear friends, prepare to meet her, by submitting to Christ. Seek for glory, honor and immortality that you may have eternal life in the kingdom of God. May God grant that we all meet there to part no more forever.

And to the Brethren and Sisters scattered abroad, I would say, be steadfast, immoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; holding on to his promise.—Live by faith and wait for the vision. If it tarry, wait; for it will certainly speak, at the end of the days, God has declared it, and it will not fail. Be patient, therefore, to the end, and may God keep you in his time is my prayer.

Your Brother in Christ, hoping for life evermore, JEREMIAH THOMAS, JR.

☞ All communications, letters, &c., should be directed to "Jonas Merriam, Editor of the World's Crisis, Lowell, Mass."

☞ We have received and hastily glanced at a tract entitled, "The Church not in darkness, or the duties of the times," by H. L. Hastings.

Believing it would be profitable to our readers, we give a few extracts and then refer them to the tract itself:

But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that Day should overtake you as a thief.—1 Thess. v., 4.

A deep sense of the vast responsibilities resting upon a servant of God, prompts me to express the thoughts that stir my inmost soul. A fearful prospect lies before me —a world slumbering on perdition's fiery brink,—a church drowsily proclaiming my Lord delayeth his coming—clouds, darker than ever have mantled earth's sky since the first beaming of Bethlehem's star, gathering along the horizon,—pent-up surges of desolation, fire, and blood, pressing against their yielding barriers—and beyond all the rest, the day of God, the mighty judgment, the awful destruction that awaits the ungodly, and the triumphant deliverance of the ransomed of the Lord. These are the scenes that rise before me —the visions that crowd my path in the busy whirl of human activity, or in the place of privacy and of prayer. These are the coming events that cast their shadows o'er my path, and the premonition of whose approach I read in the book of providence and in the Book of God.

The sword cometh—How can I hold my peace? The Judge standeth before the door—How can I be silent?

The Day alluded to in this passage is more definitely named in the preceding verses. For the consolation of those of the Thessalonians whose hearts were bleeding with bereavement, the Apostle undertakes to dispel their anguish by dispelling their ignorance, "concerning those who are asleep" in Jesus. Looking downward and pointing to earth's world-wide charnel house, he sees and traces from the rock-hewn tomb of Joseph of Arimathea, a single brilliant ray of light and hope.—Here was a torch for the hand of faith and a light for the eye of hope. If God had brought Christ from the dead, then those who are "in Christ" must also be brought. The living shall have no pre-eminence at last over those who in former ages had lived and died in the Lord. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven—a mighty shout shall proclaim his victorious power and majesty—the awful voice of the Arch-angel, and the swelling echoes of the far-resounding trump of God, shall proclaim alike perdition to the sinner and deliverance to the saint. What a scene ensues!—forth from their graves burst the unnumbered saints of God—earth and ocean teem with an immortal host—each living saint feels a sudden thrill,—it is "the power of an endless life"—and lo! this mortal puts on immortality.

And now they ascend. Slowly, calmly they rise!—earth sinks and recedes from their view—the deep despairing wail of the ruined world sounds fainter and fainter in the distance—while around them and above them burst on their ears the enrapturing harmonies of Cherubim and Seraphim. Still they ascend—the vast and radiant cloud of glory unfolds a gorgeous portal, and attendant angels escort them within it. Still they come, an innumerable company from every land and clime—from prisons, dens, and deserts; from vallies and from hills. Oh, how beauteous are their glittering ranks! And now the last one has arrived. The shout of joy goes up—the Savior's smile is seen, the Savior's greeting heard—the pierced hand wipes away the lingering tear—the dead and the living are together once more—the prophets and the apostles meet—martyrs behold their martyred Lord. Sinners saved gaze upon their Savior, and so are they for ever" with the Lord."

Calmly and kindly does the Apostle turn and place this glowing page before the mourners' weeping eye, bidding them to "comfort one another with these words," Blessed words,—consoling thoughts.—They have been the "oil of joy" to mourning hearts for eighteen hundred years, and still they "hush the low complaining sigh,"—still they "dry the flowing tear,"—still they make the place of weeping a place of joy, and bind about the tomb the flowers of never fading hope.—Still they illuminate the path that lies along the dark valley. Still they strengthen those who stand beside the dying.—Still they comfort those who weep above the dead. Never shall the Christian's eye cease to contemplate the picture; never shall his heart cease to thrill with the anticipation—never shall his hope cease to embrace the promise, until the rent heavens disclose the majestic form of the descending King—the quaking earth deliver up its sleeping captives at his call, and the saints from every age and clime, unite in singing the song of Moses and the Lamb,

"Far from a world of grief and sin,

Concerning this "great and terrible day of the Lord," we are not left destitute of further information. Information, too, that is amply sufficient to stir the deep and swelling surges of emotion within every pious soul. Strangely hardened must be the heart that can behold unmoved the approach of the tremendous scene, and strangely perverted must be that Christianity that can view without the intensest awe and solemnity, the coming of that day of clouds and darkness, of judgment and of wrath—or that can anticipate without delight that day of deliverance, of triumph, of joy, of songs and of crowns, for "all that love His appearing."

The events of that great day are most graphically sketched by the Apostle Peter, in the concluding chapter of his last epistle. Carrying the lustful scoffers of the last day backward on the track of time, to the antediluvian world, he, by that awful example, reproves their impious mockery.—He teaches us that the same God who condemned that world, condemns this, and "the same word" that overwhelmed that with water, shall desolate this by fire.—Notwithstanding the patience and compassion of God—notwithstanding his "long-suffering to us ward,"—notwithstanding his unwillingness that one guilty rebel "should perish,"—notwithstanding his mercy holds open the door of refuge, and his love bids and entreats sinners to enter therein—notwithstanding all this, yet "the day of the Lord" must and "will come as a thief in the night;" wickedness must find a shore to its foaming wave; impiety must be smitten on its brazen front; oppression must be punished; blasphemy must be hushed; and righteousness, so long abased and abused, must triumph at last. Hence "the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night."—And in that day the ascending fires of wrath shall reach the very heavens—awful thunderings shall tell their dissolution and departure: "The elements shall melt" like wax within the glowing furnace: earth, too, shall be molten before the presence of her God, and shall roll, an orb of fire within a sky of flame, while "the works that are therein," the products of human pride, and power, and cruelty, shall perish with the enemies of the Most High, amid those all-devouring flames.

But beyond all this, a vision of purity and peace rises in brightness before the prophet's eye. God's curse hath devoured the earth, his blessing shall restore it. No longer groaning beneath the burden of sin; no longer charred and molten by the fires of wrath, her desolateness is exchanged for the verdure of Eden; perfection blooms where barrenness reigned; Carmel and Lebanon are faint types of its blushing beauty and unfading green; the glory of God floods it with one sea of radiant splendor, and peace waves her olive branch from shore to shore. Righteousness, too, is there—not as a visitant, merely—not as a contrasting spot amid surrounding corruption—not as exemplified in the character of a single "Man of sorrows," but as, the prevailing principle, the constant disposition, the ruling thought of an innumerable, peaceful, and adoring throng. There, on a throne "established in righteousness," reigns a righteous king "over all the earth." There the people are "all righteous, they inherit the land forever." There the "righteous flourish." There the "work of righteousness is peace, and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance forever." There the pilgrim finds his home, the Christian his rest, the martyr his crown, and the mourner his joy, in that "new heavens and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

This, then, is a brief, a faint and an imperfect sketch of those tremendous scenes that go to fill up, and add grandeur and importance to the "great and terrible day of the Lord." It is this day, concerning which the church of God "are not in darkness;" it is this day which shall not come upon them "as a thief." It is this day that shall be put far off by a dreaming world, and which, coming suddenly, shall find them sleeping, and overwhelm them with consternation and despair. It is this day for which the Church of God are to look, it is this day for which the children of Satan will not look. It is this day for which the Church of God should watch—it is this day for which the children of Satan will not watch. It is this day for which the Church of God seek to prepare—it is this day for which the wicked will not prepare. This day will bring deliverance to the saint and perdition to the sinner. WHAT WILL IT BRING TO YOU?

* * * * *

A solemn weeper overlooks the city of Jerusalem from an adjacent height—"How oft would I have gathered you—but ye would not. * * * Your house is left unto you desolate." These are the pathetic utterances that issue amid tears and sighs, which speak the anguish of an affectionate heart. A warning too is spoken in the ears of those disciples that gather around him. THOUGHTS ON THE JUDGMENT OF THE HORN POWER.

BY S. S. BREWER.

What a day we are now living in! The bible student can now behold passing in grand and solemn review before the eye of his faith, the beginning of the end.—Let any one survey the broad ontlines of prophecy, as engraven on the pages of holy writ, by the pen of inspiration, and they cannot fail to see the unmistakable evidences of the speedy coming of the Just One.

The Lord declared by the prophet (Dan. 7) that four kingdoms shall arise. Of these kingdoms Babylon was the first, Medo-Persia the second, Greece the third, and Rome the fourth. From the ATLANTIC to the ADRIATIC she presented but one appalling spectacle. She had shed the blood of saints and prophets, and GOD NOW gave her BLOOD TO DRINK." Did the judgment set? YES, on her.

Marsh's Ec. His, page 300, says, "Priest and altar were overturned, and BLOOD once esteemed sacred, flowed to the horses bridles, * * * no tongue can tell the woes of the nation."

The Hon. Gerard Noel says, "can the overthrow of the monastic orders, plunder of the church property, the destruction of religion by legislative enactment, and the massacre of a hundred thousand of her clergy be consistent with any reasonable estimate of domination and power." Under such terrfiic judgment upon the persecutor, can we refuse to admit that the period of 1260 years has terminated its course? Truly this looks like the judgment sitting on the horn. "But the judgment shall sit and THEY shall take away his dominion to consume and destroy unto the end." Did THEY take away his dominion? Yes, THEY—the horns or kings did take away his dominion.

Austria commenced it. See Coxe's House of Austria, Vol. 3, White's His. p. 444–458, also Coxe's House of Austria, pages 490–491–493, See Historical Extracts, pages 48–49 &c.

It was to consume unto the end. "The pillage of the papal states," says Mr. Bickersteth, "by the French in 1797, was such as to drain them of specie, and to take away all precious stones and jewels they could find." The French Ambassador wrote to Napoleon, stating, "discontent is at its highest in the papal states, the payment of 30,000,000f, stipulated by the treaty of Tolentino, at the close of so many losses, has totally exhausted the old carcass, we are making it consume by a slow fire. There was a time when monarchs trembled with fear, and turned pale at the Horn; but now they pay no more regard to the roaring of his Bulls, than they do to the bleating of a lamb."

Says Goodrich, "As a temporal prince the political power of the Pope is now regarded with absolute contempt by all the European Governments; but it is ignored by them as as a matter of policy."—Without the shadow of a doubt the judgment did sit, and they took away his dominion to destroy and consume unto the end. Then in 1809, just 1290 years from 519, as God had declared, the time of the end commenced. Then many commenced running to and fro. Then many began to preach on the coming of Christ.—The angel of the Apocalypse (Rev. xiv: 6, 7,) began to cry, "fear God, and give glory to Him; for the hour of His judgment is come." No one will say that was the judgment of the great day, but the judgment on that power. Now Babylon had fallen, her power was gone. No longer give glory to the pope, no longer fear the pope, his reign is ended, glory to God, amen, we know we are right on this point. The 1335 days end this year, this is the year of full release.

GRANBY, May 13th, 1854.

Dear Brethren and Sisters in the Lord: I feel as though I was related to all that love the Lord, being made nigh by the blood of Christ. O how blessed it is to feel that we are adopted into the family of God, sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. Praised be His name that I ever was begotten again to a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, that I ever had the evidence of my acceptance with God, and the enjoyment of his favor. I believe I can say with sincerity, that I had rather have the favor of God than the friendship of the world. The friendship of the world is enmity with God, but He has chosen His people out of the world; therefore the world knoweth us not. O let me have the approbation of God, and know that I belong to the church of the first born, and whose names are wrstten in heaven, and I care not for the good name of a popular, world-loving church. "That which is highly esteemed among men is an abomination in the sight of God." O how my heart is pained when I see those who profess the name of Christians, live in direct opposition to the mild and lovely spirit of Chrise, and trample on the truth of the bible, treating with insult and abuse, those who love Christ and his appearing. I feel as though such people had no title to the name of christian, any more than the unbelieving Jews had a claim to being the seed of Abraham. Christ told them they were of their father the Devil, and that they did his works; and I think many of the nominal professors of the present day would be as severely rebuked by our Saviour if He were on the earth. By our fruits we are to be known; O then, let us bring forth the fruits of the Spirit, and we shall know that we are of the truth. Let us who have named the name of Christ, depart from iniquity, let us see to it that we do not give occasion to the adversary to speak reproachfully, let us live by every word of God. Seek to be holy in all manner of conversation. I am glad we have so much evidence that the Lord is soon coming.—Although the great mass of the world are blind to their future destiny, the true people of God can lift up their heads and rejoice, knowing that their redemption draweth nigh. If this is the glad year of the redeemed, my heart responds, Amen, even so come Lord Jesus, and come quickly. The groaning creation waits and sighs for deliverence, the blood of the dear martyrs crieth for vengeance, the saints of every age and clime are weeping on account of the absence of their loved Redeemer, and longing for his return, the Saviour Himself, is waiting and expecting till His enemies are made His footstool.—O sinners, you who have no part nor lot in this matter, will you rush on heedless, when every thing is speaking in thunder tones the Lord is coming? How can you look upon that slighted Saviour, when he comes to judge the world in righteousness? O you will then stand speechless. Repent I entreat of you, while you have an opportunity; for very soon it will be too late. Rely upon it, the nations are now rushing together for the last great battle; and soon the sealing time will be over, then those who are righteous will be righteous will be righteous still, those that are filthy will be filthy still. O fly to Christ for refuge, that you may be sheltered from the storm which is now rising to deluge the world. The kingdoms of this world are crumbling to atoms, to make way for the glorious, peaceful, everlasting kingdom of our Lord. O who would not want a home in that happy land? How many will soon wish they had embraced the christian's hope; but alas it is too late, mercy has taken its flight, and the doom of the sinner must be realized. O then come to Jesus while he is waiting to be gracious. He pleads, he invites, he offers to you life, accept it while you may, or soon you will cry for rocks and mountains to fall upon you to hide you from the face of Him who sitteth on the throne, for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?

Your sister in hope of life,

MARY L. PRATT.

GARDINER, Me., May 10, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I am still striving for the kingdom, and rejoicing in hope of speedy redemption through Christ from all these scenes of sorrow, sickness, pain and death, and of an abundant entrance into God's everlasting kingdom to dwell with my Savior and glorified ones on the new earth forever and ever, "where no sorrow can ever come, nor hearts be sad." O, praise God for the bright prospect before us.

I have just returned from a visit to my friends on Sandy river; and while I have traveled from place to place witnessing the different scenes, as they were presented to my view, my heart has been pained within me to see the darkness that is spreading itself over the land. O how few are watching for the coming of the Savior, waiting for that blessed hope, "the return of the master," how few are walking in the light of divine truth, living in obedience to all of God's commands, even among those who profess to be Christians. My prayer is, that God will send some one that way to give the warning voice, and sound the alarm to the inhabitants of that region, that they may see the solemn, the grand and awful events that are just upon us, and may escape the snare that is coming upon them that dwell on the earth. While there I was called to sympathise with an afflicted and bereaved Uncle and Aunt, for the loss of their little daughter, Clara Ann Thomas. She died May 1, aged 9 years, 1 month and 3 days. Her decease was sudden and unexpected, she was sick but a short time. Thus in an hour, as it were, the fond hopes and anticipations of her father, mother, brothers and sisters were blighted. Death, the enemy of all mankind, has gained the victory, and that once lovely form, blooming with the vigor of youth, is now pale, cold, and lifeless: housed away in the silent tomb. And must she always remain in that lonely cell, a prisoner of death? Ah! no, no, praise God, she will not long remain there. Jesus, he who is almighty in power, and whose purposes will be accomplished, has promised to open the grave, to release the prisoner, and to destroy him that had the power of death. O what sweet consolation to soothe the aching heart. Yes, father and mother, your daughter shall live again. Brothers and sisters, your little sister shall come again from the land of the enemy, clothed with immortal beauty, to die no more, to be sick no more, to suffer no more at all. O then, dear friends, prepare to meet her, by submitting to Christ. Seek for glory, honor and immortality that you may have eternal life in the kingdom of God. May God grant that we all meet there to part no more forever.

And to the Brethren and Sisters scattered abroad, I would say, be steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; holding on to his promise.—Live by faith and wait for the vision. If it tarry, wait; for it will certainly speak at the end of the days; God has declared it, and it will not fail. [illegible] therefore, to the end, and may God [illegible] his time is my prayer.

Your Brother in Christ, hoping for life evermore, JEDEDIAH THOMAS, JR.

The World's Crisis.

LOWELL, JUNE [illegible], 1854.

Special Notice.

We are sending nearly two thousand papers that go in single wrappers. These names have been picked up in various ways. Some of them have been ordered, but a great part of them have been added to the list by the request of others, or have been gathered from old advent papers.—We have reason to believe that a great part of them are doing no good, and we know of only one way to ascertain who among them wants the paper, and that is to request those who receive their papers in single wrappers, and wish to have them continued to just drop us a line giving the town and state in which they live.

Will all subscribers who receive their papers in single wrappers, and wish to have them continued, and are willing (if able) to do something to help sustain the paper, just drop us a line previous to next week's publication. We wish to send it to all that desire and appreciate it, and to the poor free; but we must not waste the Lord's money.

"Blow ye the trumpet in Zion, and sound an alarm in my holy mountain: let all the inhabitants of the land tremble: for the day of the Lord cometh, for it is nigh at hand."

We began, in an especial manner, some two years since, to sound an alarm in the holy mountain, calling on "the inhabitants of the land to tremble; for the day of the Lord cometh." Seeing the vengeance impending, we endeavored to lift up the voice like a trumpet, and proclaim aloud, "the sword is coming;" and the scene of violence and destruction we announced would take place, according to our interpretation of the prophecies, in 1854.—That eventful year has at length been ushered in, and as its weeks and months roll on, tidings come to us borne on the wings of every wind, proclaiming the truthfulness of our position, and the rectitude of our chronological reckoning. We are not now under the necessity to prove from prophetic testimony, that 1854 will be a season of violence and outrage, but simply to chronicle the fact—simply to mark down events of every day's occurrence. To say nothing of the warlike aspect of foreign nations, it may truly be said of our own land, as of the earth in Noah's time, that it is "filled with violence" and ripe for destruction. What a change has come over the earth—what a new phase society has assumed—what a revolution in public sentiment has occurred this year!!! Just at this moment, when the nations were expected to beat their swords into plowshares, and to learn war no more; when the gentle dove of peace was expected to hover over the earth—to see these elements of wrath breaking out on every hand, and especially in our own quiet country—to see the infraction of the laws—and the prostration of civil power, it is startling in the extreme to those who trust in the stability of our political institutions.

We read in almost every paper of the spirit of anarchy and violence breaking forth all over the land; such as the following:

On Saturday nigh an affray grew out of the "Know-Nothing" excitement at Pottsville, Pa. Thomas Keam, an American, was found dead in the street, terribly cut and gashed about the body. John Mann was also cut and bruised. John Dougherty, an Irishman, was also stabbed, but was to be arrested on suspicion of killing Keam. So says the telegraph.

Assault in Chelsea.—We learn from the Boston Daily Bee that a most aggravated case of assault took place in Chelsea on Sunday morning. [illegible] a young man named Edwin A. Bowen, while on his way to Chelsea Beach was accosted by two Irishmen, who demanded a star which he wore as a breastpin. He of course refused to give it up, when the Irishmen attacked him. His dog seized hold of one of them, while the other was engaged with Mr Bowen, who was knocked down, and received a severe stab in the arm from a knife, but managed to cut his assailant with his sword-cane, whereupon the villains both took to their heels—not, however, without threatening to burn his shop. The sole cause of the dastardly assault is supposed to have been the star, which is said to be the sign of membership of the "Know-Nothing" party.

In Nashua, Friday night there was [illegible] disposition on the part of the rabble [illegible] of our city.—Brick-bats have been resorted to in some instances, and severe contusions suffered, although no lives have as yet been lost.

As an illustration of the spirit that is now pervading the community, we give the following. A few days since, we are told, an Irishman being arrested by one of the watch, remarked, that there was "a going to be war." The Watchman inquired why he thought so. "O," said he, "I feel it in my heart." This is because the nation is drinking the cup of wrath.

Why have know-nothing associations sprung up, as if by magic, all over the land, sweeping every thing before them in a manner beyond parallel? It is because the time has arrived for the development of that warlike element, which will operate on both parties, and prepare them for the final battle. The warlike spirit among our citizens operates just as in the nature of things we had reason to anticipate. In our large cities the masses of men are in such immediate contact, that mind acts on mind; and all the elements of wrath are stirred into action. These demonstrations which are every week, and almost every day exhibited in Boston, New York, Lowell, &c., are proofs that the great battle is about commencing. They are an attack on the outposts—the mere skirmishing of the advanced guards who discharge their pieces and fall back on the main body of the army; but they demonstrate the fact that the forces have met—the skirmishing is begun.

We suppose but little influence can be exerted over those who are filled with the spirit of war; for these things must necessarily be in order to fulfil the scriptures. "It must be that offences come, but wo unto him by whom the offence cometh." We would however, raise the warning voice to the citizens of Lowell, as well as elsewhere, that this cup which they are drinking is just what is predicted in the 25th ch. of Jeremiah. This spirit of war, brings you into the outer circles of the vortex of destruction; and in a little while those who are under its influence will plunge down the yawning gulf. We therefore, in the spirit of kindness to all, warn both Protestants and Catholics not to taste this cup of wrath; for you will drink a deadly poison—not to inhale the warlike spirit; for you will inhale an element of death. O let me entreat you BEWARE.

We have taken the most decided position against Catholicism; and our principles and feelings are in direct antagonism to the faith and practice of the Catholic Church; but a kind word, or a beneficent act will touch their hearts quicker than the bayonet's point. The benevolence of protestant America toward Ireland in her famine and starvation, a few years since, did more to break the shackles of the priesthood, and prepare that people for the light and liberty of the gospel, than could have been effected by all the artillery of the United States. And then when the poor suffering Irishman came to America, and was kindly and affectionately met at the wharf by the Colporteur, and presented with a bible or tract, he was not insensible to the power of human kindness, nor the excellence of that religion that sought his highest good.

We wish it distinctly understood, that while we contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints, and against the corruptions introduced by the falling away under papacy, we discountenance, nay deprecate all resort to physical force, more especially that which has not even the sanction of civil law. If love and good will to foreigners will not influence and turn them from their errors and delusions, the dirk and the revolver will be found more powerless still.

It seems hardly possible that the human mind can be so blinded as not to perceive the day of the Lord is near, when we have such practical demonstrations on every hand, that such is the solemn fact. But as the Jews shut their eyes, and closed their ears to passing events, so it is now. Says Jesus, "And in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, which saith, By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and shall not perceive: For this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them." Matt. 13: 14, 15. He immediately subjoins in reference to His disciples, "But blessed are your eyes, for they see; and your ears, for they hear." Both ideas are strikingly exemplified in the present generation. As the Jews might have discovered the fulfilment of prophecy in the very events that were transpiring around them; they further, as they once, fulfilled the scripture with their own hands, and yet were unconscious of the fact; so at the present day, people might discern the signs of the times in the aspect of the nations, and in the very events that are transpiring around them; nay, in the identical scenes in which they are engaged as actors. But alas, the astonishing blindness, the more than Jewish obstinacy in rejecting the light! What, friends, shall we do for your enlightenment and rescue from the jaws of the devourer? We endeavored to show you prior to the present developments, that these things would come to pass; but you heeded not the prophetic word; and now that the fulfilment has in a measure come, will you be equally inconsiderate and insensate? FLEE, O I entreat you, "FLEE FROM THE WRATH TO COME."

It is well known that the military of our large cities have been under arms almost every Sunday for several weeks past, and that the spirit of riotous disorder has prevailed to an alarming extent—indeed that popular outbreaks and anarchy are fast taking the place of order and good government, that reigned in America prior to the eventful year of 1854. Robbery, outrage and bloodshed are getting to be the order of the day. Not thirty years ago, when Lafayette visited Boston, and saw unnumbered crowds gathering around him, his inquiry was, "Gentlemen, where is your police?" and the answer given was, "every man is his own police officer in America." At present, not only is this voluntary police force inadequate to preserve the public peace, but the regularly constituted authorities are insufficient to repress the spirit of lawlessness pervading that hitherto peaceful Metropolis and vicinity;—and should the tide of public feeling continue to rise, the military itself will not be able much longer to preserve the peace of community and subordination to law. There must inevitably be, according to present appearances, a breaking up of the Federal compact—a disorganization of government—a subversion of social order, and a state of anarchy and chaos in the political world, such as it would be painful to contemplate, were it not the preparatory work to establish order and government and peace upon a permanent basis. It is the shaking down of all earthly powers and principalities, thrones and dominions preparatory to the organization of that peaceful kingdom, which can never be moved—that dominion which shall never pass away. Thank God for the heavenly prospect that heaves in view. The rainbow of glory appears on the brow of the thunder cloud; and when the lightnings have purified the air, and the storm renewed the face of the earth, the beauties of Eden bowers—the charms of a celestial landscape—the glories of earth redeemed—creation regenerated will be spread out before the eye of the expectant saint; and "Jerusalem shall be a quiet habitation, not one of her stakes shall ever be removed." "Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders; but thou shalt call thy walls Salvation, and thy gates Praise." Is. 60: 18.

Westfield Tent Meeting.

Having had the privilege of attending that meeting, I feel it a duty to say a word on the subject to the household, to the praise of God's grace. I am truly thankful that I was favored with the opportunity of meeting with so many of my beloved Brethren and Sisters whom I had never before seen in the flesh. It was truly a refreshing season at that feast of Tabernacles, as we sit together in a heavenly place, enjoying sweet communion one with another, and feeling that the blood of Jesus cleansed us from all sin. There seemed to be one universal feeling of family relationship recognizing each other, whether from the East, West, North or South, as endeared Brethren and Sisters of one common family, moulded into one image, speaking the same dialect, actuated by the same principles, and homeward bound on the same voyage to glory. Indeed there was not, to my knowledge, a discordant note heard, or a jarring element felt on the ground. The Conference on Sunday morning, which we denominated a love-feast, holden under the great tent, was a meeting of unusual interest. I think, for unanimity of feeling, promptitude in duty, and gentle showers of blessings through the operation of the divine spirit, I never knew it surpassed. In about an hour and a half nearly a hundred exhortations were given, beside such a multitude of Zion's songs, that it seemed to me every hymn book on earth was laid under tribute, to furnish joyful lays. If it were in my power to present the entire scene just as it transpired, perhaps no richer feast could be spread before the readers of the Crisis; but description would fail of a just representation; for the shining countenance, the falling tear, the heart-felt tone would still be wanting to complete the description. As, however, the Gospel leads to benevolence, and we do not love to eat our morsel alone, I would like to impart a few crumbs of this sacred festival, which, if it feed no one else, will perhaps nourish the children in some measure unto eternal life.

As only some 30 or 40 seconds were spent in an exhortation, a sentence or two only was uttered by each; but that seemed to be just as the Spirit of God directed, and consequently forwarded the work.

Said one young Brother, "I have just entered into the heavenly pathway, but I mean by the grace of God to go through to the end, until I gain immortality in the kingdom."

Another, "I am a traveler to the New Jerusalem, and expect to be there at the coronation-day."

Another, "I have belonged to a church nine years, and never heard the sound of glory; but since I have been associated with the Adventists, I can say glory, AND KNOW WHAT IT MEANS."

Another, "The Car is on the right track, and will go into the kingdom this year."

Another, "There is a pure atmosphere here, it clears our lungs; so that we speak freely. When things move by God's machinery, the wheels all match, and every cog comes in place."

Another, "The net is on the right side of the ship this morning, and it is full of fishes. Brethren, beckon to your partners."

Another, "I have been thinking if there is so much enjoyment in a love-feast in this dark world, what will it be to enjoy a love-feast when the children all get home to their Father's house in a world of light."

Another, "I have been thinking the Lord would get the case this morning; for the evidences are all on His side."

Said a Sister, "I feel that we are children of one family. Thank God, I belong to the family; but I have been thinking, if I did not, I would join to day."

Another, "I do not know that I have much to say; but I can say, glory to God, glory to God, glory to God."

We adopted and passed by an overwhelming vote one of the best resolutions ever presented to any assembly; and that was to consecrate all our powers to God, and go through to the end of our pilgrimage.

Preaching by Brethren Cummings, Grant, Campbell, &c., was impressive, and adapted to throw much light on our present position. The remarks which Bro. Cummings made on the sonship of Christ would be instructive to the readers of the Crisis. He presented in a clear and striking light the fact, that the doctrine of the two natures of Christ was the great point in dispute between the Catholics on the one hand, and the Eutychians, Arians, &c., on the other, in the beginning of the sixth century; that the Council of Chalcedon, which laid the platform of the Catholic Church, decided in favor of the two natures; and this was the corner stone of the edifice, the grand leading idea of the Catholic faith; and because the Church would not assent to this doctrine, that series of fearful persecutions commenced, which has deluged Christendom with blood. How little are most Protestants aware, that this doctrine of the two natures of Christ, upon which they themselves stand, was the very basis of the great Anti-Christian power!

Bro. Cummings remarked in substance as follows, "Divinity, you will say, cannot die. Admitted. But let it be incorporated with humanity, and it becomes liable to death. Says the scripture, (Heb. 2: 14, 15) 'Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; And deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage.' The Son of God, finding us in the pit of corruption, could not lift us up otherwise than by descending into the pit with us. There could be no such thing as reaching down His arm to save us; he must necessarily descend himself and lay hold on us, in order to deliver and raise us up. Thus by the divinity being united to humanity, the Son of God becomes liable to death. Hence when He rose, the Father says of Him, "Thou art my Son this day have I begotten thee," Ps. 2: 7, and Acts 13: 33. Thus Jesus is represented as "the first-born of every creature," Col. 1: 15; "who is the beginning, the first born from the dead," Col. 1: 18; "the beginning of the creation of God," Rev. 3: 14, i. e. the commencement of the new creation. He rose as "the first fruits of them that slept." Thus Jesus, having died and rose again, could say, "I am He that was dead and am alive forevermore;" and when He rose he had three keys, viz.: the keys of death and hell (hades, the grave) and the key of David by which "He openeth, and no man shutteth; and shutteth, and no man openeth." But it would be impossible in a few short sentences to do justice to a subject so weighty, and which was listened to with such deep and thrilling interest.

The weather was delightful during most of the meeting, and while, as one Author says, "there was a glory on the earth and in the sky," there was a richer glory within, in anticipation of that new heavens and earth where the sky will ever be cloudless and the earth filled with the glory of God as the waters fill the sea. I will only add we met in love, parted in love, and hope to meet again where "all the air is love."

CORRESPONDENCE.

SALISBURY, N. H.

Readers of the Crisis:—Judging from my own feelings and past experience, I have no doubt but the "World's Crisis" as it reaches you, is received with joy and gratitude, as it heralds the last message of the gospel to this world. It is giving meat in due season, as other papers have in years gone by, and may God direct its publishers by His spirit. Dear Brethren, how good the Lord has been to us, in giving us the midnight cry, which is calculated to wake us up and show us the true state of the church, and of the world;—and now giving us just time enough to get ready to go out and meet the Bridegroom. From the evidences we have in prophecy, in history, in the signs of the times, at home and abroad, and seeing things transpire around us daily, which Scripture has said should take place just preceding the coming of the Lord, and also the experience of ten years past, the dealings of the Lord with his people, the way he has led them, the part of the parable of the ten virgins which has been fulfilled, their disappointment, their tarrying time, slumbering and sleeping, which had almost insensibly come over them, and now the cry, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh," the effect it has had and is still having, I say in view of all this evidence, I am shut up to the conclusion that, "the Lord is at hand," that there will be no more saying the days are prolonged, and every vision faileth.—In a short time the last servant will be sealed, and then the angels (or four powers) will let go, "time of trouble" commence, "such as never was since there nation," and God's people be delivered whose names are written in the book, while those that are then found filthy will be filthy still,—the righteous rise to glory, the wicked be destroyed, the earth purified,—the saints to "take the kingdom and possess it forever, even for ever and ever."—Dear Brethren, in view of these things, how ought we to live every moment; how watchful and prayerful, how humble, how faithful, how much of the spirit of our Master we need, how dead to the world, its pleasures, its vanities, and everything this world calls good and great, we ought to be. O may we be all ready to hail Him with joy when He comes.

O remember that with a knowledge of these things, will surely come destruction or salvation. Now therefore be ye not mockers, lest your bands be made strong; for I have heard from the word of the Lord, a consumption even determined upon the whole earth. Believe in the Lord your God; so shall ye be established, believe His prophets and so shall ye prosper. And now, O sinner, what will you do in that day? It is surely coming; it will not tarry. If you are found then without a wedding garment, you will be speechless, and left on the earth to be destroyed. Reflect one moment on the awful state you would be in, while the saints are caught up to meet the Lord, or in the chambers, until the indignation is over and past, and you crying for mercy when it is too late. O heed these last notes of warning which are given to this world in the sound of the midnight cry. It is the last call of mercy; turn now from sin, seek salvation, and then you can hope. Trust in His grace, and believe His word and do all His commands, then you and I if we are found watching, will be saved in His kingdom when He comes.

THOMAS FOOTE.

BOSTON, May 1, 1854.

Brother Merriam,—I have just returned home after being four weeks among the mountains of New Hampshire. Have had a refreshing time with the dear saints of God. I held a series of meetings at North Haverhill, Swiftwater Village and Lisbon, and had a heavenly meeting at each place. There seems to b a great desire to hear on the subject of the immediate coming of our Lord. They have enjoyed but little preaching. At North Haverhil the people had been somewhat aroused by the few discourses which Brother Burnham gave last fall, and when the truth was presented before them again, many received it gladly into good and honest hearts. I baptized six willing souls, and more intended to be baptized, but were prevented on account of the weather.—The Brethren and Sisters at this place are determined to follow on to know the Lord, and to see the King in his beauty. At the close of the meeting we had a communion season; and truly it was a refreshing time to our souls. Oh! how sweet it will be, when all the dear saints shall sit around the table in the kingdom of God. I went from this place to Swiftwater Village, where I held a meeting several days. At this place God worked mightily with his truth. I never was in a place where the truth seemed to take such root as it did there. Where there were but three or four, who attended prayer meetings, there are now thirty, that are willing to go a mile and a half. The work is still in progress. This I attribute to the prayers of the few who met together to pray that the truth might be preached to the people, and that God would pour out his Spirit upon the community. They have had their prayers answered, and some of their children have been converted to God. Oh! what a blessing to have their children live forever with them in the kingdom. May they be thankful to God, and still pray on. I baptized three at this place, and several more are waiting to follow the example and requirement of our Savior on my return. May the Lord seal them for the day of redemption. Feeling rather unwell, I went from this place to Landaff to rest a little with my beloved Brother Eastman, a true yoke-fellow in the Gospel, where I found truly a home for the weary pilgrim. I went from this place to Lisbon, and commenced a series of meetings. At this place there never had been any lectures on the soon coming of the Lord.—The people seemed anxious to hear, gave good attention, and I trust the seed has fallen into good ground, and will bring forth fruit to the glory of God and the salvation of souls. Now, dear Brother Merriam, may the Lord give you strength of mind and body to discharge your responsible duties faithfully, and may he reward you with eternal life when he comes.

Yours looking for redemption this year,

"Which things the Angels desired to look into."

It is a question among professors of religion at the present time, whether we should investigate the prophecies in relation to the immediate coming of our Lord, and His personal reign with the saints upon the earth. Many believe the book of Daniel to be not only a sealed book, but one whose mysterious instructions were never designed to be understood by men, and deem those persons whose attention has been drawn to this all important topic, as in a fanatical and ridiculous position.—This, however, is a literal fulfilment of that which was spoken of in time past.—We are told there shall be scoffers, men who disbelieve the signs given to us by GOD himself; are there any such among us? We read of men whose hearts are devoted to earthly things, lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God.—We have those characters around us; and our Saviour himself teaches that when he does come, he shall scarcely find faith on the earth; and though the seed of Abraham is to be as numerous as the sands of the sea, yet only "a remnant shall be saved."

This is indeed a solemn and interesting question, a subject deserving our most candid observation, one which not only relates to our present life, but to that of eternity. If the angels of God, those celestial beings who are so much in the immediate presence of Jehovah, desired to look into this matter, and if possible to see far into the future, what the great God had designed for the nations of the earth, and if notwithstanding they were only to be spectators of these great events, they looked forward with intense interest; then why should not man, who is a participator and an actor in this solemn scene, whose everlasting destiny is hanging upon its results, why should he not at least have some concern or interest in this matter?

If every sinner could but be impressed with those solemn events which are about to be accomplished, and of their immediate approach, they could not resist the call of the gospel. Oh! for faithful laborers, who would at the risk of their honor, their reputation, or their lives, preach the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, whose whole being is in the work, who regard not the scoffs of the world, knowing that they are in the discharge of their duty, that of giving meat to their fellow men in due season. What a solemn and important station the minister of God fills in this last age of the world! If he flinch in the least from duty, God will require it at his hand. It is my prayer, and it ought to be the prayer of every sincere christian, that the Lord would help His ministering servants to dispense the words of eternal life in that manner which will be most pleasing to Him, and result in the eternal welfare of their fellow men.

Take the prophecies from the bible, and what would we have left? Certainly nothing very encouraging; it is they which assert the authenticity of the scriptures, it is them that point out the hope of the gospel and tell of its fulfilment. Then why throw them overboard, as it were? There could not be a subject of more importance. We are living at a period of the world when "to be living is sublime;" and who in the exercise of his common sense, and right judgment, would not thoroughly investigate this subject, and sift it to the very bottom to see if these "things are so?"— If the angels in Daniel's time desired to look into these things, why should not man, living in the nineteenth century, and in the end of the fourth universal kingdom, also search the oracles of God, and if possible find out the will of Christ concerning him?

But some will tell us that "secret things belong to God, but that which is revealed to us and to our children." Then if that which is revealed was intended for us, why not make a proper use of it? If it were not for some special purpose, it never would have been penned. Secret things undoubtedly belong to God, and there is no danger of our finding out what the seven thunders uttered; this is the only thing which was revealed to John, that has been sealed from us. This subject alone is sealed, why then say that all the prophecies are sealed? This is closing your eyes that you might not see, and stopping your ears that you might not hear and understand that Jesus Christ, the second Adam, is about to set up His everlasting kingdom and reign with His saints gloriously; then what an important thing to understand the prophecies. We have not to consult rapping spirits or necromancers, "for we have a more sure word of prophecy, whereunto ye do well if ye take heed.' He that runneth may read; and John was told expressly not to seal "the sayings of the prophecy of this book, for the time is at hand;" and if it were at hand in his time, it must now be at the door. Blessed is he that watches, and he who is prepared to meet his Saviour with joy and not with grief. What a blessed hope the children of God have in these last days! they are not looking through ages into a distant future, to see a land that is very far off, they behold it nigh at hand and by the grace of God expect soon to be made like Him, for they shall see Him as He is.

But then the nearness of the kingdom is a source of great consolation to the children of God; and that He is near, I believe can be substantiated beyond a doubt. We know that the budding of the trees proclaim approaching summer, so our Saviour says when ye see those signs spoken of, "know that it is nigh even th the door."

It is the earth in its primeval beauty that the saints are to possess and dwell in forever. It seems to me that some professors think that the kingdom of God is not good enough for them, and therefore imagine a place far beyond the bounds of time and space in some etherial, invisible region. They thus leave the hope of the gospel, and believe in fables. Well, if they do go up above the stars, they will not be with Christ; for he will come down with the holy city, the New Jerusalem, upon the earth; and "blessed are the meek; for they shall inherit the earth."

Brethren Orrock and Robinson have been laboring here, and their efforts have not been altogether useless. Many are rejoicing in the blessed hope, while others are enquiring the road to everlasting life.

Yours, looking for the coming of our blessed Lord and Master in 1854.

Buffalo, N. Y. H. M. M.

☞ We cut the following from a correspondent of the London Times:

Bassardschik is the last regular advanced post of the Turkish army in the Dobrudscha, from which reconnoitering parties are pushed forward and temporarily stationed in some of the deserted villages, whence they make constant incursions on the Russian outposts in the vicinity of Kara-su, Rassova, Beilik, &c. It is occupied at present by about 500 or 600 regular cavalry and about 3000 Bashi-Bazouks, 1200 of whom are quartered in the town, and the remainder in tents on the south side. The town is situated on the extremity of a gentle slope, surrounded on three sides by ground of a similar description. It presents a most desolate appearance, half of it having been destroyed by fire about a month ago; the remainder deserted by its inhabitants, and Bashi-Bazouks with their horses are now quartered within its ruined houses; these, with starved hungry dogs and cats, are the only living occupants of a fine town that must once have contained 6000 or 8000 inhabitants. It gives one the idea of a town lying under some grievous curse, "the abode of every unclean thing, the dwelling of beasts of prey," a term most applicable to some of its uncouth occupants, who stable their horses within its walls.

We traversed in our route splendid plains, but barren and laid waste, bearing all the marks war brings in its train that the most eloquent member of the late Peace Society could desire to witness;—ruined, burnt and deserted villages, neglected fields, the total absence of population; wells, which in this country are most valuable property, choked up with the barley which had been stored up for the ensuing year, gave to the whole scene a most dreary and melancholy aspect. This, we are told, is the state of the whole of the Dobrudscha, and by what we saw of the country, it appeared to have already been theatre of a long campaign.

☞ A letter from Constantinople says in reference to the recent assault of the Russians on Silistria:

The amount of the killed is not accurately known. Nevertheless one fact is certain, and that is, that the Russian army, though commanded by Paskiewitsch. will not be able to attempt anything serious against Silistria for some time to come.— It is said that the Russians have lost from 8,000 to 12,000 men. The French and English troops will now have time to come up.

FROM THE EAST COAST OF THE BLACK SEA. The Circassians are now masters of all the forts and fortified places which border the coast of their country. Souchum Kaleh, abandoned by the Russians, is now occupied by the Mingrelians. Schamyl has lately taken possession of Usurghet, a very important fortress defended by 20,000 Russians, who, after great loss, were obliged to abandon it with a vast amount of provisions and munitions of war.— Schamyl now marches with 120,000 men against Teflis, and he will then not be more than 24 hours distant from the capital of the Russian possessions in Georgia.

CALABACA, (Thessaly) May 10 (22).

"We exterminated, yesterday, the Turks whom we had kept surrounded for the last ten days. We have killed 500 of them, wounded many, and made 200 prisoners. We have also given chase to 2000 Arabs and Albanians, commanded by Halim Bey and Metzo Malijowa, who had come to their succor. Vanquished and starving, the Turks who escaped took flight last night, and abundoned five pieces of cannon in good condition, two stands of colors, munitions of war, clothing, the whole of their stores, their wounded, and their tents, of which we took possession.

But the greater part of those who fled were drowned in the Peneus, and the others are dispersed. The river is full of dead bodies, and the peasants bring them in quantities every moment to the camp. Thus, then, with the aid of Divine Providence, the most formidable camp of the Turks is annihilated, and the insurrection will gain ground. Having been informed to-day that Menel Pasha has destroyed Derendah by fire, I have just sent a corps of Macedonians, amounting to 900 men, and I hope that God will again bless our arms. "CH. HADJI PETROS."

In relation to the disposition of the Russian forces, we learn,

The divisions advancing southward to the Danube by Valhynia, Podolia, and Moldavia are stopped in their march, so as to confront the Austrian armies of Galicia, the Bukowina, and Transylvania, which command their right flank and their line of march, while a still larger force, belonging to the 1st and 2nd divisions of the Russian army, and reinforced by five regiments of Grenadiers, threatens the Austrian frontier to the northeast from the kingdom of Poland. These preparations for active hostilities against Austria are accompanied, as is well known at Vienna, by secret attempts of Russian agents in the south Slavonian provinces, and even in Italy, to excite disaffection and rebellion against the Austrian government. On both sides, therefore, the Courts of Vienna and St. Petersburgh have taken measures against one another which are not of a nature to be forgiven.

His (Kossuth's) oration at a meeting, convened at Sheffield to pronounce the cutlery sentiment on the present state of affairs, went simply to get Hungary to rouse against Austria—equivalent, in the existing condition of things, to becoming an ally of Russia, or, if events went the contrary way to what appearances indicate, throwing Austria into the arms of the Czar.

Austria, therefore, is the hinge on which the whole crisis turns.

The Baltic news affords nothing but the account of a brave exploit performed by the Arrogant and Hecla in attacking a Russian stronghold and cutting out some shipping. The Russian version describes the gallantry of their sharp shooters, and from the casualities it does appear as if the Minie rifle was beginning to prove itself a dangerous weapon against artillery.

☞ The failure of the harvest in the Holy Land, which has raised the price of food to an enormous height, added to the effects produced by the war and political disturbances, has caused a famine among the Jews of a most afflictive character.

In consequence of the great distress among the Jews in Palestine, M. Rothschild has just remitted, by one of his employees, a sum of fifty thousand francs, and American citizens have forwarded to their co-religionists 800,000 francs. It is announced that meetings with a view to further subscriptions will be held in London.

☞ We have been requested to publish the following hymn from the Pilgrim's Songster.— It should have appeared sooner, but in the pressure of business was forgotten.

The Lord, our Saviour will appear, will appear,
will appear;
The Midnight Cry proclaims him near.
What will you do in that day?

CHORUS.

Turn, turn sinner, sinner turn, sinner;
Turn, turn sinner, what will you do in that day.

The cry is up, the strife's begun,—Repeat.
And Armageddon's day rolls on,
What will you do in that day?

See Gabriel in the middle air, &c.
The trumpet sounding everywhere,
What will you do in that day?

Angels dispatched at his command, &c.
Now gather the saints from every land,
What will you do in that day?

I tell you, sinner, you'd better begin, &c.
The door'll be shut and you can't get in,
What will you do in that day?

Later from Europe.

More Fighting—Changes in the British Cabinet.

By the Canada, at Halifax June 21, we have seven days later news from Europe—dates to the 10th inst. The cotton and bread trade was dull. Reports from the Danube are favorable to the Turks. Silistria still held out, although it had been several times assaulted. An Anglo-French army of 70,000 men were on the march to relieve it. We hear nothing more of the Austrian ultimatum to Russia; but on the contrary a report was current, that the action of Austria was not likely to be favorable to the Western powers. The fleets in the Baltic and Black Sea were blockading the Russian strongholds.

Intense anxiety hangs on the fate of Silistria. The Russians are making desperate efforts to take it, and Marshal St. Arnaud has sent 70,000 men to relieve it, namely, 24,000 French, 15,000 British, and 30,000 Turks of Omar Pasha's force. The Russians have 70,000 besieging, and the assault continues day and night. They had made a practicable breach, but a freshet in the Danube prevented storming. Advices of May 25th reported that it might hold out for 15 days.

The commandant, Mussa Pasha, says he will blow up himself and the fortress, rather than surrender. During the night of May 29th, the Russians made three attempts to storm, but were repulsed with fearful loss, leaving 1500 dead beneath the ramparts. The Turks also made a sortie, and effected a dreadful massacre of the Russians. The number of their wounded and slain is reported to be 4500.

The headquarters of the allied army are at Varna, and it is calculated that by the 7th the Anglo-French force would be at Shumla, thence to Silistria, being three days march; consequently, by the 10th, or say 15th of June, would be in face of the enemy, when battle must ensue.

There had been considerable fighting elsewhere. The Governor of Widdin writes that on May 31st a severe affair occurred at Slatina, where the Turks defeated 2000 Russians, killed 500, and captured their artillery.

Other encounters, more or less sanguinary, are also reported. All the Russians at Bucharest are ordered to advance to the Danube.

Black Sea. A despatch from Admiral Hamelin, dated May 21st, states briefly that during the preceding 20 days nothing had been done except cruising off Sebastopol, without meeting with the enemy. A letter from a doctor captured in the frigate Tiger says that the Russians treat their prisoners with great kindness.

Baltic. Nothing further has been done in the Baltic. Sir Charles Napier's own division, on leaving Hango Roads, will proceed along the northern coast of the Gulf of Finland, to within twenty miles of Helsingfors. Admiral Corry's division, including the French squadron, will cruise off the southern coast, until arriving near Cronstadt. Both divisions will then unite and anchor in line across the Gulf, thus cutting off the enemy's communication with St. Petersburg by sea. The French fleet, 22 strong, passed Rugen on the 4th, steering northeast.

A force of steam gunboats is being fitted out with haste in England. Five English ships of war are on their way to blockade the White Sea.

Asia. Letters from Kars of May 5 report the effective force under Gen. Guyon and Kerim Pasha 20,000 men, with 64 guns and two regiments of Arab cavalry. The Circassians, under Schamyl, were preparing to attack Tiflis.

Greece. An Athens despatch of May 29 confirms the report that the insurgents had gained a victory in Thessaly. The Turks lost 700 killed, many prisoners, and five guns. The Turks however, were successful in other quarters, and the Epirus was tranquil.

The new Greek ministry have taken the oaths and satisfied the requirements of the Porte.— The Porte consequently refrains from further measures against Greece.

In Poland none but government employees are allowed arms. No Russian ship is to be allowed in Morocco ports during the war. Important movements relative to the war were going on in the German States, but nothing decisive was known.

Austria and Prussia. A meeting between the Emperor of Austria and King of Prussia, attended by their respective ministers was to take place on the 9th, at Teschen, on the Saxon frontier. It was suspected that the meeting would not increase the cordiality of Austria towards the western powers; especially as it has transpired that Count Nostig is bearer of a letter from the Emperor of Austria to the Emperor Nicholas. It is however stated that Prussia had sent a note advising Russia to accept Austria's invitation to withdraw from the Turkish principalities. There is a rumor that Russia is inclined to authorize Austria to propose an armistice.

Turkey. The Turkish ministry has been changed. Mehemet Kepresli Pasha is appointed grand visier. Halil Pasha succeeds as minister of marine.

Great Britain.—Lord John Russell laid before Parliament a treaty with Spain, respecting the Cuban slave trade. Government has agreed to the appointment of a secretary of war; the duke of Newcastle being the man. Lord John Russell has [illegible] made an eloquent speech in Sheffield on the nationality of Poland. Ten thousand sabres have been taken from the Tower of London to equip an equal number of Turkish Cavalry.

The overland India mail from Calcutta May 1st, and Canton April 20th, report that the insurgents, assisted by Europeans, had driven the imperialists from Shanghai on the 4th of April.

France.—There had been several defalcations in the Paris stock exchange, but not of serious import. Admiral Baudin is dead, aged about 70. M. Turgot returns from Madrid on leave; he is still suffering from the wound given by Mr Soule.

Spain.—Lord Howden, the British minister, is to have a command in the east, and is succeeded by Mr Otway. Six war steamers were to be sent to Cuba, instead of four; they will take out six thousand additional troops.

Portugal.—The Avanto, a semi-official journal, states that Portugal will, if possible, maintain entire neutrality.

The double conscription is causing great distress throughout Lombardy. Substitutes cost 8,000 francs. Another miracle was reported from Rome.

Later.

Silistria still in the hands of the Turks. Great Slaughter of the Russians. Bombardment of Helsingfors.

By the Atlantic, at New York, from Liverpool, yesterday, we have four days later advices from Europe. There are many unreliable rumors, as usual; but the chief points of intelligence are the following:

It is reported that the Turks made a sally from Silistria on the 8th, and destroyed the approaches of the besiegers, filling up mines before Silistria. The Russians suffered severe loss by springing Turkish countermines. Russian reports say that Mussa Pasha, commander of Silistria, was killed by a cannon ball.

Sir Charles Napier was at anchor off Sveaborg on the 7th of June. The Russian fleet, consisting of ten line of battle ships, was reported to be anchored behind the batteries.— Admiral Dundas telegraphed Government that the Russian authorities had voluntarily permitted French and English vessels to leave Odessa.

The fortress of Redout Kale was bombarded on the 19th of May, by a portion of the allied fleet, and entirely destroyed. Schamyl had taken the important Russian fortresses of Usurghet, and was marching with 60,000 men against Teflis.

One report states that Russia has offered to evacuate the Principalities on condition the Western powers will re-establish the "status quo auto bellum." Another rumor is that Russia has unconditionally refused.

In the House of Commons, Sir Chas. Wood said that Government would not confirm the report that Chinese insurgents, assisted by foreigners, had driven the imperialists from Shanghae.

The first detachment of troops for Cuba sailed from Cadiz on the first of June in the steamer "Isabella Catholica." Overland advices state that a Russian fleet is off Singapore. The report of Dost Mahommed having formed an alliance with Russia, is considered doubtful.

The very last advices say that Napier changed shots with Helsingfors, but nothing decisive. There was considerable fighting at the outposts of Silistria. The Russions were making immense sacrifices to carry the place, but it is thought without effect before the arrival of the allied troops.

The fleets in the Baltic Sea are quiet. Omar Pasha was at Shumla. Paskiewitch at Jassy. Negotiations were busy but obscure. It is said the Czar rejects the Austrian Note, and was collecting Cossacks to threaten Transylvania.— The result of the Austria Prussian conference at Teschin is not known, but supposed to be favorable to the western powers.

The London Standard states that the British war steamer Encounter, and the United States sloop Plymouth were engaged in the attack on the Imperialist's forces at Shanghai, on the 4th of April. On board the Plymouth George McConkie was killed, and four others wounded severely. Capt Pearson, of the American ship Rose Standish, was severely wounded. The victors captured two twelves, four sixes, and four eighteen pounder guns. As yet we have no detailed account of the engagement.

Obituary.

Died, in Bridgewater, Vt, May 25, Sister Betsey, wife of Bro. John P. Woods, aged 37 years. On the 27th we tried to comfort the friends with the words of consolation given by the Apostle Paul, 1 Thess 4: 13–18. She sleeps in Jesus, but she will awake this year thank God. Amen. S. B. MUNN.

ing that they are in the discharge of their duty, that of giving meat to their fellow men in due season. What a solemn and important station the minister of God fills in this last age of the world! If he flinch in the least from duty, God will require it at his hand. It is my prayer, and it ought to be the prayer of every sincere christian, that the Lord would help His ministering servants to dispense the words of eternal life in that manner which will be most pleasing to Him, and result in the eternal welfare of their fellow men.

Take the prophecies from the bible, and what would we have left? Certainly nothing very encouraging; it is they which assert the authenticity of the scriptures, it is them that point out the hope of the gospel and tell of its fulfilment. Then why throw them overboard, as it were? There could not be a subject of more importance. We are living at a period of the world when "to be living is sublime;" and who in the exercise of his common sense, and right judgment, would not thoroughly investigate this subject, and sift it to the very bottom to see if these "things are so?"— If the angels in Daniel's time desired to look into these things, why should not man, living in the nineteenth century, and in the end of the fourth universal kingdom, also search the oracles of God, and if possible find out the will of Christ concerning him?

But some will tell us that "secret things belong to God, but that which is revealed to us and to our children." Then if that which is revealed was intended for us, why not make a proper use of it? If it were not for some special purpose, it never would have been penned. Secret things undoubtedly belong to God, and there is no danger of our finding out what the seven thunders uttered; this is the only thing which was revealed to John, that has been sealed from us. This subject alone is sealed, why then say that all the prophecies are sealed? This is closing your eyes that you might not see, and stopping your ears that you might not hear and understand that Jesus Christ, the second Adam, is about to set up His everlasting kingdom and reign with His saints gloriously; then what an important thing to understand the prophecies. We have not to consult rapping spirits or necromancers, "for we have a more sure word of prophecy, whereunto ye do well if ye take heed.', He that runneth may read; and John was told expressly not to seal "the sayings of the prophecy of this book, for the time is at hand;" and if it were at hand in his time, it must now be at the door. Blessed is he that watches, and he who is prepared to meet his Saviour with joy and not with grief. What a blessed hope the children of God have in these last days! they are not looking through ages into a distant future, to see a land that is very far off, they behold it nigh at hand and by the grace of God expect soon to be made like Him, for they shall see Him as He is.

But then the nearness of the kingdom is a source of great consolation to the children of God; and that He is near, I believe can be substantiated beyond a doubt. We know that the budding of the trees proclaim approaching summer, so our Saviour says when ye see those signs spoken of, "know that it is nigh even th the door."

It is the earth in its primeval beauty, that the saints are to possess and dwell in forever. It seems to me that some professors think that the kingdom of God is not good enough for them, and therefore imagine a place far beyond the bounds of time and space in some etherial, invisible region. They thus leave the hope of the gospel, and believe in fables. Well, if they do go up above the stars, they will not be with Christ; for he will come down, with the holy city, the New Jerusalem, upon the earth; and "blessed are the meek; for they shall inherit the earth."

Brethren Orrock and Robinson have been laboring here, and their efforts have not been altogether useless. Many are rejoicing in the blessed hope, while others are enquiring the road to everlasting life.

Yours, looking for the coming of our blessed Lord and Master in 1854.

Buffalo, N. Y. H. M. M.

☞ We cut the following from a correspondent of the London Times:

Bassardschik is the last regular advanced post of the Turkish army in the Dobrudscha, from which reconnoitering parties are pushed forward and temporarily stationed in some of the deserted villages, whence they make constant incursions on the Russian outposts in the vicinity of Kara-su, Rassova, Beilik, &c. It is occupied at present by about 500 or 600 regular cavalry and about 3000 Bashi-Bazouks, 1200 of whom are quartered in the town, and the remainder in tents on the south side. The town is situated on the extremity of a gentle slope, surrounded on three sides by ground of a similar description. It presents a most desolate appearance, half of it having been destroyed by fire about a month ago; the remainder deserted by its inhabitants, and Bashi-Bazouks with their horses are now quartered within its ruined houses; these, with starved hungry dogs and cats, are the only living occupants of a fine town that must once have contained 6000 or 8000 inhabitants. It gives one the idea of a town lying under some grievous curse, "the abode of every unclean thing, the dwelling of beasts of prey," a term most applicable to some of its uncouth occupants, who stable their horses within its walls.

We traversed in our route splendid plains, but barren and laid waste, bearing all the marks war brings in its train that the most eloquent member of the late Peace Society could desire to witness;— ruined, burnt and deserted villages, neglected fields, the total absence of population; wells, which in this country are most valuable property, choked up with the barley which had been stored up for the ensuing year, gave to the whole scene a most dreary and melancholy aspect. This, we are told, is the state of the whole of the Dobrudscha, and by what we saw of the country, it appeared to have already been theatre of a long campaign.

☞ A letter from Constantinople says in reference to the recent assault of the Russians on Silistria:

The amount of the killed is not accurately known. Nevertheless one fact is certain, and that is, that the Russian army, though commanded by Paskiewitsch. will not be able to attempt anything serious against Silistria for some time to come.— It is said that the Russians have lost from 8,000 to 12,000 men. The French and English troops will now have time to come up.

From the East Coast of the Black Sea The Circassians are now masters of all the forts and fortified places which border the coast of their country. Souchum Kaleh, abandoned by the Russians, is now occupied by the Mingrelians. Schamyl has lately taken possession of Usurghet, a very important fortress defended by 20,-000 Russians, who, after great loss, were obliged to abandon it with a vast amount of provisions and munitions of war.— Schamyl now marches with 120,000 men against Teflis, and he will then not be more than 24 hours distant from the capital of the Russian possessions in Georgia.

Calabaca, (Thessaly) May 10 (22).

"We exterminated, yesterday, the Turks whom we had kept surrounded for the last ten days. We have killed 500 of them, wounded many, and made 200 prisoners. We have also given chase to 2000 Arabs and Albanians, commanded by Halim Bey and Metzo Malijowa, who had come to their succor. Vanquished and starving, the Turks who escaped took flight last night, and abandoned five pieces of cannon in good condition, two stands of colors, munitions of war, clothing, the whole of their stores, their wounded, and their tents, of which we took possession.

But the greater part of those who fled were drowned in the Peneus, and the others are dispersed. The river is full of dead bodies, and the peasants bring them in quantities every moment to the camp. Thus, then, with the aid of Divine Providence, the most formidable camp of the Turks is annihilated, and the insurrection will gain ground. Having been informed to-day that Menel Pasha has destroyed Derendah by fire, I have just sent a corps of Macedonians, amounting to 900 men, and I hope that God will again bless our arms. "Ch. Hadji Petros."

In relation to the disposition of the Russian forces, we learn,

The divisions advancing southward to the Danube by Valhynia, Podolia, and Moldavia are stopped in their march, so as to confront the Austrian armies of Galicia, the Bukowina, and Transylvania, which command their right flank and their line of march, while a still larger force, belonging to the 1st and 2nd divisions of the Russian army, and reinforced by five regiments of Grenadiers, threatens the Austrian frontier to the northeast from the kingdom of Poland. These preparations for active hostilities against Austria are accompanied, as is well known at Vienna, by secret attempts of Russian agents in the south Slavonian provinces, and even in Italy, to excite disaffection and rebellion against the Austrian government. On both sides, therefore, the Courts of Vienna and St. Petersburgh have taken measures against one another which are not of a nature to be forgiven.

His (Kossuth's) oration at a meeting, convened at Sheffield to pronounce the cutlery sentiment on the present state of affairs, went simply to get Hungary to rouse against Austria—equivalent, in the existing condition of things, to becoming an ally of Russia, or, if events went the contrary way to what appearances indicate, throwing Austria into the arms of the Czar.

Austria, therefore, is the hinge on which the whole crisis turns.

The Baltic news affords nothing but the account of a brave exploit performed by the Arrogant and Hecla in attacking a Russian stronghold and cutting out some shipping. The Russian version describes the gallantry of their sharp shooters, and from the casualities it does appear as if the Minie rifle was beginning to prove itself a dangerous weapon against artillery.

☞ The failure of the harvest in the Holy Land, which has raised the price of food to an enormous height, added to the effects produced by the war and political disturbances, has caused a famine among the Jews of a most afflictive character.

In consequence of the great distress among the Jews in Palestine, M. Rothschild has just remitted, by one of his employees, a sum of fifty thousand francs, and American citizens have forwarded to their co-religionists 300,000 francs. It is announced that meetings with a view to further subscriptions will be held in London.

☞ We have been requested to publish the following hymn from the Pilgrim's Songster.— It should have appeared sooner, but in the pressure of business was forgotten:

The Lord, our Saviour will appear, will appear,
will appear;
The Midnight Cry proclaims him near.
What will you do in that day?

CHORUS.

Turn, turn sinner, sinner turn, sinner;
Turn, turn sinner, what will you do in that day.

The cry is up, the strife's begun,—Repeat.
And Armageddon's day rolls on,
What will you do in that day?

See Gabriel in the middle air, &c.
The trumpet sounding everywhere,
What will you do in that day?

Angels dispatched at his command, &c.
Now gather the saints from every land,
What will you do in that day?

I tell you, sinner, you'd better begin, &c.
The door'll be shut and you can't get in,
What will you do in that day?

Later from Europe.

More Fighting—Changes in the British Cabinet.

By the Canada, at Halifax June 21, we have seven days later news from Europe—dates to the 10th inst. The cotton and bread trade was dull. Reports from the Danube are favorable to the Turks. Silistria still held out, although it had been several times assaulted. An Anglo-French army of 70,000 men were on the march to relieve it. We hear nothing more of the Austrian ultimatum to Russia, but on the contrary a report was current, that the action of Austria was not likely to be favorable to the Western powers. The fleets in the Baltic and Black Sea were blockading the Russian strongholds.

Intense anxiety hangs on the fate of Silistria. The Russians are making desperate efforts to take it, and Marshal St. Arnaud has sent 70,000 men to relieve it, namely, 24,000 French, 15,-000 British, and 30,000 Turks of Omar Pasha's force. The Russians have 70,000 besieging, and the assault continues day and night. They had made a practicable breach, but a freshet in the Danube prevented storming. Advices of May 25th reported that it might hold out for 15 days.

The commandant, Mussa Pasha, says he will blow up himself and the fortress, rather than surrender. During the night of May 29th, the Russians made three attempts to storm, but were repulsed with fearful loss, leaving 1500 dead beneath the ramparts. The Turks also made a sortie, and effected a dreadful massacre of the Russians. The number of their wounded and slain is reported to be 4500.

The headquarters of the allied army are at Varna, and it is calculated that by the 7th the Anglo-French force would be at Shumla, thence to Silistria, being three days march; consequently, by the 10th, or say 15th of June, would be in face of the enemy, when battle must ensue.

There had been considerable fighting elsewhere. The Governor of Widdin writes that on May 31st a severe affair occurred at Slatina, where the Turks defeated 2000 Russians, killed 500, and captured their artillery.

Other encounters, more or less sanguinary, are also reported. All the Russians at Bucharest are ordered to advance to the Danube.

Black Sea. A despatch from Admiral Hamelin, dated May 21st, states briefly that during the preceding 20 days nothing had been done except cruising off Sebastopol, without meeting with the enemy. A letter from a doctor captured in the frigate Tiger says that the Russians treat their prisoners with great kindness.

Baltic. Nothing further has been done in the Baltic. Sir Charles Napier's own division, on leaving Hango Roads, will proceed along the northern coast of the Gulf of Finland, to within twenty miles of Helsingfors. Admiral Corry's division, including the French squadron, will cruise off the southern coast, until arriving near Cronstadt. Both divisions will then unite and anchor in line across the Gulf, thus cutting off the enemy's communication with St. Petersburg by sea. The French fleet, 22 strong, passed Rugen on the 4th, steering northeast.

A force of steam gunboats is being fitted out with haste in England. Five English ships of war are on their way to blockade the White Sea.

Asia. Letters from Kars of May 5 report the effective force under Gen. Guyon and Kerim Pasha 20,000 men, with 64 guns and two regiments of Arab cavalry. The Circassians, under Schamyl, were preparing to attack Tiflis.

Greece. An Athens despatch of May 29 confirms the report that the insurgents had gained a victory in Thessaly. The Turks lost 700 killed, many prisoners, and five guns. The Turks however, were successful in other quarters, and the Epirus was tranquil.

The new Greek ministry have taken the oaths and satisfied the requirements of the Porte.— The Porte consequently refrains from further measures against Greece.

In Poland none but government employees are allowed arms. No Russian ship is to be allowed in Morocco ports during the war. Important movements relative to the war were going on in the German States, but nothing decisive was known.

Austria and Prussia. A meeting between the Emperor of Austria and King of Prussia, attended by their respective ministers was to take place on the 9th, at Teschen, on the Saxon frontier. It was suspected that the meeting would not increase the cordiality of Austria towards the western powers; especially as it has transpired that Count Nostig is bearer of a letter from the Emperor of Austria to the Emperor Nicholas. It is however stated that Prussia had sent a note advising Russia to accept Austria's invitation to withdraw from the Turkish principalities. There is a rumor that Russia is inclined to authorize Austria to propose an armistice.

Turkey. The Turkish ministry has been changed. Mehemet Kepresli Pasha is appointed grand vizier. Halil Pasha succeeds as minister of marine.

Great Britain.—Lord John Russell laid before Parliament a treaty with Spain, respecting the Cuban slave trade. Government has agreed to the appointment of a secretary of war; the duke of Newcastle being the man. Lord John Russell has accepted office as President of Council, remaining in the House of Commons. Sir Geo. Grey colonial secretary. Kossuth made an eloquent speech in Sheffield on the nationality of Poland. Ten thousand sabres have been taken from the Tower of London to equip an equal number of Turkish Cavalry.

The overland India mail from Calcutta May 1st, and Canton April 20th, report that the insurgents, assisted by Europeans, had driven the imperialists from Shanghai, on the 4th of April.

France.—There had been several defalcations in the Paris stock exchange, but not of serious import. Admiral Baudin is dead, aged about 70. M. Turgot returns from Madrid on leave; he is still suffering from the wound given by Mr Soulé.

Spain.—Lord Howden, the British minister, is to have command in the east, and is succeeded by Mr Otway. Six war steamers were to be sent to Cuba, instead of four; they will take out six thousand additional troops.

Portugal.—The Avanto, a semi-official journal, states that Portugal will, if possible, maintain entire neutrality.

The double conscription is causing great distress throughout Lombardy. Substitutes cost 8,000 francs. Another miracle was reported from Rome.

Later.

Silistria still in the hands of the Turks. Great Slaughter of the Russians. Bombardment of Helsingfors.

By the Atlantic, at New York, from Liverpool, yesterday, we have four days later advices from Europe. There are many unreliable rumors, as usual; but the chief points of intelligence are the following:

It is reported that the Turks made a sally from Silistria on the 8th, and destroyed the approaches of the besiegers, filling up mines before Silistria. The Russians suffered severe loss by springing Turkish countermines. Russian reports say that Mussa Pasha, commander of Silistria, was killed by a cannon ball.

Sir Charles Napier was at anchor off Sveaborg on the 7th of June. The Russian fleet, consisting of ten line of battle ships, was reported to be anchored behind the batteries.— Admiral Dundas telegraphed Government that the Russian authorities had voluntarily permitted French and English vessels to leave Odessa.

The fortress of Redout Kale was bombarded on the 19th of May, by a portion of the allied fleet, and entirely destroyed, Schamyl had taken the important Russian fortresses of Usurghet, and was marching with 60,000 men against Teflis.

One report states that Russia has offered to evacuate the Principalities on condition the Western powers will re-establish the "status quo auto bellum." Another rumor is that Russia has unconditionally refused.

In the House of Commons, Sir Chas. Wood said that Government would not confirm the report that Chinese insurgents, assisted by foreigners, had driven the imperialists from Shanghae.

The first detachment of troops for Cuba sailed from Cadiz on the first of June in the steamer "Isabella Catholica." Overland advices state that a Russian fleet is off Singapore. The report of Dost Mahommed having formed an alliance with Russia, is considered doubtful.

The very last advices say that Napier changed shots with Helsingfors, but nothing decisive. There was considerable fighting at the outposts of Silistria. The Russions were making immense sacrifices to carry the place, but it is thought without effect before the arrival of the allied troops.

The fleets in the Baltic Sea are quiet. Omar Pasha was at Shumla. Paskiewitch at Jassy. Negotiations were busy but obscure. It is said the Czar rejects the Austrian Note, and was collecting Cossacks to threaten Transylvania.— The result of the Austria Prussian conference at Teschin is not known, but supposed to be favorable to the western powers.

The London Standard states that the British war steamer Encounter, and the United States sloop Plymouth were engaged in the attack on the Imperialist's forces at Shanghai, on the 4th of April. On board the Plymouth George McConkie was killed, and four others wounded severely. Capt Pearson, of the American ship Rose Standish, was severely wounded. The victors captured two twelves, four sixes, and four eighteen pounder guns. As yet we have no detailed account of the engagement.

Therefore, those that know of a field of labor where good can be done, and wish to have a Tent Meeting, will please write to me immediately, so that I can make the necessary arrangements in order to meet the wishes of the Brethren.

Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers.—Isa. 26 : 20.

O who would love to linger
In this dark world of sin,
When all the pure and holy
Have bid farewell to time;
When all the wheat is garner'd
In heaven's sheltering dome,
Within those blessed mansions
Safe from the coming storm!

O who would love to linger
When graveyards have been spoiled,
And sinners left to slumber
Beneath the damp earth's mould;
When the last, lovely morning
For trusting hearts has dawn'd,
Who'd share the night of mourning
With mortals left behind?

O who would love to linger?
The artless, prattling child
Acts on the stage no longer
To cheer us with its smile;
Like some dark forest lonely,
In winter's cheerless hour,
Without a sparkling fountain,
Or warbling bird, or flower.

O who would love to linger
In this cold, starless clime,
When Jesus' pitying spirit
No longer beams on man
With rays of sunny gladness,
The aching heart to cheer,
And scatter clouds of sadness,
O who would linger here?

What farther dreadful judgment
Will then convulse this world,
I'll not attempt to picture,
This awful scene unfold;
But leave for inspiration
To lift that vail so drear,
And show there's no probation
For those that linger here.

O I would love to linger
Where all the sinless meet,
And bands of loving children
In bliss each other greet;
Like stars forever shining
In Jesus' diadem,
Where anthems sweet are chiming,
I'd linger long with them.

VESTA N. CUDWORTH.

Charlemont, Mass.

Behold the Bridegroom cometh!

Hark! what sound is this I'm hearing;
Peace and joy it brings to me;
On the breeze it comes so cheering,
That it causes grief to flee.
Soon he comes—the cry is speeding,
And it gives a certain sound;
Now the household it is feeding,
Though iniquity abounds.

While some say, my Lord's delaying,
The good servant feeds his sheep
With the truth that God has spoken,
(And his word he sure will keep,)
Saying to the world around him,
Now "Behold the Bridegroom comes,"
Soon in Glory you will meet Him,
While the sinner meets his doom.

I will speed thee—news so cheering,
For it makes my soul rejoice—
I will preach it—nothing fearing,
Till I hear the Savior's voice,
Saying to me come up higher,
Enter in and be at rest.
Then I'll shout above the fire,
And sit down with all the blest.

Bethel, Ct., 1854. GEORGE L. TEEPLE.

"But as the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be."—Matt. 24 : 37.

This text is in the midst of that memorable discourse of Jesus Christ to his disciples as he sat upon the mount of Olives—a discourse replete with interest, being in answer to a question of great moment to the disciples of Jesus Christ, viz: "What shall be the sign of thy coming and the end of the world?" Jesus Christ then proceeds to answer the question propounded, by placing prominent way marks on the great rail road of time: Guide Boards, too conspicuous to be misunderstood by any that will take the trouble to look in the direction where Christ promised to erect them. But the day and hour for his 2d coming he could not give them, for to communicate that information to the Church was the exclusive prerogative of the Father. But it was his to set up way-marks which would enable his disciples to discern the signs of the times, that they might know when to lift up their heads, and when the kingdom of God was nigh at hand. For this purpose he gives them a precedent of Noah's case. This example is what I wish to speak of more particularly; for if the Church now living know they have passed all those way-marks set up by the Savior in the 24th and 25th of Matt., the moral aspect of the world, the professed Church, and the true Church bear a striking resemblance to the days of Noah.

Let us now turn our attention to the oracles of God, and see whether indeed there is a marked affinity between the inhabitants of Noah's time and those of the present day. That Worldlings, or those who make no pretension to godliness, that many of this class of the community were steeped in crime of the blackest dye is apparent from Gen. 6 : 5, 13. "God saw that the wickedness of man was great, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart, (says the Heb. [illegible] not only the imagination but also the purposes and desires) was evil and that continually."

In the 13th v., God assigns to Noah, as a reason for the destruction of all flesh, that they had filled the earth with VIOLENCE! If this violence was of a nature, both mental and physical, then it is strikingly analogous to the present time! We have only to look about us, in our own New England, which I believe is generally conceded to be the moral Eden of the world, to establish this fact. Just glance at the statistics of crime in our most moral cities, and say if the earth is not filled with VIOLENCE.

In the 2d place we will look at the nominal Church of Noah's day. It is obvious, from the language of Gen. 6 : 2, 4, that they indulged in the lust of the eye, they chose beauty, instead of piety,—they prefered a beautiful exterior to that which was not corruptible, and that which was in the sight of God of great price! They undoubtedly desired an illustrious progeny highly educated in all the ornamental, as well as the more useful branches of literature, that they might vie with the aristocracy of the age; in fact that their children might become "men of renown!"—The account of the professed Church is given briefly in Gen. 6th. It is truthful, but in perfect keeping with God's manner of recording historical facts, e. g. notice the brevity of Enoch's memoir. For a better understanding of this antediluvian Church, let us consult the sacred oracles.

To join, and remain joined to the Church of God, is, according to his word, an up hill business! The members of this Church, which are few in number, are called servants! soldiers! &c., implying action of a laborious nature, and such action as will cause the world to hate them.

According to Isa. 2d, the nominal house of God in the LAST DAYS is highly exalted. Not only exalted but established in a conspicuous place; and instead of a few way-worn pilgrims making their way thither through a rough and thorny path, all nations glide smoothly into it! The term "flow," denotes an easy ingress to the nominal Church. But the 6th v. of this ch. makes it very apparent they were a God forsaken Church!

Paul's account of the nominal Church in the last days corresponds exactly with Isa. Turn to 2d Tim. 3d ch., and read 5 verses. Here we have it, they are not only proud! selfish! and pleasure lovers, but they are despisers of those that are humble and good. He does not say, they beat or imprison these good humble souls, but they despise them.

Let us bear in mind this is a true description of the nominal Church in the last days. Then (the Savior's words for it) such a state of things existed just prior to the flood. Let me ask if this deplorable state of things is not now manifest, cast our eye which way we will? Well, thus it was in the days of Noah, and thus it will be at the coming of the Son of man.

In the 3d place let us notice the position of the true Church of God in the days of Noah. They had but one minister, and he a farmer! But notwithstanding, God approved him and gave him the appellation of a righteous preacher. Whether he was particularly eloquent is not stated; but as God always chooses efficient agents to carry out his purposes, we may rest assured he was a man of sufficient talent to preach God's truth! And this he did faithfully, it appears, about one hundred and twenty years.

But did this faithful preaching produce great accessions to the Church? Nay, verily, the solemn and awful prediction of the end of the world by this preacher, neither disturbed the festivities or pleasure-circles of the gay, nor interrupted the social and enterprising plans of the more sober. They knew not, because they believed not, the little flock of believers numbering but eight, including their minister. And they occupied a position that would make them appear ridiculous in the eyes of the world in case of a failure!—Their all was INVOLVED!! even thus will it be in the days when the Son of man is revealed.

Dearly beloved family of God, are we occupying such a position at the present? or are we afraid to believe the preachers of righteousness and venture into the Ark? do you meditate upon the possibility of a failure? Look again, and see whether we have not passed all those way-marks the Savior placed on the stream of time! if so, rest assured the next thing is the "King in his beauty." O fear not to enter the Ark! How superlatively ridiculous Noah would have appeared issuing from that Ark, if the flood had not come, with all those beasts in his train in sight of the gospel-hardened sinners he had so faithfully warned!! No doubt he suffered temptations of this kind during his ministerial labors. But was he left of God to be confounded? has not God assured us that those who trust in him shall never be confounded?

I would like to ask some of the doubting ones, whether there is a fear of offending God in venturing out on the "Midnight Cry" with all the evidence we are in possession of, elicited from God's word? Or do you fear the mortification you will experience in case the time should be protracted a few months? If the latter be the case, rest assured that the old man yet lives! As the time drew near there were certain developments tending to strengthen Noah's faith. The wild beasts' coming in pairs and entering the Ark of their own accord, must have greatly confirmed his faith.

Let us turn our eye to the Eastern World, and see whether there is not something to strengthen us in our present position. What mean those stupendous preparations for war? Does it not look as if the inventive genius of this 19th century were on the stretch to invent and construct implements to destroy human life? Does it not appear as if preparations were being made for the "slain of the Lord to lie from one end of the earth to the other?" Then taking a retrospect of the past, can we not discern the hand of God in the movement of the Church? Is it not wonderful that some of our eagle-eyed antagonists, whose reputation stood high in Theological learning, did not discover our mistake? But this was not God's order. When the jots and tittles of his word had been fulfilled in the tarrying time, he would have us be our own correctors!—Amen, "even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight." Now, Brethren and Sisters, let us remember the position of the true Church in Noah's day; believe and trust in God, and soon we shall see the "lofty spires of the New Jerusalem."

Your Sister waiting for the Lord,

BEULAH MATHEWSON.

New Hartford, May 11, 1854.

The year of Jubilee.

Dear Bro. Merriam:—Grace, mercy and peace, from God the Father, and Christ Jesus, our Lord, be with you, Amen. I thank the Lord, whom I serve, and Jesus Christ, our Lord and Savior, that he has spared my life till the present time, and granted me this opportunity of addressing a few lines to you, and to the Brethren, through the medium of "The Crisis." I do thank the good Lord that he caused the Brethren to send "The Crisis" out into the world, for I believe that it is meat in due season. "Blessed is that servant, whom his Lord when he cometh shall find so doing" Matt. 24 : 46. It is food to my soul. It is a soul-inspiring little messenger, "flying through the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth" saying, "fear God and give glory to Him; for the hour of his Judgment is come: and worship him that made heaven and earth." Yes, he angel is now flying through the midst of heaven, crying with a loud voice, Rev. 14 : 6, 7. Yes, Brethren, God and the Lamb are alone worthy of adoration and praise; for we are in perilous times, and Noahs are out preaching, in every part of the land, the end of all flesh; and few, very few there are that believe it. O my God, cannot some yet be compelled to come into the ark? Soon the wrath of a just but indignant God will be poured out on the inhabitants of the earth as it was in the days of Noah, only it will be accomplished by the instrumentality of fire instead of water. O my Lord, my Lord, if it be possible, remove the blindness from their eyes, that they may be saved, is my prayer.

I send you an article on the days of the flood, that I found in a pamphlet, which I have altered from the original, making some addition, which, if you think proper, you may insert.

Noah and the Flood.

At length the long expected day arrived which was to show that his labors and hopes were not in vain, which was to put an eternal end to the scoffs and exultations of his enemies. The tremendous morning began to lower, the heavens gathered blackness. Angry tempests conflicted in the skies, the red lightnings curled over the world. Word was spread that Noah and his family had entered into the ark. The world began to look serious. Presently floods of water pour from the skies; some now begin to turn their eyes toward the Ark; others stand doubting; others dare still to scoff. The waters go on to increase; the channels of the rivers are full and overflowing. The waters begin to rise in the streets. Some go into their houses; others, more intimidated, hasten to the hills; others are convinced, and with paleness of death are seen wading toward the Ark. The fountains of the great deep are now broken up—the waters rise more rapidly, and begin to rush with impetuous force. With difficulty they stand against the stream. They struggle for their lives to reach the ark. Thousands come; some wading, some swimming, some sinking, some hanging to the ark with the grasp of death, all screaming for admission. But it is too late. Time was when the Ark was open and they might have enterted in; but that time is past. Where are now those tongues which derided the enormous vessel, and the man who made it? What think you now of him, who, for more than a century, has borne the character of a madman?—A thousand worlds for his condition now. Those nearest the Ark cry and plead for admission, but in vain. The waters roar; the Ark is taken up; they sink and are seen no more. By this time every wretch on earth is convinced. Hear their cries from the tops of the houses, which are answered by lamentations from the hills. See the armies that are collected on the mountains. How like frightened sheep they crowd together. Now the waters, roaring and foaming, have reached their feet. They flee back to the highest mountain, the floods pursue them there; some climb the lofty oaks; the waves overtake them there. They flee to the highest branches and for a time have an opportunity to reflect. Hear their cries, "How could I have disbelieved the Prophet of the Lord? O how I have scoffed at his preaching! If I had only listened to his warning, I might have been saved.—Where now is Noah? Safe in the Ark, and the door is shut, and I cannot go in." From the topmost boughs the impetuous torrent sweeps them. The Ark comes by—that despised but blessed family are safe. It sails over the heads of their revilers and persecutors, until they rest on Ararat.

The same terrors will seize the unbelieving world, when the Son of man appears. As it was in the days of Noah, so shall the coming of the Son of man be. When we reflect on the wretched antediluvians, we perceive their folly in not believing. But sinners repeat the same folly now that they did then. God has sent our Noahs to tell them that he will destroy them with a flood of fire, if they do not repent and come to the Ark of safety. And how do they receive it? They call them fools and crazy and all manner of epithets, and ask when are you going up?

The destruction is certain, the end is near, and there is no escape but in the Ark. They spend their time in scoffing at the serious apprehensions of the children of God, and contemning the Ark. Even men calling themselves professors of religion scoff, revile and smite their fellow-servants. But the time will soon come when they will call for the door to be opened, and it cannot. They will say, "Lord, Lord, open unto us; and he will say, "I know you not," when the sluices of vengeance shall be unstopped; when the heavens shall be on fire and the earth shall rock beneat their feet; when all the elements shall make war on man; when they shall call on rocks and mountains to fall on them and hide them; when more piteous shrieks shall be heard than was heard in the days of the flood; when they shall see the believing family standing on the sea of glass, and they themselves sinking in the fire prepared for the Devil and his Angels. O sinners, if you would believe in God in season, now is your time. O make your calling and election sure before it is too late. By all the solemnities of that coming scene I entreat, I beseech you to hasten into the Ark quickly, for the floods are rising. Come, O come to Jesus, the only name under the whole Heavens whereby we can be saved. He will save you if you will come before it is too late. He is an Ark that will safely ride out every storm. Yes, Glory be to God for his great mercies and long suffering to us ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all might (if they would) come to the knowledge of the truth, and be saved. Praise the Lord! I will sing praises unto his name, for I expect him this year. Yours, looking for redemption in 1854. DAVID BLOOD.

Houghtonville, Vt., May 31, 1854.

CANAAN, ME., May 6, 1854.

To the Dear Saints scattered abroad:—The end is at hand and the effect of every Vision. Truly the Vision written on tables now speaks in language not to be misunderstood. The signs are shedding their light on the dates, and the dates are now shedding their light on the signs—each one in return deriving a lustre as God intended they should. Brilliant and burning, O how they sparkle along the pathway of the worn and weary pilgrims, like golden pearls, they attract the eye and mind of the humble disciple. Never did the bow of promise set in the heavens by the hand of the Divine Architect, convey to the mind of the beholder, more expressively the faithfulness of God's promise, than does the present state of things faithfully represent the unerring precursors of the Judgment.

Did God say there should be fearful sights and great signs in the heavens?—Yes. Have they appeared? Yes. Did he say the sun should be darkened? Yes—it is done. Was the moon to withhold its light? It has. Were the stars to fall from heaven? They have. Was there to be distress of nations with perplexity?—There is now. Were there to be scoffers in the last days? They have come. Were there to be derilous times? They are here—look around you. Were the nations to be angry? They are. The seventh trumpet is about to sound. Was the midnight cry to be sounded? It is now ringing in the ears of an infidel world, and a sleepy Laodicean Church. Were there to be some smiting their fellow-servants? Yes. Are they doing it? Yes. How shall we know them? Why, they are fellow-servants. Yes, fellow-servants. How shall we know them? Why when you hear them preach, they will say they look for the Lord any day—yes every day. But—but what? Why they will tell one and another the time will go by—time will not close for several years. Do they say in their hearts, "My Lord delayeth his coming?" Was the Parable of the ten Virgins to be developed before the Bridegroom comes? Yes. The characters of the two classes were to manifest themselves. Are they doing it? They are.—Well, "blessed are they that are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb."—Will any hear it? Yes. What effect will it produce? The Bride will make herself ready.

I have spent most of the winter in Me., giving the last note of warning; and truly it is most surprising to many when they listen to the evidences. Some who have had deep-rooted prejudice, give up to the unanswerable arguments of prophecy in connection with history. We have held meetings at Somerset Mills, Kendall Mills, at the village of Canaan, and four miles from the latter place we have been holding meetings through the week—commenced last Lord's day and close to-morrow, Lord's day. Truly this is a solemn time—it is not very difficult to discern between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not. What is done must be done quickly. The Gospel sun is fast declining. The most painful sensation I am called to endure is the cold indifference of the professedly Christian class of community lulled to sleep by the opiates of their spiritual advisers. O, the fearful responsibility of such guides who are determined to sleep till heaven's last thunder shakes the world beneath their feet! It seems as though the mind of Pollock was touched by discernment far beyond the ken of many when he wrote the following:

"The prophecy for confirmation stood,
And all was ready for the sword of God;
The righteous saw, and fled without delay
Into the chambers of omnipotence.
The wicked saw and mocked,
And sought for erring cause
To satisfy the dismal state of things;
The public credit gone, the fear of want
In time of peace. The insurrection,
Muttering in the street; and leagues
Though holy termed, first ratified
In hell to underprop iniquity,
And crush the sacred truth.

Well, dear Saints, a few more battles, trials, prayers, a few more groans and tears, a few more setting suns, and all is over. O be watchful, humble, faithful, reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long suffering and doctrine—watch, watch. Lift up thine eyes and gaze now upon the beginning of the end. It is come—earth's legions now are on the path to Armageddon's war. Great God, what a day! It is the crowning consummation of all prophetic declaration. Be ready—some day this year the 1335 days will end, and the trumpet sound, the dead be raised, the living changed, and the sacramental host of God's elect return and come with singing unto Zion, and sorrow and sighing flee forever away. Glory, Hallelujah, Amen.

Thy Bro., S. S. BREWER.

WOODSTOCK, N. B., April 17th, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—The word of the Lord is taking effect in the province of New Brunswick. I visited the province last fall in company with Brother W. Courant, and spent three weeks in Woodstock and vicinity. The last of February, I came here again, and have been here ever since, laboring to the extent of my ability and strength in sounding the last proclamation of mercy that ever this fire-doomed world will be privileged with hearing. And I can say, to the glory of God, notwithstanding the prejudices of some against the doctrine, and the disposition manifested on their part to misrepresent, in every possible way, the views of those who are proclaiming the speedy Advent of our Saviour, and thus frighten that class of people who think it presumption for them to hear, think, and judge for themselves, a goodly number have found this truth to be an effectual means of awakening them to a sense of their lost condition, and since their submission to the Lord, a source of consolation to their hearts.

Our meetings have been well attended, and as a general thing, interesting. Twenty six have made a profession of their faith in Christ by baptism, others, who in times past rejoiced in hope of the glory of God, and during the tarrying of the Bridegroom have been slumbering and sleeping, are now waked up, and are trimming their lamps to go out to meet him. God grant that in the day of eternity it may be seen and known they have oil in their vessels with their lamps; for only such will be admitted to the marriage supper of the Lamb.

As ever, your brother in tribulation,

A. ROSS.

To the scattered flock, Greeting:—I have felt called of the Lord to consecrate myself to the work of laboring in the harvest of the earth to the extent of my ability, and if any of the little flock wish for my labors, they will please inform me, by writing to Templeton Mass., and I shall be happy to serve them, as the Lord gives me the word.

I would also say, that the way is now open, so that any minister of Jesus Christ would be cordially received, by some in this place, and a candid hearing given them. Should any feel disposed to call here, please stop at my house, or if I am away from home, at Brother Nelson White's. Yours, expecting Jesus this year. JOSEPH D. MERIAM.

ROCHESTER, N. H.

Brother Merriam:—I thank God that the glad tidings of salvation can be published; even this gospel of the kingdom. The Crisis is going like an angel with the everlasting gospel, this gospel of the kingdom. Christ, when speaking of this certain gospel, says it shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations, then shall the end come. End of what? Why the end of the world; not the destruction of Jerusalem, as some would have it. Provided it were the destruction of Jerusalem, our opposers would have it preached in all the world before Jerusalem was destroyed; but they say it has not been preached to all nations even now.—There is a flaw in their own argument; Jesus, in speaking of this gospel, means a certain message or doctrine. John, in speaking of the same thing, calls it the everlasting gospel; that is, it finisheth all messages to earth. Then, thank God, the poor pilgrim that now has his eye on the promised land, and has been bearing the reproach of the ungodly, will mount up to meet the Lord in the air.

J. BICKFORD.

SOUTH DANVERS, MASS.

Dear Brother Merriam:—Words cannot express the gratitude which I feel to my Heavenly Father for the light that is now being shed on God's dear children, to encourage them that their sufferings here are almost at an end. How important it is that we should have our lamps trimmed and burning. It rejoices my heart when I realize the goodness of God in sparing my life to the present. O how wonderfully the signs are fulfilling, that our Saviour, apostles, and prophets predicted should take place in the last days. I well remember the great disappointment which I realized in '44, in not seeing my beloved Saviour; but thanks to His blessed name, I now perceive, had the Lord come at that time, the tarrying of the Bridegroom could not have been fulfilled. I firmly believe the midnight cry is now sounding. I know the Lord is in this movement. Dear Brother, there is power in this message. O may all of us who are looking for Jesus, say, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do, and do it; and keep ourselves unspotted from the world. My love for this world has been small, since '44, what little remains is dying. O may we all be dead to this world, and alive to Christ, that when He who is our life shall appear, we also may appear with Him in glory.

Yours, in hope of seeing Jesus this year as He is. RICHARD PLUMER.

Faith and Obedience.

Continued.

We have glanced at a portion of the truths that are connected with the "time of the end," and the effect that would be produced by their development upon the Church of Christ.

We will now bring this important matter a little nearer home by presenting the inquiry, Have we arrived at this period of time in the history of the Church? Has the dispersion by "flame, captivity and sword," of the "sanctified ones" been "accomplished?" Have the seals been broken, the little book opened, and the universal proclamation of the end of time in connection with the sounding of the seventh angel, been made? Has the sun been supernaturally darkened in its going forth, the moon likewise, immediately after the days of tribulation? Have many run to and fro to instruct in relation to these things? Has there been a going forth on the part of the professed disciples of Jesus to meet the Bridegroom? Has there been any "tarry," any disappointment of their expectations? Has there been any slumbering and sleeping, a state of uncertainty respecting the time when the Bridegroom would come? Has there been a cry made, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him?" Each of these events are distinctly marked in prophecy, if they have taken place they never will be acted over again, and we are near the coming of the Son of man. That the Church has come up out of the wilderness all admit. The 1260 years of Papal treading down, and scattering of the "holy people," are in the past. Then it is most certain that we have reached the important period, "the time of the end;" and a glance over the history of the present generation will show us how many of the prophetical items, to which allusion has been made, are in the past. Many of the most distinguished students of prophecy have, after a critical examination of the subject, come to the conclusion that we are living amid the grand, the crowning events connected with the "time of the end." Said Prof. Bush, some years since, "If we take the ground of right reason we must believe that the present age is one expressly foretold in prophecy—that it is just opening upon the crowning consummation of all prophetic declarations. The first inquiry is, what are we taught to expect? It is evidently something stupendous—something final—the last act in the drama of the world. We cannot agree with those who believe that the physical destruction of our earth is predicted and close at hand; though if their premises once be granted, we cannot see how their chronology is to be disputed. We firmly believe that we are now upon the borders of the momentous changes predicted." If we would know what those "momentous changes predicted" are, we must see what events are connected with "the last act in the great drama of the world." One of them is the cleansing of the sanctuary, when the 2300 years have expired. That cannot be until the polluting power is destroyed—even the "man of sin" who has set in the "temple of God," and "polluted the sanctuary of strength," with his abominable system of doctrines. His end will come when Christ shall return the second time to earth, as saith the apostle Paul, 2 Thess. 2: 8—Rev. 19: 19, 20. The resurrection of the righteous dead is also to take place at the expiration of the 1335 years, (see Dan. 12; 12, 13,) and that is an event immediately connected with the revelation of the Lord from heaven, and the commencement of his reign. See Dan. 12: 1, 2.—2 Tim. 4: 1,—1 Thess. 4: 14–17,—Rev. 11: 15–18. These scriptures plainly teach the entrance of Christ upon his reign, which is to be everlasting—the resurrection of the sleeping saints, and sudden change of the living—the reward of the prophets, and all who fear the name of God, both small and great, and destruction of his enemies.—Such, we are taught, by the "sure word of prophecy," to be the "last acts in this world's drama," and the "momentous changes," "upon the borders" of which "we firmly believe" that we now stand. Prof. Bush farther remarks, "We have clear intimation from prophecy that the last days shall be distinguished for a laxity of morals and manners, for the prevalence of a spirit of lawlessness and license, for party legislation, for general public profligacy, and for all the evils by which we are now surrounded. These are facts to which we cannot shut our eyes, and over which it is not easy to go to excess in lamentation."

Dr. Duffield, who has, four years past, published a work on the prophecies relative to the second coming of Christ, says, "Among other signs, that 'the time of the end,' that is, the season during which the great chronological prophecies run out, and the great things so long predicted will transpire, is described by very strong and marked signs, and particularly by signs in the heavens. The sun shall be darkened,—the moon shall not give her light—the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. It is supposed by some, and we think with some plausibility, that while these physical events are to be regarded as symbolic of the revolutions and commotions of empires, they nevertheless will, to some extent, literally occur. Striking atmospheric and celestial phenomena shall be observed, which being beyond the reach of man's philosophy may be regarded as the visible symbols which God himself brings out in the heavens to predict the consummation coming. It is remarkable, especially for the last fifty or sixty years, that atmospheric and celestial phenomena have been more marked, frequent and varied, than in any previous age of the world. It is said that not less than fifteen hundred stars have faded from the vault of heaven; and some of them were observed in a state of conflagration.

"Ever since the French revolution the peculiar signs, both moral and political which are predicted to mark the time of the end, have been developing. The preparation is making for a great and fearful crisis; the kings and rulers of the earth are leaguing and conspiring together, and becoming more and more involved in their ambitious schemes, and the Lord is sealing his people, pouring out his spirit, and gathering his elect. Verily we must be blind if we cannot discern the signs of the times."

Another writer says: "If we, who have watched every sign in the spiritual horizon for a long series of years, were now asked, 'Is any sign of His (Christ's) coming yet accomplished?' We should be constrained to answer, 'To our view, not one sign remains unaccomplished.' If we were further asked, 'shall He come this year?' our answer would be, 'we know not; but this much we know and believe, that He is at hand, even at the door."—Cunninghame's Dis. on Prophecy.

John Cox, speaking on the Second Advent of Christ, makes this remark: "This, I conceive, is the next great event that we are now to look for. So far as I can discern, no further signs are to be expected, as it seems to me we have entered into that last period of awful expectation, during which the church is likened unto virgins."

In the language of another, "By comparing the signs of the times with the numerical prophecies, we may know with certainty, when the awful and glorious day of the Lord is rapidly advancing upon us. The great and broad outlines of prophecy are obvious to every one who is a student of the prophetical writings, long before the predicted events are fulfilled. The prophecies of Daniel were closed up and sealed till the time of the end; and when the book was to be opened, the seals were to be removed—the mysterious dates were to be read—many were to run to and fro, and prophetical knowledge was to be increased. The period here foretold is that in which we are now living; for never, since the time of the reformation, has there been such deep and intense interest paid to the sacred prophecies, as within the last thirty or forty years.

Says another writer: "All these signs of the times, shedding their light upon the mysterious dates, and deriving light from them in return, i. e. the present concussions of the nations, the simultaneous shaking of the Ottoman and Papal empires; the rigor and dominancy of infidelity; the extensive propagation of the gospel beyond the limits of the western Roman empire; the state of feeling and excitement in the Jewish nation; the infidel indifference of the world; the death-like slumber of the church; and the midnight cry that has been recently raised, and that is now ringing in the ears of the infidel world and a sleeping church, all indicate that the 1260 years have run out their course. "And when ye see these things, know that the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Lit. vol. 11, Dest. of British Empire, Thorpe.

Many more extracts might be given from writers on prophecy showing that the coming of Christ, near at hand, has become a doctrine of interest, investigation, and belief to many learned men. This grand and deeply interesting subject is far from being confined to a small class, in the United States, well known by the epithet of "Millerites." But there are multitudes in other lands, who are confidently looking for the second coming of Christ, about this time. Among them we may reckon a large class, denominated "Milk-eaters," who were banished for their faith, by the Czar of Russia.

Having given the testimony of several individuals relative to the fact that we are living in "the time of the end," we will endeavor more fully to establish this point by bringing another class of witnesses upon the stand—witnesses who are themselves unconscious of the nature of their testimony, but none the less reliable on that account.

We have already glanced at the "great tribulation" which followed the establishment of "the abomination of desolation" in the holy place, which all admit to be in the past. Christ says, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days, the sun shall be darkened." Fulfilled, May 19, 1780. This was a day of supernatural darkness. The moon was very near the full, therefore it could not be an eclipse of the sun. It was not owing to a thick atmosphere, for stars were seen. Says Mr. Gage, "The sun was clear, and shone for several hours; at length the sky became overcast with clouds, and by ten o'clock, A. M., the darkness was such as to occasion the farmers to leave their work in the field, and retire to their dwellings; fowls went to their roosts; and before noon, lights became necessary to the transaction of business within doors; the darkness continued through the day; and the night till near morning, was as unusually dark as the day."

"The moon shall not give her light."—Mr. Tenney of Exeter, N. H., speaking of the dark day, says that "no satisfactory solution of it has yet appeared." In some remarks concerning the following evening he says, "The darkness was probably as gross as has ever been observed since the Almighty first gave birth to light. I could not help conceiving at the time, that if every luminous body in the universe had been shrouded in impenetrable darkness, or struck out of existence, the darkness could not have been more complete. A sheet of white paper held within a few inches of the eyes, was equally invisible with the blackest velvet." The Revelator, giving an account of the same phenomena, under the opening of the sixth seal, says, "The sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon become as blood."—Says Joel, "The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come." We have the testimony of eye witnesses, that when the moon was seen, it had the appearance of blood. The following extract from a letter written by Mr. Beadle at Aleppo, and published in the Missionary Herald of June 1842, shows a fulfilment. "On the night of the earthquake there was something peculiar in the atmosphere, the moon appearing as red as blood. This greatly alarmed the inhabitants, who were continually crying out, "Now we shall hear the trumpet sound! and the dead will arise! the day of judgment has come!"

"The stars shall fall from heaven," says Jesus. John the Revelator says in connection with the previously named events, "and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind." Many there are who will remember the shower of stars which fell on the night of Nov. 13, 1833. Said one who witnessed the scene, I could find no language so descriptive as that given by the Revelator. They fell not as the ripe fruit falls, but the unripe from the branch, when violently shaken.

Here we are however met by the objector, who says, "They were not stars, but meteors." What was the frequent exclamation of those who beheld the phenomena? "See how the stars fall!" What was it denominated by the recorders of the scene, for the public papers? "The falling stars." No one deemed it worth while to correct their astronomy. What was it guided the wise men of the east, to the place of the Savior's birth? It was a star. Not a fixed, but a movable star, for we read that it went before them, until it stood over the place where the infant Jesus lay. It is too unreasonable to believe that the fixed stars, which are so much larger than this earth, could fall to earth as a sign of Christ's coming.

Extract from "Apocalyptic Sketches,

BY JOHN CUMMING,

Minister of the Scotch National Church, London."

The name applied to this book is instructive, though I must say not a few Christians practically interchange it with another of opposite import. The first half of the one name is like that of the other in sound—but the whole meaning of the one is diametrically opposite to that of the other. One is the Apocrypha, which means what is hidden—the other is the Apocalypse, which means what is revealed and made known. The Apocrypha is the title given to those books which are adopted by the Church of Rome, of human origin, and of no value in deciding what is truth; the Apocalypse is the name of the divine and inspired book made known to John in Patmos. On the Apocrypha I am silent, or speak only to condemn it; on the Apocalypse I would that I were far more learned and eloquent, in order that I might more adequately illustrate and recommend it.

The words which are rendered in our version, "the revelation of Jesus Christ," have been misapprehended. It does not mean the revelation made by Jesus Christ, but the revelation of Jesus Christ himself. In other words, it does not mean Christ the revealer, but Christ the revealed; a revelation, or apocalypse, or portrait of Christ, which was communicated by Christ to John the seer, in Patmos. And that I am correct in this interpretation will be plain, I think, to your comprehension, from passages where the original word occurs—and the word apocalypse occurs very frequently in scripture; but unhappily, in our admirable translation—justly the subject of almost universal eulogy—there is a change of rendering, though there be none in the original. For instance: in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, the first chapter, at the seventh verse, it is in our version—"So that ye come behind in no gift; waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." Now in the original it is—"waiting for the apocalypse of our Lord Jesus Christ." Again: in the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, the first chapter, at the seventh verse, you will find another rendering, but it is still the same original word: "And to you who are troubled, rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven." It is, literally translated—"in the apocalypse of the Lord Jesus Christ from heaven." Again: in the First Epistle of St. Peter, the first chapter, and the seventh verse, and also at the thirteenth verse, we meet with the same word, but differently translated. And here I may remark how great a pity it is that the same word should be the subject of a variety of translations. If it had been translated in one way throughout the New Testament, it would have made the beauty and the force of the meaning of the Spirit of God evolve more vividly. We read, in the First Epistle of Peter, the first chapter, and the seventh verse—"That it might be found unto praise, and honor, and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ." In the original it is—"in the apocalypse," in the revelation "of Jesus Christ." And in the thirteenth verse of the same chapter—"Gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ." Here again it is in the original—"in the apocalypse of Jesus Christ." And in all these passages it means, not a disclosure, or revelation, or manifestation made by Christ, but made concerning or of Christ. In other words, the title of this book is not Christ the revealer, but Christ the revealed; and this revelation of Christ, we are told, was also given by Christ to John his servant, in the isle of Patmos.

This book, then, is an inspired portrait of the Son of God; it is, if I may use the expression, the epiphany of Jesus—the full description of his personal glory, to which prophets and martyrs looked forward with waiting hope—an apocalypse so brilliant that the sight of the Jew was dazzled by its distant splendour, so much so that he could not see the intervening vallies of Gethsemane and Calvary, through which Christ had to pass, in order to emerge and inherit his predestined glory. Very beautifully, therefore, the book begins—"Behold, he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him;" and very appropriately this book closes—"Surely I come quickly: Amen. Even so come, Lord Jesus." It begins with his advent, and ends with it. That sublime, sustaining, and precious hope was in the eye of the holy seer when he sat down to receive and record its bright visions, and the same hope in his eye when he kneels down at the close and cries, "Come, Lord Jesus." He had seen and leaned on the bosom of the Sufferer, and he longs to see and reign with his risen and glorified King. May we also sympathize with him, "whom having not seen, may we love; and in whom, though we now see him not, yet believing, may we rejoice with joy unspeakable, and full of glory."

The distinction between the revelation of Christ in the Apocalypse, and the revelation of Christ in the Gospels, is briefly this: the Gospels represent Christ the sufferer—the Apocalypse depicts Christ the conqueror. The Gospels detail "his agony, his cross, his passion, his bloody sweat,"—the Apocalypse describes his throne, his "many crowns," and prostrate saints adoring and saying, "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto our God, to him be glory and honor and blessing." In the Gospels we see the shadow of the cross, deep, dark, and palpable to all—in the Apocalypse we behold the lustre of the crown shining forth in unearthly brilliancy. In the Gospels we have Christ a priest at the altar—in the Apocalypse we see Christ a king upon his throne; in the one we have Christ in the robes of Aaron—in the other we have Christ in the royalties of David; in the first we behold Christ the sacrificing priest, the atoning victim—in the second we discover Christ with the "many crowns" upon his head, "Lord of lords, and King of kings." Thus, then, the Gospels reveal Christ amid the associations of Calvary—the Apocalypse reveals Christ with all the accompaniments of glory; each in its place, each for its object, is the revelation, or the apocalypse of Christ.

The language in the passage I have selected for exposition, discourages and discountenances the very popular, but I humbly conceive very erroneous idea, that we are not to study, and that we cannot possibly become acquainted with things predicted, but not yet performed. Most men say, "Things performed we may study and improve; but things predicted we have nothing to do with, except to lay them aside on the shelf, and wait till their actual performance casts its light upon them, and thus shapes the dim propecy into history." But certainly this idea is not sanctioned in the passage I have selected for exposition; for this revelation was sent to Christ's servant John, "to show unto his servants things that shall come to pass." It does not read thus—"to show unto his servant John," but "to show unto his servants; the word is in the plural number; that is, to all Christians. To show them what? Not merely the things which have already come to pass, but "things which must shortly come to pass;" not the facts of the past only, but the events of the future also. Now the popular idea is, that these predicted things we ought not to interpret, and that it is only performed things that we ought to endeavor to profit by.—The statement here, at least, conveys no such impression. It implies that things predicted, or foreshown, are to be studied, because for this very end they are inspired, and that they may, though dimly and darkly as through a glass, be understood by the servants and people of God. Daniel explained to the captives in Babylon future things, and thus comforted them with consolations drawn not from past records, but unfulfilled prophecies. Now, comfort cannot be extracted from the unintelligible. Our blessed Lord minutely predicted to his apostles the destruction of Jerusalem; and he told them how they were to conduct themselves in the prospect of that destruction. He showed them that responsibilities were incurred by their knowing things not yet fulfilled; and the apostles, we read, and the Christians who fled to Pella, understood and believed the prophecy, that shone as a light in a dark place. It is surely very remarkable, and instructive, too, that one office of the Holy Spirit of God—an office that cannot be explained on the popular presumption we have alluded to—is, that "he will show you things to come;" and the apostle Peter tells us, in his Second Epistle, the first chapter, at the nineteenth verse, that there is "a sure word of prophecy, unto which we do well to take heed, as to a light shining in a dark place;" and we are told also, in the third chapter, at the first verse, "This second epistle, beloved, I now write unto you, in both which I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance: that ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord and Saviour: knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation." We are told by the apostle Paul, that "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."—That is future. But he adds—"But he hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit;" teaching us, therefore, that things which are not yet disclosed as come to pass, are things that we may study. They may not be essential to our personal safety, but they may contribute to our spiritual comfort, and to the glory and honor and praise of God. Why did the Jews, we may ask, reject the Messiah as the sufferer? Just because they neglected the study of unfulfilled prophecy. And may not we also be found neglecting privileges, if not despising duties, when we make the Book of Revelation that book which we rarely read in our families, or study in our closets, or patiently listen to, when expounded and explained from the pulpit by the ministers of Christ?

It was not so in olden days: for this book was a favorite study with the early Christians. The martyrs of the first three centuries found springs of comfort in the addresses to the seven churches, which refreshed their souls as with the dews of heaven amid the flames. The Reformers derived from the Apocalypse the most condemning verdicts on the great Western apostasy, and from its description, as from a full and exhaustless arsenal, they drew forth the weapons with which they smote and overthrew the great Dagon of the West with the most complete success.—This holy book seems to me to be a lamp, which sheds light on the history of the last nineteen hundred years, casting illuminating rays into all their perplexing and perplexed events. It shows us Christ in the world as well as in the Church—ordering and restraining the will of kings and the acts of empire, and educing glory to his name and prosperity to his Church from the wrath of his bitterest enemies.

In the next place, the Apocalypse, or Book of Revelation, is stated, at the beginning of the first chapter, to have been written under the inspiration of the Spirit by John, who testified of the Word of God. There can be no doubt that this was John the evangelist; his testimony was emphatically that of "the Word;" his Gospel is peculiarly the Gospel of "the Word made flesh." The very commencement of his Gospel is—"In the beginning was the Word;" and the close of his Gospel is—"These are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing, ye might have life through his name." That holy name gives music to every sentence, weight to every word, and fragrance to every sentiment in that wonderful production, the Gospel according to John. And Wetstein and Lardner, two distinguished critics upon the original, as well as on the contents of the Scriptures, have selected about thirty or forty texts from the Apocalypse, which contain words and phrases and forms of expression that are almost identical with those used in the Gospel,—thus proving that the same John who wrote the Gospel was the writer of the Apocalypse; and such differences of style, as unquestionably do occur, are to be explained and accounted for by the difference of the subjects, and perhaps also of the time. The Gospel was written by John sixty years after the death and resurrection of Jesus, and was, if I may so speak, a cool and dispassionate retrospect and record of that sublime biography; the Apocalypse, on the other hand, was written the very moment its truths were taught, and its visions made known—the [illegible] and splendor of the scene making the deeper impression on the heart of the seer, and originating more expressive words. Hence the Apocalypse contains an eloquence of language, a grandeur of thought, and a magnificence of style, which certainly are not approached by the more prosaic and historical narrative of the Gospel. This difference, however, is, as we have said, [illegible] accounted for; the subject and date will explain the simplicity of the narrative of the one, and the sublime and poetic [illegible] of the other.

The time at which the Apocalypse was written, was about the year 97. John was banished to Patmos by the emperor Domitian; and if we had no other evidence that it was during the reign of Domitian, we have it in the fact that he was the first Roman emperor who adopted that mode of punishment. But John's banishment from his earthly home lifted him nearer a heavenly one. He was condemned and banished by a king that died, that he might be favored and comforted by "the King of kings," that liveth and reigneth for ever. An inner radiance was poured into his spirit, that more than compensated for his external night. God thus gives his people in all their trying circumstances compensatory elements. In the history of his Church, he often makes afflictions beautiful, by weaving through them the rainbow of his mercy and love. He thus made barren Patmos a scene of manifestation of far richer glories than Tabor. He can make the tents of Mesech and the tabernacles of Kedar repose in a sunshine more glorious than ever fell on the towers of Salem. God's Shechinah often illuminates the desert. Daniel beheld in Babylon bright visions he saw not elsewhere; John, in Patmos, saw a glory he never witnessed in Jerusalem; John Bunyan, in his lonely prison, had dreams and visions, approaching in their purity and splendor to apocalyptic scenes; and Martin Luther, during his confinement in Wartburg, translated the Scriptures, and had the enjoyment of a freedom and repose to which thousands outside were strangers. It is the heart, not the house, that makes home. And thus, while the afflictions of God's people abound, their joys abound also. The cloud that is darkest, is fringed to their eyes with beams of celestial lustre, and crushing calamities unbosom by degrees their latent mercies; and those who have been in the deepest affliction, have been the first to exclaim, each as he emerged from its depths—"It is good for me that I was afflicted."

The World's Crisis.

LOWELL, JULY 5, 1854.

The King of the North.

The eleventh chapter of Daniel contains a history of the principal events of the Medo-Persian, Grecian, and Roman empires; commencing with Cyrus, and ending with the overthrow of the Roman Monarchy at the coming of Jesus Christ. But as we intend to give only a few items connected with the last empire, we shall confine our remarks to the last portion of the chapter. It may, however, be well to remark, that the Roman power is, evidently, introduced into this chapter, at the sixteenth verse, where we read; "But he" (Rome) "that cometh against him," (the Syrian king,) "shall do according to his will." Passing from this to the thirtieth verse, we are introduced to the troubles with which Rome is afflicted by the invasion of the barbarians; and in the thirty first verse, we have the establishment of the papacy, one of the most important events in the history of the Christian Church. It was at this time that religion and politics became blended together, the catholic faith became the dominant faith, to the exclusion of all others; and, in the language of the prophet, they took "away the daily, and set up the abomination that maketh desolate." From verse 32–35, inclusive, we have the persecution of the christian church, during a period of at least 1260 years; and then in verse 36 we read as follows: "The king shall do according to his will?" Who is this king that "shall do according to his will," is a question of no small importance. Some have supposed it to refer to the Mohammedan power, and hence, have adopted the rendering of Boothroyd and others, viz.: "A certain king shall do according to his will"; meaning the "Ottoman power." Others, regard it as referring to the power brought to view in the previous verses, namely, the papacy; and in connecting the king and his acts, namely, "he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvelous things against the God of gods," with Paul's man of sin, of whom it is said: (2. Thess., 2, 4,) "Who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God," they make out a very plausible argument; for the characteristics of the wilful king, and those of Paul's man of sin, are, in some respects, identical; and it is fair to presume that the two are in some measure connected.—There is one thing certain in connection with this subject, that is, the power denominated the wilful king, is to prosper till the indignation be accomplished. The indignation brought to view in the book of Daniel, must, we believe, refer to one of three things: First, it may refer to the punishment of the Jews, in their being despoiled of their city and inheritance, and in being scattered among the nations of the earth; or it may have reference to the desolate condition of the people of God, during the absence of the Great Head of the Church: but if to neither of these, it must refer to the wrath of Jehovah, which will be poured upon the wicked at the end of the world. In either case, we cannot conceive how, the Mahommedan power, or the papacy as such, can be referred to; as neither of them are prospering, in the sense of the prophecy. The Mohammedan power has been on the wane for more than one hundred and fifty years. Maunder, in speaking of this, (v. 2, p. 315,) remarks: "At last the Sultan Mustapha II. himself took the field; but he was opposed by the hero Eugene, the conqueror of Zentha, in 1697; and on the Don, Peter the Great conquered Azoph. He was obliged, therefore, by the treaty of Carlowitz, in 1699, to renounce his claims on Transylvania and the country between the Danube and Theiss, to give up the Morea to the Venitians, to restore Padolia and the Ukraine to Poland, and to leave Azoph to the Russians. Thus commenced the fall of the Ottoman power." In 1710, the Porte renounced all influence in the government of Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli. In 1783, Crimea was annexed to Russia. Since that, Greece has become independent; and Egypt is about the same; for the Porte has little or no influence in the governing of that province. The above are some, but not all of the losses that the Ottoman power has sustained during the last one hundred and fifty years; and can we, in view of these facts, for a moment suppose that the Turkish power is intended by the wilful king of Daniel's prophecy, of whom it is said, he "shall prosper until the indignation be accomplished?" It is not a question with us whether the Ottoman power has prospered, but does it prosper? And if so, will it continue to prosper until the end? We should naturally suppose from the phrase "prosper," that the power, to whom this term was applied would, at least, have strength and resources to maintain its own independence, without being held up, or sustained by other governments. Again, the same objection may be urged against the papacy. The papal power, as such, is not in a prosperous condition, and has not been for the last forty years. There would be some propriety and truthfulness in saying, this power prospered during the 1260 years; for it reigned over the nations; but to say it prospers at the present time, is not speaking the truth. As a political power, the papacy is of no importance; and there never has been a point of time in her whole history, when, in a civil sense, she has been considered more insignificant than at present. But the reader may enquire, to whom does it apply? Ans. It must refer to a power that is to be in a prospering condition at the end. We wish to submit a few items in relation to this subject, and leave the reader to judge for himself.

1st. From v. 16, where, I believe the Roman power is introduced, as doing "according to his will," to v. 30, where the "ships of Chittim" come "against him" (Rome,) we have, what we may call the history of Rome, in its unit state, that is, before it became divided into ten kingdoms. As early as A. D. 493–496, the Western empire of Rome including Dacia, was divided into ten kingdoms, thus leaving the Eastern division of Rome, for a while, comparatively entire: and it is to this division of the empire that the language of the prophet (Dan. 11: 30.) applies, when he says:—"So shall HE do; he shall even return, and have intelligence with them" (the apostate church,) "that forsake the holy covenant" The only thing that kept the Eastern Empire from falling, was its being connected with the apostate church. The rulers of the Eastern division of Rome, for a long time before this, were nominally christian; but still the church and state were not fully blended together. The mortal feuds, which existed between the various sects, continually disturbed the tranquillity of the empire; and, in addition to this, the Barbarians were hovering on the frontiers, ready, and determined to invade the provinces; something must be done, help must be obtained immediately, to support her tottering power; where could it be found? The elements of strength had become weak, the iron had become brittle, her internal resources were exhausted, the day of her military prowess and martial glory was past; the only resource left, was to become connected with the church; this she effected by submitting to the dictation of the holy See, legalizing the articles of the catholic faith, and nationalizing the Catholic Church. This compact, formed at this time between the church and state, is termed by the prophet, the "PLACING" of "the ABOMINATION that MAKETH DESOLATE." He says: "And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate."

From the thirty-first, to the thirty-fifth verse, inclusive, we have brought to view the history of this power, at least, 1260 years, during which, the saints of God are persecuted and put to death.

But we enquire, what power is it that puts the saints to death? Is it Rome? Nay verily: it is "the abomination that maketh desolate," that does this work. It is not exclusively the civil, nor is it solely the eclesiastical; but, it is the two blended together, that constitutes this "ABOMINATION that MAKETH DESOLATE:" and, this politico-eclesiastical power, called by the prophet, "THE ABOMINATION that maketh desolate," is THE power that succeeds the old Roman empire, in the ascendency of Europe; and, the point WHERE the abomination was set up, is the time WHEN that ascendency commenced. Now, as this power (abomination) is to have the direction of affairs in both the civil and religious world, that is, in both Church and state, for at least 1260 years, there is nothing said particularly, in relation to the Roman kingdom, as such, until the abomination ceases to desolate the Church, toleration is granted, and the civil begins to domineer OVER the ecclesiastical power; THEN "the KING (kingdom) shall do according to HIS will;" the political power shall no longer be the humble servant of the "great Harlot;" she may sit upon the beast, but cannot guide him; he has now become fractious, and, instead of acting any longer in keeping with her wishes, "he shall do according to his OWN WILL;" instead of exalting her, "he shall exalt HIMSELF, and magnify HIMSELF above EVERY God."

Again. If we adopt the rendering of Boothroyd, Wintle, and others, viz., "A CERTAIN KING shall do according to his will," it is still more clear: and if there is a lingering doubt in the mind of any person, in relation to distinguishing between the "abomination," and "the king that shall do according to his will," "that doubt," it seems to me, must dissipate when we consider the above rendering, viz., "A CERTAIN KING, &c.; for the phrase, "A CERTAIN KING," is used to designate a distinct power from the "abomination that maketh desolate," not however to run parallel with, but to succeed it.

There never has, to my mind, been any power since the close of the tribulation of the Church, that has fulfilled this prophecy, excepting France: and it is in the history of this power, that the characteristics of this willful king are fully met. Let us then with fact in view, briefly examine this subject v. 36, "And the king shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvelous things against the God of gods, and shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished: for that that is determined shall be done." "Magnify himself above every god," &c. If by the term god, as used in this verse, we are to understand rulers or judges, as in Ex. 22: 28, and Ps. 82: 6, we have a perfect fulfilment. France, under the direction of Robespierre, was a den of brigands; they neither respected the officers of Church, or state. They organized a government the most tyrannical and the most sanguinary which history ever recorded." They neither respected the Christian, Jewish, or Pagan religion. "To their political crimes they added acts of impiety. They began by abolishing the Gregorian Calendar and the Christian Era, and substituting in its place the Era of the Republic, to commence on the 22d September 1793.—In a short time Hebert and Chaumette, two chiefs of the commune, got the convention to decree the abolition of the Christian religion, (Nov. 10.") Another feature in the history of this power is, "he shall speak marvelous things against the God of gods." The seeds of this system of infidelity were sown long before by Voltaire, who was known frequently to remark, in relation to Christianity; "I am weary of hearing people repeat that twelve men established the Christian religion. I will prove that one man may suffice to overthrow it."—They offered every indignation to Christ, and often in speaking of him would say, "crush the wretch;" they declared that, instead of "the fear of the Lord being the beginning of wisdom, it was the beginning of folly." "The UNIVERSAL CAUSE, THAT GOD of the philosophers, of THE JEWS, and of the CHRISTIANS, is but a CHIMERA AND A PHANTOM. It is more reasonable to admit, with Manes, of a TWOFOLD GOD, than of the GOD OF CHRISTIANITY. we cannot know whether a GOD REALLY EXISTS, or whether there is the smallest difference between GOOD and EVIL, or VICE and VIRTUE." Thus it was that they spoke "MARVELOUS THINGS AGAINST THE GOD OF GODS." v. 37, "neither shall he regard the God of his fathers, nor the desire of women, nor regard any God; for he shall magnify himself above all." The Directory of France ABOLISHED the CHRISTIAN RELIGION; and even went so far as to INSULT JEHOVAH HIMSELF.

"Paché, Hebert, and Chaumette, the leaders of the municipality, publicly expressed their determination "to dethrone the King of Heaven as well as the monarchs of the earth." To accomplish this design, they prevailed on Gobert, the apostate Constitutional bishop of Paris, to appear at the bar of the assembly, accompanied by some of the clergy of his diocese, and there abjure the Christian faith. He declared "that no other national religion was now required but that of liberty, equality, and morality."—Many of the Constitutional bishops and clergy in the convention joined in the proposition. Crowds of drunken artisans and shameless prostitutes crowded to the bar, and trampled under their feet the sacred vases, consecrated for ages to the holiest purposes of religion. The sections of Paris shortly after followed the example of the Constitutional clergy, and publicly abjured the Christian religion. The churches were stripped of all their ornaments; their plate and valuable contents brought in heaps to the municipality and the convention, from whence they were sent to the Mint to be melted down. Trampling under foot the images of our Saviour and the Virgin, they elevated, amid shouts of applause, the busts of Marat and Lepelletier, and danced round them, singing parodies on the Hallelujah, and dancing the Carmagnole.

Shortly after, a still more indecent exhibition took place before the assembly. The celebrated prophecy of Father Beauregard was accomplished: "Beauty without modesty was seen usurping the place of the Holy of Holies!" Hebert, Chaumette, and their associates appeared at the bar, and declared that "God did not exist, and that the worship of Reason was to be substituted in his stead." A veiled female, arrayed in blue drapery, was brought into the assembly; and Chaumette, taking her by the hand, "Mortals," said he, "cease to tremble before the powerless thunders of a God whom your fears have created. Henceforth acknowledge no divinity but Reason. I offer you its noblest and purest image; if you must have idols, sacrifice only to such as this." When, letting fall the veil, he exclaimed, "Fall before the august Senate of Freedom, oh! Veil of Reason!" At the same time, the goddess appeared personified by a celebrated beauty, the wife of Momoro, a printer, known in more than one character to most of the convention. The goddess, after being embraced by the president, was mounted on a magnificent car, and conducted, amid an immense crowd, to the Cathedral of Nôtre Dame, to take the place of the deity. There she was elevated on the high altar, and received the adoration of all present, while the young women, her attendants, whose alluring looks already sufficiently indicated their profession, retired into the chapels round the choir, where every species of licentiousness and obscenity was indulged in without control, with hardly any veil from the public gaze. To such a length was this carried, that Robespierre afterward delared that Chaumette deserved death for the abominations he had permitted on that occasion. Thenceforward that ancient edifice was called the Temple of Reason.

The services of religion were now universally abandoned; the pulpits were deserted throughout all the revolutionized districts; baptisms ceased; the burial service was no longer heard; the sick received no communion; the dying no consolation. A heavier anathema than that of papal power pressed upon the peopled realm of France—the anathema of Heaven, inflicted by the madness of her own inhabitants. The village bells were silent; Sunday was obliterated. Infancy entered the world without a blessing; age left it without a hope. In lieu of the services of the Church, the licentious fetes of the new worship were performed by the most abandoned females; it appeared as if the Christian truth had been succeeded by the orgies of the Babylonian priests or the grossness of the Hindoo theocracy. On every tenth day a Revolutionary leader ascended the pulpit, and preached atheism to the bewildered audience; Marat was universally deified, and even the instrument of death sanctified by the name of the 'Holy Guillotine.' On all the public cemeteries the inscription was placed, 'Death is an Eternal Sleep.' The comedian Monort, in the church of St. Roch, carried impiety to its utmost length. 'God! if you exist,' said he, 'avenge your injured name. I bid you defiance; you remain silent; you dare not launch your thunders; who after this will believe in your existence?'"

What perfect fulfilment of that declaration of the prophet Daniel. "Neither shall he regard the God of his fathers."

Again. "Nor the desire of women." "The word in the original for women, says Newton, 'signifieth properly wives, as desire doth conjugal affection.' The meaning therefore of not regarding the desire of women, is neglecting and discouraging marriage." This is just what the French government did. Alison, in speaking of it, says: "The most sacred relations of life were at the same period placed on a new footing, suited to the extravagant ideas of the times. Marriage was declared a civil contract, binding only during the pleasure of the contracting parties. Divorce immediately became general; the corruption of manners reached a pitch unknown during the worst days of the monarchy.—The vices of the marquises and countesses of Louis XV. descended to the shopkeepers and artisans of Paris. So indiscriminate did concubinage become, that, by a decree of the convention, bastards were declared entitled to an equal share of the succession with legitimate children. Mademoiselle Arnout, a celebrated comedian, expressed the public feeling when she called 'Marriage the Sacrament of Adultery.' The divorces in Paris in the first months of 1793 were 562, while the marriages were only 1785; a proportion probably unexampled among mankind." V. 38—"But in his estate shall he honor the god of forces; and a god whom his fathers knew not shall he honor with gold, and silver, and with precious stones, and pleasant things." "Honor the god of forces." Liberty and the country were the objects of adoration.

How strikingly the language of Daniel has been fulfilled.

V. 39—"Thus shall he do in the most strong holds with a strange god, whom he shall acknowledge and increase with glory; and he shall cause them to rule over many, and shall divide the land for gain."

About six months after the christian religion was abolished, (which took place 1793, Nov. 10,) "Robespierre abolished the worship of Reason, (May 7,) and caused the convention to proclaim the EXISTENCE of a SUPREME BEING, (June 8); he introduced a NEW RELIGION, THAT OF DEISM, of which he created himself high-priest." Here, then, we have a system of religion different from anything that had existed in France. It is not Atheism,—which regards no God; neither is it Judaism, which believes in the God of Abraham and Moses; nor is it christianity, which respects both the God of Abraham and the centre of all divine Revelation—Jesus Christ; but DEISM, called by some (and very erroneously) the religion of nature; the two leading characteristics of which are "opposition to christianity," and the "rejection of divine revelation." Surely, THIS WAS "A GOD WHOM THEIR FATHERS KNEW NOT."

The various phases through which France passed during the reign of terror, in a religious point of view, do not exhibit the scenes of suffering and terror that filled the breasts of thousands. Never was there, it seems to me, such trouble since the invasion of the Barbarians; and not even then; for then there was, at times, a show of humanity; but in this revolution humanity was exiled, benevolent institutions innovated, society broken up, God set at defiance, christianity abolished, and every interest in the civil, religious, moral, domestic, and social world prostrated. The throne was overturned, the altar destroyed, tyranny of the most revolting character reigned; friends and foes were swept off together; and the blood of king and peasant; nobles and serfs; rich and poor; bond and free; male and female; all mingled together, as it run from the scaffold, or dropped from the bloody knife.—It has been computed that one million, twenty-two thousand, three hundred and fifty-one persons were destroyed in this revolution.

"Divide the land for gain." This item of the prophecy was, at this time, most literally fulfilled. Alison, in speaking of the subdivision of land (v 1, p. 95), says: "The extreme difficulty of finding a secure investment for capital in those distracted times, and the innumerable bankruptcies of mercantile men which took place during the Revolution, produced a universal opinion among the laboring class that the purchase of land was the only safe way of disposing of money; and this feeling, coupled with the excessive depreciation which the assignats (viz.: the paper currency of France during the revolution) afterwards reached, and the great accession to the national domains which the CONFISCATED ESTATES of the nobles produced, occasioned that UNIVESTAL DIVISION OF LANDED PROPERTY which forms the MOST STRIKING FEATURE in the modern condition of France.

STARTLING DISCLOSURES BY THE CATHOLICS. A very respectable and well known merchant of this city, who resides in North Bridgewater, informs us that no little excitement exists in that town, owing to the extraordinary disclosures recently made by some Catholic female domestics. They were asked, "If the Priest told you to poison our families, would you do it?" and nineteen out of twenty answered YES. They were then asked, "What would become of you?" and the answer was "Oh! the Priest would take care of us!" This frank and apparently honest avowal of the supreme power of the Priests over their subjects, has very naturally caused much alarm among the American families, who feel no safety of property or person while a Roman Catholic remains under their roof. Many have already discharged their domestics, and others are preparing to do so immediately. We also learn that the removal of all Catholics from the Shoe Factories in North Bridgewater, is contemplated.—[Boston Bee.

CORRESPONDENCE.

VERGENNES, VT., ADDISON CO.

Brn. and Sisters:—Let us with united hearts thank our heavenly Father for giving us the World's Crisis. O may God speed it on from victory to victory. I feel if we do all we can to sustain this paper, the light it carries with it is destined to shine to the end. O when I look into its columns I cannot express my feelings better than to say with the poet:

> Brother, cheer thee, land is nearing,
> Still be hopeful, nothing fearing,
> Soon in majesty appearing,
> You will behold that Lamb once slain.
> Oh how joyful then to hear him,
> Whilst all nations shall revere Him,
> Saying to his flock who fear Him,
> I have come on earth to reign.

Language is inadequate to express the feelings of my heart when I see nation rising against nation, and kingdom against kingdom, as Jesus said it should be in the last time. O when I look around and see how wickedness is abounding, and how little the world seems to be moved when they cannot help seeing those things coming on the earth, it makes me feel at times as though I could lift up my voice like a trumpet, and cry aloud and spare not, whether they will hear or forbear. The Lord is coming, and my soul cries out "Amen, even so come, Lord Jesus," and come quickly. I cannot close this until I say one word with regard to Brother Edward Burnham's being at Middlebury with us. The Lord was with him. I can say of a truth I have never seen such an ear to hear since '44, as there is at Middlebury at the present time. God give you grace and power to send out the cry to the world, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him." Amen.

ISAIAH KELLOGG.

WOODSTOCK, May 30th, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I trust the great Head of the Church has called you to the work of publishing the "good news" of the coming kingdom to the "little flock," and to warn a wicked world of its approaching end. May He grant you grace sufficient for your arduous duties. And O may Jesus' dying love ever be the constraining motive in all who write or speak on this momentous subject. Truth is gaining ground, though slowly; yet it is destined to triumph, and all who will, may know the truth, and by it be made free. I praise God that He still has servants who are giving the household "meat in due season." "God has appointed a day in which He will judge the world," and Jesus has told us when, we may "know it is near, even at the door;" and he has had a people for the last ten or twelve years, at least, that have professed to believe it. And now shall we cavil with the word of God, and strive to evade, and cover over all the evidences that can be brought to confirm our faith and heighten our prospects of speedy deliverance? God forbid! For one, I can rejoice, yea, and I will rejoice, (for Jesus has told me to,) in all the evidences that prove that our "redemption is near."

Praise God for the light that shines upon the prophetic word in this "time of the end."—"Whoso readeth, let him understand." I am glad my attention was ever called to the subject of Christ's second coming, and that with many others, in '44, I took my "lamp and went forth to meet the Bridegroom." And though disappointed in not seeing Him at the time I expected, and my faith was severely tried, yet I found it rested still on the promise, "He will surely come, and will not tarry." And now I must follow on, till I meet "Him, whom absent I love, whom having not seen I adore." In the first move, I felt that "my Father" was at the helm; and I believe the unerring Pilot still guides the ship. Through storms and tempests, rocks and quicksands, she will safely pass, and soon. All glory to the great Captain of our salvation! She will land her weary crew in the haven of eternal rest.

After finding that we were mistaken in our reckoning as to time in '43, I had concluded that no more evidence could be produced from the word, than what Brother Miller and others had presented. In taking this position, I am confident I was wrong: for consequently a large portion of God's word which was once so sweet to me, became tasteless, and without meaning. But I thank God that He sent Brother Adrian and others here last winter to awaken us once more to trim our lamps anew. And O how did the sacred oracles shine out in living light, and every word drop honey to my fainting spirit! Now let trials come, scorn and reproach—faith plumes her wings, and mounts above the storm. Our Jesus is coming after all—Hallelujah! and coming at the "appointed time!" O let us search the scriptures to see if these things are so. Angels have desired to look into them—prophets have searched "diligently what manner of time the spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow," and shall we be uninterested? Truth loses nothing by investigation. It is the truth we want, and nothing but the truth. Men's theories are uncertain; their plans and schemes may fail—but God's schemes will never fail. The wondrous plan of man's redemption stands there in His word yet, and will till the consummation—till the last servant of God is sealed, and Jesus comes to reign. Praise God! his ministers are giving the trumpet a certain sound, that the people may "prepare themselves to the battle." Soon the "marriage of the Lamb will have come, and his wife will have made herself ready." I am sensible that whatever our profession of faith may be, "without holiness, no man shall see the Lord." Now is the time to get the "wedding garment" on; tomorrow may be too late. Sinner, hasten, O hasten to get a life secure in God. My brother—my sister—wherever you may be in this dark world of sin—black or white, bond or free—may I not say to you (though most unworthy) in the language of Brother Paul, "Ye are dead, (crucified to the world,) and your life is hid with Christ in God: when Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory." Amen.

S. T. B.

PLEASANT VALLEY, Ct., June 12th, 1854.

Dear Brethren and Sisters:—Let us endeavor to realize the terrors of the final judgment day. When the dead are sleeping in the silent grave; when the living are thoughtless and unapprehensive of the grand event, or intent on other pursuits; some of them dissolved in sensual pleasure, eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage; some of them planning or executing schemes for riches or honors; some in the very act of sin; the generality stupid and careless about the concerns of eternity, and the dreadful day just at hand; and a few here and there conversing with their God, and looking for the glorious appearance of their Lord and Saviour; when nature moves on in its regular and uniform course, and infidel scoffers are taking license from that consideration to ask, "Where is the promise of his coming?" In short, when there are no more visible appearances of this approaching day than of the destruction of Sodom on that clear morning in which Lot fled away; or of the deluge, when Noah entered into the ark; then, in that hour of unapprehensive security, then suddenly shall the heavens open over the astonished world; then shall the alarming clangor break over their heads like a thunder-peal from cloudless skies. Immediately the living turn their gazing eyes upon the amazing phenomenon; some hear the long-expected sound with rapture, and lift up their heads with joy, assured that the day of their redemption is come; while the thoughtless world are struck with the wildest horror and consternation. In the same instant the sound reaches all the mansions of the dead; and in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, they are raised, and the living are changed. This call will be as animating to all the children of God, as that call to a single person, "Lazarus, come forth." O what a surprise will this be to a thoughtless world! Should this alarm burst over our heads this moment, how panic-stricken would the world be! Such will be the terror, such the consternation, when it actually comes to pass.—Sinners will be the same timorous, self-condemned creatures then as they are now. And then they will not be able to stop their ease, who are deaf to all the gentle calls of the gospel now. Then the trump of God will constrain them to hear and fear, to whom the ministers of Christ now preach in vain. Then they must all hear; for, "all that are in their graves," all, without exception, "shall hear his voice." Now the voice of mercy calls, reason pleads, conscience warns, while multitudes will not hear. But this is a voice which shall, which must reach every one of the millions of mankind, and not one of them will be able to stop his ears. Infants and giants, kings and subjects, all ranks, all ages of mankind shall hear the call. The living shall start and be changed, and the dead rise at the sound. The dust that was once alive and formed a human body, whether it flies in the air, floats on the ocean, or vegetates on earth, shall hear the new-creating fiat. Wherever the fragments of the human frame are scattered, this all-penetrating call shall reach and speak them into life. This summons shall spread through every corner of the universe; and Heaven, and earth, and all their inhabitants, shall hear and obey.—Think for a moment; I see, I hear the earth heaving, tombs bursting, graves opening; now the nations under ground begin to stir. There is a noise and shaking among the dry bones. The dust is all alive and in motion, the globe breaks and trembles, as with an earthquake, while this vast army is bursting into life. The ruins of human bodies are scattered far and wide, and have passed through many and surprising transformations. And now, at the sound of the trumpet, they shall all be collected, and all appropriately arranged;—atom to its fellow atom, bone to its fellow bone. Oh! what a dreadful day is just about to burst upon a guilty world! One class will look up and say, "Lo this is our God, we have waited for him, and he will save us;" while the other will say, "Rocks and mountains fall on us, and hide us from Him that sitteth upon the Throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb." O sinner, turn and make your peace with God, before you at his bar appear.

Yours, looking for the Son of God.

GEO. W. CORLISS.

BOLTON, CANADA EAST, April 20, 1854.

Dear Brother: This year brings to the world a notable era in the history of nations. The last sands of time are falling from the world's hour-glass—scoffers are sealing their own fate—the knell of nations is tolling its last warning to a guilty world—the European thunders begin to sound the dreadful doom of millions. O! the scenes of carnage—the fields of blood—the time of trouble! The mighty sword is bathed in heaven. But see, beyond this mighty storm the clouds break—behold he comes—lo, this is our God; we have waited for him Yes he comes, traveling in light ineffable—clothed in grandeur—attended by millions of glorified spirits.—Look up, little flock, he comes to save you. O yes, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the Kingdom—the Kingdom of glory. The Kingdom will soon be set up on the ruins of others; but remember that

"None but holy ones can enter,
Through the pure, celestial gates."

May the sanctifying spirit of truth prepare us for that awful, yet glorious scene.

Yours, looking for redemption soon,

JOSEPH NEEDHAM.

BOSTON, June 28th, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—The Crisis is a welcome messenger to me. I love the Christian spirit which characterizes the writings contained in it. I believe it has been the influence, under the blessing of God, of doing much good in awakening the virgins and the ungodly to hear the last warning to this dying world, to go forth to meet the Bridegroom who is about to come. I enclose sixty dollars to assist you in distributing the welcome messenger, that all may read the joyful news. I believe it will not be needed much longer; for the King will soon come and take his waiting children home to be with Him forever.

Truly yours,

ONE OF THE PILGRIMS.

Derr Brother Merriam:—I have just returned from England and Ireland, and I send you a copy of a paper of which I scattered 17,000 in both countries, 11,000 in England, and six in Ireland. There is very little of the Advent in either countries except Judaism and the future development of the man of sin to persecute the church. I believe the churches in those countries are in a very formal state. The all absorbing question is the war. We must try and do something for the Crisis in Newark, it was providentially created to give to the household a portion of meat in due season, and I believe God will sustain it until the last of the servants are sealed.

Yours, in hope of immortality this present year.

ABRAHAM FLAVELL.

OLDTOWN, LASALLE CO., ILL., June 20, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I write to acknowledge the receipt of the Crisis, and to enclose you one dollar with the promise of more soon. I am pleased with the paper. I find in it something that does me good and strengthens me, as bread does the famishing. The sheep must be fed, and if those whose care it is to feed the flock, give them husks, the great shepherd will most assuredly employ other instrumentalities, so that they may be kept by the power of God and nourished. I do not believe our Lord will leave us long in dry pastures, when he can lead us to those that are green. Brother Burnham and Morgan's visit was timely, and has greatly rejoiced our hearts, and strengthened our faith.

GEO. WHIPPLE.

DISTURBANCE APPREHENDED IN WORCESTER. The Springfield Republican, says the Americans are effecting an extensive organization in the heart of the Commonwealth, and the feeling of hostility between them and the Catholic population is reaching a high pitch. "Threats of the most violent character are made on both sides, and the city is flooded with vague rumors of intended incendiarism, poisoning of families, and other murderous outrages, said to be in contemplation by the foreign residents, who now constitute about one-third of the whole population of the city. The Catholics are known to be arming and preparing themselves for some anticipated crisis, and the Americans are taking similar precautions. The excitement is also spreading to other towns in the vicinity."—[Boston Bee.

☞ We clip the following from the N. Y. Herald:

Genoa May 24, 1854.

The country between Florence and Rome has been rather severely shaken within a few days, by a series of earthquakes, which occasioned much consternation among the inhabitants. The first occured about 10 o'clock on the night of the 14th, and the undulatory motion continued some 3 or 4 seconds. Another more intense followed at about 4 the next morning, and continued over 6 seconds; at 10½ of the same morning, a third shock, still more alarming, held the panic-stricken population breathless for 8 or 10 seconds, and a fourth occured between 3 and 4 in the afternoon, which made the firmest houses tremble, and tumbled into ruins some that were shattered by the shocks in February last. About 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the 22nd, (day before yesterday,) another occured, which was felt at Florence. An American family, which hastily left that city by the evening train for Leghorn, has just informed me that the tables and furniture of the apartments vibrated visibly under the invisible "manifestation," and that some China vases were thrown upon the floor and broken.

No sound or noise whatever, accompanied them, nor were they marked by any sensible meteorological phenomena; nor can I learn that any fissures were made, though it is said that an ancient spring near Perugia has disappeared. The animals participated in the general alarm; and in truth, such oscillatory movements are well suited to disturd one's faith in the immobility of the "solid earth." The weather, however, has been unusually agreeable for some weeks past, and favorable reports come to us from all parts of Italy concerning the crops. There is a reasonable prospect of abundant harvests, and they are much needed to relieve the severe pressure upon the means of subsistence.

ANNEXATION OF AN ITALIAN PRINCIPALITY TO THE UNITED STATES:—A letter from Paris to the New York Tribune, dated June 10th, informs us that the Principality of Monaco, on the shores of the Mediterranean, between Nice and Genoa, with a population of 6500 souls, and two small seaports, is a candidate for admission into the Union of the American States.—It contains three cities, which cover nearly all its area. They are Menton, the largest, Roquebrune, and Monaco, the latter being the capital. The sovereignty of Monaco is vested in the Princes of that name; but from the year 1814 until 1848 it has been under the protection of Sardinia. In 1848, when all Europe was in a state of revolution, Menton and Roquebrune revolted, and declared themselves independent. Monaco, the capital, being occupied by a Sardinian garrison remained faithful. The Sardinian Chamber of Deputies has recently prepared a project of law to incorporate the revolted cities and all the principality into the kingdom as an integral part thereof, without any separate rights; and it was probably in view of this, that the Duke of Valentinois, one of the Princes of Monaco, made an attempt to seize his hereditary possessions. He failed, however, and both parties have appealed to the United States' representatives at Paris, to take possession of the territory. The Prince wishes to sell out to the United States his rights for the purpose of raising money, as he is in needy circumstances, while the people of the principality wish to be taken under the wing of the American Union, in order to secure republican liberty, and the protection of a powerful government. The United States Secretary of Legation at Paris has undertaken to investigate the matter.—The seaports are said to be good ones, and would prove valuable to us, while the territory is described as rich in mines of silver, iron, mercury, &c.—[Philadelphia Ledger.

HORRIBLE ACCIDENT.—Yesterday evening a box was sent to Mr. J. H. Allison, the Superintendent of the Marine Hospital on the corner of Longworth and Western Row. about 10 o'clock Mr. Allison and his wife were seated in their private room, and concluded to open the box and examine its contents, the consequence of which wast he explosion of a bomb-shell, the iron of which from appearance must have been 3-4 of an inch thick and heavily charged with powder. The noise of the explosion was heard a distance of five squares.

The neighbors discovered the Hospital to be on fire, and the alarm was raised, and by the aid of a few buckets of water the fire was extinguished. In the room Mr. and Mrs. Allison were found bleeding and groaning. Mr. A.'s bowels are torn out, and his legs literally crushed, while his head, face and breast are burnt in a terrible manner. Both arms of Mrs. A., were torn off, her head mangled, and her whole person shockingly burnt. Both were breathing at 11 o'clock, but neither, it is thought, can possibly survive the night.—The explosion caused sad havoc in the room. The ceiling was raised from its position, and riddled by pieces of the bomb shell.

A later despatch says that Mr. and Mrs. Allison are both dead, and adds that Mr. A. was probably killed because he was knowing to a murder that had been committed.—[Boston Traveller.

Later from Europe.

By the Europa, from Liverpool, at New York, Friday, we have three days later advices from Europe. The markets had slightly improved; but the news relative to the war is of little importance.

Silistria held out up the latest date, the 14th. It is announced that Austria and Prussia have jointly framed a reply, overlooking the objections of smaller German States.

Col. Mantueffal is about to go to St. Petersburg with a message from Prussia recommending the Czar to accept Austria's recall summons. It is, however, rumored that the Czar has already refused it.

The Baltic fleet was at Boresuna, twenty miles from Helsingfors. Nothing later from Asia, Greece, or the Black Sea. The Allies are still proceeding to Varna. Redchid Pasha retires from the Turkish ministry, and is succeeded by Chechib Effendi.

A bill giving Canada an elective Senate passed second reading in the House of Lords.

Very wet weather in France exists—fears for the crops.

On the 13th of May, the British steamer destroyed the ships, dockyard and stores at Brahertsdt, in the north of the Gulf of Bothnia;—350,000 roubles damage was done. On the 31st, a steamer captured several vessels off Uleaborgh, and on the 1st of June four steamers destroyed the ships, dockyards and stores at Uleaborgh; 400,000 roubles damage done.

Athens, June 7th. Complete concord now exists amongst Ministers. The three dismissed Generals made their submission. Hadji Petro still holds out in Thessaly.

The Europa Cavalry Transport was burned to the waters edge, while on her passage to Gibralter with troops; 21 lives were lost, including Col. Moore, commander of the troops, and fifteen soldiers; remainder on board, 66 in number, saved themselves in boats.

The Russians made another unsuccessful attempt on Silistria, on the 10th. Marshal Naskieloctheh received a very severe wound in the right leg, and was obliged to delegate to the commander, Gen. Gorteischoff, to be removed to Jassey.

A Turkish attack on the Island of Mokan, was repulsed. The Emperor Nicholas is shortly expected at Kiew. It is stated that the Porte signifies its acceptance of the Convention proposed by Austria with reference to the eventual evacuation of the Principalities.

St. Petersburg, June 8th. The news of the adhesion of Greece to the ultimatum of the Western Powers caused great surprise, Russia reckoning on divisions contrived at great expense in the southern provinces of Turkey.

Appointments.

GROVE MEETING.

A Grove Meeting will be held in the Grove near Fort Brewerton, in Onondaga Co., N. Y., commencing on the 15th of July, and continuing over the Sabbath. Preaching by Brethren from the East. All who wish to hear upon the great, sublime and important subject of the Lord's Second Coming are invited to attend from far and near. Provisions will be made for those coming from a distance, during the meeting.—Oh friends come and hear for yourselves; give the subject a fair investigation, then you will be capable of judging whether these things be so. I assure you, dear friends, these things are so. Jesus, the King of glory, is coming this year.—We are just upon the verge of the greatest revolution that has ever been witnessed since the creation of the world. The last great conflict is coming—the battle of Armageddon draws on—the kingdoms of this world are about to be dashed in pieces like a potter's vessel, and the everlasting kingdom of Jesus Christ established under the whole heavens; and the saints will take the kingdom and possess it forever even forever and ever. Oh poor sinner, will you heed this last note of warning that will ever be sounded to this guilty world? the Judgment is coming; flee to Christ without delay. Prepare to meet thy God in peace

VERY SPECIAL NOTICE.

Will all subscribers who receive their papers in single wrappers, and wish to have them continued, please inform us this week. We stated our reasons for making this request in our last week's paper. The trouble and expense will be but a trifle for each individual, and it will save our sending the paper to at least a thousand and whom we know nothing about. Our friends will all understand it. This request is only to those who receive the papers in wrappers.

Bro. R. Porter: We will meet cordially.—Please give us the author's name.

NOTICE. The Lord's children here are few, young and thrifty, holding meetings on Tuesday and Friday evenings, of the week, also Sundays, day and evening, at Bro. Ralph Deveraux's, on High St., Marblehead, Mass.

NOTICE. Dear Brethren,—The Lord is soon to come and judge the world in righteousness and establish his kingdom on the earth, and we have but a short time to warn our fellow men. As we are commanded to work while the day lasts, we have fitted out a Tent that will accommodate about one thousand persons for the purpose of going out into "highways and hedges" to sound the alarm; and we want to keep it in the field all the time, (if the Lord will), and do all the good we can. Therefore, those that know of a field of labor where good can be done, and wish to have a Tent Meeting, will please write to me immediately, so that I can make the necessary arrangements in order to meet the wishes of the Brethren.

All letters to be directed to James Hemenway, Clinton, Mass. J. HEMENWAY.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige and save us immense labor and perplexity if they will strictly adhere to the following rules:

1. Over all communications designed to be published write, For the World's Crisis.

2. Over all communications not designed for be public write, Private.

3. At the head of all letters write the date, ... [illegible] ... State, if written from the Middle, Western, or Southern States.

4. Write all orders for the papers or books on a page by itself, ... [illegible]

5. [illegible]

6. Be careful to write names and P. O. addresses in a legible hand.

7. In returning papers write on the paper the name and P. O. address of the person to whom it had been sent.

8. In preparing matter for the Crisis we hope our correspondents will adopt, as the most important and indispensible of all rules, the practice of commending the subject to God, praying fervently for light to be reflected on the position of the Church, and for heavenly manna to feed and nurture the little flock unto eternal life—also that sinners may be induced to flee from impending wrath, and take refuge in the ark before the deluge takes them all away.

9. Let the letters and communications be carefully read over, corrected, and, if need be re-written, punctuated and prepared for the press, so far as the writer has ability so to do. If, however, the writer does not, ... and punctuation, &c., the Editor is just as willing, and if possible more so, to serve the humblest member of the flock in bringing his or her sentiments and feelings before the public, as those who have been favored with higher educational advantages, provided only they write under the influence of the Spirit of God.

Business Items.

☞ Bro. W. S. Hersey: We cannot decide upon the route. That belongs to the P. O. Department.

☞ Bro. A. D. Fay: They are all gone.

☞ We hope persons returning papers to have them discontinued, will be careful to give the P. O. address to which they are sent ☞ Bro. David Hanscomb: We do not understand the address to which you want the papers sent; please inform us.

☞ Will all persons owing for Hymn Books at this Office please forward as soon as possible, for we shall have to make a payment for the book immediately.

Persons are particularly requested, when writing to this office, to let the business part of the letter, as well as notices of all kinds, stand in a place by itself. We find that some things have been overlooked in consequence of not being separate.

☞ Notices and appointments must be written as they are expected to appear in the paper.

☞ As we have published another edition of "The Grand Crisis in Human Affairs," and were obliged to pay cash down for the same, we hope all who have not remitted the funds for the copies they have sold, will attend to the subject immediately.

For the World's Crisis.

Christian Graces.

There is a star that shineth
With soft and holy light;
It cheers my lonely pathway
Through shades of darkest night;
Hope only beams for mortals,
And when my race is run,
I'll leave it at the portals
Of my eternal home.

Faith weaves a goodly garment
Tinged deep with crimson hue;
I'll wrap its folds around me
Till Canaan heaves in view;
Shall need it then no longer
When past the shadowy night;
I'll leave this tried conductor
Where faith is lost in sight.

There is a wreath of beauty
I'd twine around my brow,
Of truthfulness and duty,
O yes I'd wear it now;
I would not cease to wear it
Though in the kingdom bright;
Truth's stamp'd with immortality
And knows no shade, or blight.

There is a rare sweet flower
I'd always call my own,
It thrives in sorrows bower,
And blooms with the thorn;
It is the fairest ornament
That mortals ever wore,
Humility I'd bear with me
To yon celestial shore.

There is a gem of loveliness
I'd hide within my heart;
I'd press it to my bosom
And never with it part;
And when in Eden's bowers
My golden harp shall trill,
Love still shall be my diadem,
My dearest treasure still.

There is a crown enduring
When earthly kingdoms fall,
I'd part with life to win it
And freely give my all;
The dead have not obtain'd it,
The sinner cannot wear
This crown of Immortality
When Jesus does appear.

For the World's Crisis.

Redemption.

BY MARY L. PRATT.

Dear Christian friend, the time is near
When our deliverer shall appear:
Break forth, and sing, our coming king
Will soon a crown of glory bring.

On Calvary's mountain, once he died,
The bleeding stream flowed from his side;
Hark, hear his groan, His plaintive moan,
"My Father, let thy will be done."

And now he's drank the bitter cup,
His precious life he's yielded up;
Oh hear his cries, for us he dies,
To heaven he turns his languid eyes.

And now the debt for us is paid,
Sinners, on Him your guilt was laid;
The deed is done, the victory won,
"'Tis finished," cries the blessed Son.

He's risen and ascended high
At God's right hand, no more to die;
But he'll leave soon, His Father's throne,
And come to claim the earth his own.

O Christian, gird thy armor on,
And venture now on Christ alone;
Make him your choice, obey his voice,
In hope of glory, e'er rejoice.

O Sinner, come to Christ and live,
Repent of sin, God's word believe;
And then arise and be baptized,
And you by him will then be prized.

The Lord in Judgment will appear,
The trump will sound, the dead will hear;
When he descends, probation ends,
And every knee before him bends.

On the New Earth the saints will reign,
And walk the verdant, flowery plain,
On the golden street they'll plant their feet,
And friends long parted there will meet.

The Crystal river there shall flow,
And thirst we never more shall know,
And life's fair tree shall ever be
Within that boundless kingdom free.

Then let us strive to enter there,
In that blest kingdom have a share,
On that fair shore we'll part no more,
Sin, death, and pain forever o'er.

For the World's Crisis.

The Christian Hope.

How sweet the Christian's hope to me
While here I'm called to roam;
It points me to a better land
That I may call my home.

This hope reminds me of the time
When Jesus will appear;
It gives me joy, it gives me peace,
It drives away my fear.

When darkness hovers o'er my path,
And I no light can see,
This hope sustains my drooping soul,
And bids me joyful be.

When friends that once I loved so well,
Leave me alone to sigh,
This hope bids me rejoice and sing,
For my redemption's nigh.

This hope it purifies my heart,
And [illegible] night to day;
It plants my feet upon the Rock,
And keeps me in the way.

The day is near—Oh joyful thought—
When I shall gain the prize;
This hope will then be turned to sight
Before my wondering eyes.

Yes, it will come, I'll doubt no more;
The Savior is at hand;
In EIGHTEEN HUNDRED FIFTY-FOUR
We'll take the promised land.

Bristol, Ct., May 30, 1854. G. L. T.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Whipton, Ct., June 22d, 1854.

To my Brother in Christ;—Although I am a stranger to you in the flesh, yet I am your sister in the tribulation, and patience, and kingdom of Jesus Christ; a pilgrim and a stranger. Here I have no continuing city, or abiding place, but I am seeking one to come, and through Christ I am heir to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away.—Through the kindness of brother S. Cooper, I have had the privilege of reading the World's Crisis, for which I praise God.—O how my heart has been made to rejoice from time to time, while reading its pages; and I feel to praise him for those blessed words, that when our king took his far journey, he gave authority to his servants, and to every man his work, and commanded his porter to watch; and blessed be his name, the faithful ones his "watch care keep," and they are waking up the virgins, who are trimming their lamps for the last time. They will sleep no more; for the cry has gone forth, "go ye out to meet him." O how often am I led to look up and praise him with a full soul, that I ever heard the sound; and hearing, I believe and rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory. I believe we are living near the judgment; and I deeply feel the necessity of giving heed to our Savviour's words; "be ye therefore ready also; for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh."—Dear Brethren and Sisters, the Lord has done great things for me, whereof I am glad; He is leading me by His right hand, and protecting me with His holy arm, and with David I can say, "thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me." O do not despise the rod: a kind Father sends it in love. Let those of you who are called to suffer according to the will of God, 'commit the keeping of your souls to Him, as unto a faithful Creator." "Cast all your care upon Him, for He careth for you" "Call upon Him in the day of trouble, and He will answer you." Glory be to God, He is a present help in time of need. His Grace is sufficient for thee. I have proved all this; and this is but a drop from the fountain. I feel his word and his love like fire shut up in my bones, and "my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God." "O when shall I come and appear before Him?" I believe it will be but a little while; the nations are gathering in the valley of decision; but they little know who mustereth the battle, or who will decide the fate of those nations. "The press is full, the fats overflow; for their wickedness is great;" this is the cause of those multitudes gathering in the valley of decision. Soon He will come that is to tread the great "wine press of the wrath of Almighty God." O great and dreadful day! Who can abide it but those who stand complete in Christ? See to it that you have his spirit dwelling in you continually; for without it you are none of his. We all have a talent committed to our care; be careful that you do not hide it in the earth. Says the Master, "go work in my vineyard. You can all do something, if it is but to feed the hungry, and clothe the naked; for the poor ye have always with you, and whensoever ye will, ye may do them good. Remember this, ye that have this world's goods, be careful of your stewardship; soon the Master will come and reckon with you—O let us, one and all, be found working the works of God; not doing our own will, but the will of him that hath called us out of darkness into his marvelous light. O that God would strengthen and teach and uphold his faithful watchmen, that are giving the last lingering call of mercy to this poor, doomed earth, is the daily prayer of your unworthy sister in Christ,

Emeline Buckland.

Dear Brother Merriam: I have spent the last two Sabbaths in the city of New York. I find many good brethren in this great city of wickedness. Those who have never visited this emporium of the western world, have but a faint conception of the vast amount of human suffering endured, or of the rapid increase of moral evil so manifest to every observer of men and things. He whose soul is not stirred within him; whose sympathies are not awakened by such objects as everywhere meet the eye, must be callous to all the softer impressions of the human soul. Here is a representation from all the great nations of the world; and the spirit that actuated them at home, more or less, manifests itself when here. The influx of foreigners is on the rapid increase; and our institutions and constitutional liberties which once produced such a taming effect, have lost all their charms now; confidence is all destroyed; government officials look only for gain from their quarter. Supreme selfishness reigns. Discontent manifests itself in every nation upon earth. In every town and city the spirit of rebellion is ready to break forth; constitutional authority is trampled under foot, and the most sacred covenant obligations disregarded. The spirit of war is universal, from the child that can say, my father, to the old man leaning on his staff, all are being aroused. The mighty men are waked up, and the men of war are gathering; the last scene in this eventful age is at hand. What do these things mean? Can we find the answer in the word of God? Oh look at these things. "Behold the Bridegroom cometh." Dear brethren, He is coming; oh awake, awake, slumber not in this last hour. A few more struggles and the victory is ours—ours forever. But before closing I would not fail to mention that I baptized eight the last Sabbath I spent in New York city, four of whom had belonged to the Catholic Church.—One of them less than four weeks ago was confined under lock and key in a convent at Hartford, Ct. Here she was kept for some time on water gruel; but not liking her entertainment, she possessed herself of the key of the enclosure, and escaped from their power. She is looking for the Saviour this year. Her Catholic friends deceived her, making her believe she was going to Hartford to visit a cousin. When there, they slipped her under the padlock, suspecting her of heresy. But she is free, thank the Lord, and I washed the mark of the beast from her forehead by baptism.—What but the religion of the crucified Lamb could influence a young woman to leave her father's house, and become an outcast from her kindred, without any visible advantage, so far as this world is concerned? Such instances as these are a loud call to our young friends who have so many advantages to enjoy. Oh what responsibilities rest upon us in view of these privileges. Let us improve them. Behold the Judge standeth at the door.—He comes this year. Amen.

P. S. I wish to say to all who have written me to visit them, that I will come as soon as I can make arrangements. If brethren will get up grove meetings, I will attend to such meetings without delay.—It is but a little work to seat a grove; and brethren coming from a distance can put up tents. Now, brethren, get up grove meetings, in different places, and let me know it, and I will attend them. Much more good might be done with the same effort than in any other way. Come, brethren, act. We have but a few months more to work; let us work while the day lasts.

Brother Merriam:—I think I can honestly say to you, and to the readers of the Crisis, that I am willing my name should go out as evil, if it may promote that Gospel which has power in it. Yes, it is surely "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." I am made glad while I read its pages, and am assured that it was so adapted to the capacity of fallen man, that he is without excuse, if he is not "thoroughly furnished unto every good work." "Knowing this first"—yes, we mark the expression; and now we will listen attentively to you, Peter, while we hear you say that no prophecy of the Scripture "is of any private interpretation.—For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men;" what kind of men were they Peter? "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the holy Ghost." Well now let us examine to see whether Peter had much confidence in this mode of receiving instruction—yes there is evidence demonstrative that he had the most implicit confidence, and was with us a firm believer in the final "restitution of all things spoken of by all the holy prophets since the world began." Hear him in the "16th vs. of the first chapter" and onward. "For we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye witnesses of his majesty," etc. Now while we hear the description of the power and glory of that sublime panoramic scenery, as typifying that which shall have its Antetype, at Jesus second appearing,—we hear him say, we have something more sure—it is what the Prophets have said—These things which we have seen here are indeed very glorious; I have been awed into reverence; I have even asked permission to build three tabernacles; it seemed to me so real that I knew not what I said—but now I am come to consideration and have recieved the additional instruction from my Master, saying "tell the vision to no man," etc. until the Son of man be risen. This was intended to prepare their minds and ours too, thank the Lord, to understand more fully the glorious change that yet awaits the righteous dead and living, at his appearing and kingdom—but I must close by saying to many that I have not seen, pray for me that my faith fail not; for I believe the time is nearly arrived when we shall reap eternal life, if we faint not.

Dear Bro. Merriam: Since the last number of the Crisis came to hand, I have thought that it might be proper and right for me to pen a few lines to you, to let you know that the publication of the Crisis has been and is of benefit to me. As the good Lord would have it, I have had the opportunity to hear the subject of time presented by a brother in whom I had confidence as a Christian, and my mind and feelings have undergone a change. Prejudice has been removed, and I have investigated the subject as far as I have had access to the means of obtaining light, and I have derived the greatest light from the Bible, through the medium of prayer.—My soul has been quickened in the heavenly way, and the glory of the '43 and '44 movment has returned to my soul; and I do exceedingly rejoice in hope of seeing Jesus this year. This movement at this time, looks much like a fufilment of the Parable of the ten Virgins. It accords very much with my experience.

I was converted to Christ in the winter of '39 and '40, became a member of the Cong. Church in Westminster, remained in it until I embraced the Advent and the doctrine of the destruction of the wicked, when I was excluded for heresy. I have been with the Advent people ever since, and am to-day.

Disappointments and trials have sometimes almost shaken me from the foundation; but I have always endeavored to keep my face towards Christ, although like Peter, I have "followed him afar off," sometimes up, sometimes down; but now, thank God, the darkness is past, and the true light shineth, and I expect it will shine more and more until the perfect day.

It seems to me that God will justify the position taken by his people in '43 in going forth with that confident expectation of meeting the Bridegroom.

The tarrying of the Vision, the tarrying of the Bridegroom, and the slumbering and sleeping of the virgins, and also, the waking up at the present time, all conspire to show we are on the track to the heavenly Canaan. Said a devoted sister to me some three months ago, "I don't know what the advent people are preaching, but I feel in my heart that somebody is saying, Behold the Bridegroom is coming." She had been confined at home so as not to be able to attend meetings; but was, as she said, waked up, to see what the prophets said in reference to this time. She is strong in the faith of his speedy coming. Bro. Mathewson has been here, and the result of the meeting, I think, is good, though some think otherwise. People seem to have taken a pretty decided stand, either for or against the time movement.

O how my spirit has been grieved to see the indifference manifested to the subject by those who were deeply interested in it in '43 and '44. Some say, "I have been caught once, and I don't mean to be exposed to such a disappointment again." O where is the faith that was once delivered to the saints?

When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth? There are a few of the poor in this world, but rich in faith, in this place, who are looking for and expecting the Lord this year, and are fully determined to fight the battle through, to the end.

When I first heard of the Crisis' being started, I thought it might be a wrong movement; but when I had access to one, I found it talked the language of Canaan, full of the spirit of meekness; I was then satisfied that it was needed to aid in feeding the little flock, and giving light in reference to the time of the Lord's coming. I have not paid much for its support, but intend to do all I can, that it may continue to shed its radiant light until it is lost amid the opening glories of God's everlasting kingdom. I have felt it my duty to leave my business and go, as the Lord opens the way, and do all that lays in my power to bring some to Christ.

The word will prove either a savor of life unto life, or of death unto death to those who hear; and who is sufficient for these things? We are but vessels of clay; and we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power might be of God and not of us. How true it is, that the word is like a sharp two-edged sword, piercing to the dividing asunder of soul and body; and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. May the good Lord be with you, and give you strength to fight the battle through to the end. The crown will soon be given you, when the King shall come in his beauty. I am with you in the battle, to suffer all the shame, ignominy and reproach that may be heaped upon you for the stand you take in relation to the appearing of the King.

Yours, waiting for Jesus,

Joseph D. Merriam.

My dear Brother: I believe the time is near when it will be said, "he that is holy let him be holy still; and he that is filthy let him be filthy still." O what a solemn thought, that with one of these classes every individual living will be identified.—There is a fountain in which the vilest may wash and be clean. Those who realize the need of a Saviour are rushing to that fountain in Christ; for they feel that what they do must be done quickly. O Brother, when I think of the lovingkindness of the Lord to me, in showing me the truth, and in giving me this blessed hope, which I would not part with for all the honors ever bestowed on mortals here, I feel as though I must make every effort in my power to influence others to believe the word of God. It seems as though no one had any excuse for disbelieving the Bible in these days when it is fulfilling so fast before their eyes; but like the Jews, the great mass of this generation will perish through unbelief. Thank the Lord, there are a few who are willing to be counted the fifth and offscouring of the earth, for the sake of Him who has suffered all the scorn and contempt and cruelty that men can invent, and has died that we might live and reign with Him. My prayer is that the Lord will incline the hearts of many more to come out and be separate from all that is not of God.

Come out from among them" is our Father's command;
Come follow thy Captain, He leadeth the way;
Take his yoke, it is easy; come follow the Lamb,
From this dark night of sorrow He'll lead into day

Come out from among them, lest they lead thee astray;
Take the path that is narrow and strait to the door,
Where the righteous shall enter in beauteous array,
To dwell with their Saviour in peace evermore.

Come out from among them, why tarry so long,
See ye not that the dark clouds of vengeance are near;
Listen not any longer to the Syren's sweet song
Of peace and of safety; soon the Judge will appear.

Come out from among them, make haste lest ye die,
For the day of probation will quickly be o'er;
When the righteous are caught up to mansions on high,
Too late then the scoffers their fate will deplore.

O haste while the Angel commissioned from God
Is sealing the chosen; when His mission is o'er,
Tribulation and anguish will come like a flood
On the proud who will boast of their wisdom no more.

While the wrath of the mighty One shaketh the earth,
And sinners stand trembling in fear of their doom;
A nation is born in a day from the earth,
For Jesus hath triumphed o'er death and the tomb.

The righteous are changed, their trials are o'er,
By faith they have gained the fair haven of rest;
Their warfare's accomplished they suffer no more
They're safe, they have entered the home of the blest.

Home of the blest—how I long to be there
With the saints who are gathered with Jesus their King,
All clothed with his righteousness, spotless and fair,
With loved ones united, together they sing.

How bright is the prospect while suffering here,
For the day of redemption we know is at hand;
O let us be faithful and watch unto prayer
That we may be ready in his presence to stand.

Yours, in hope of immortality,

Alice B. Draper.

Brother Merriam:—The Crisis comes to us laden with its rich instruction, and practical truths of the word of God relative to the last days. This is what we want to bring us to God, and make us more like Jesus. The more I peruse its columns, the more light and truth breaks forth to my mind. It is one of the best religious papers ever had in our family, and we are not ashamed to let our friends and neighbors read it; for it is meat in due season to every one that believes and treasures up the truth in his heart. And if I know my own heart, I want the truth; for it is the truth that makes us free in these last days. The sound is heard, Jesus is coming, the night is far spent and the day is at hand when we shall behold the King in his beauty.—O how long have God's people offered up the petition, "thy Kingdom come, and thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." I do praise the Lord that we are living in these last days, when the cry is going all over the world, "behold the Bridegroom cometh." Are we ready for the coming kingdom? Dear Brethren and Sisters, we are almost home: "and I pray God your whole body, soul and spirit be preserved blameless unto the coming of the Lord." Then our trials will be all over, O praise the Lord. "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." "Then we which remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord." "Wherefore comfort one another with these words." For the coming of the Lord draweth nigh, and I pray the good Lord to hasten it in His time. Then tears will be wiped away from all faces by the soft hand of Jesus. What a blessed time to the true household of faith.—We do well to gird up the loins of our minds, and be sober, and hope to the end, for the grace that is to be brought unto us at the revelation of Jesus Christ. May we all be ready and found watching that we may be able to "escape those things that are coming on the earth, and stand before the Son of man."

A sincere lover of present truth.

The 2300 days Dan. viii: 14.

Daniel says, (ch. 8: 19,) "at the time appointed the end shall be;" and in v. 17 he says, "At the time of the end shall be the vision." We have here the length of the vision, viz. 2300 days (years,) and in Dan. ix: 25 we find the commencement of those days, i. e. that they commence at "the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem," and in Dan. viii: 14, we find that they extend to the cleansing of the sanctuary, or in other words, this world. We find also that this work was to be done inside of the 2300 days; for God says by the mouth of Paul, Acts xvii: 31, that "he hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained," that is Jesus Christ. Then it is in time and not in eternity. Christ says, (John 12: 48,) "He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him, the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day." Then we have found when the judgment day is; it is in time, not beyond; and that it is just one year long: or as we understand the chart, it is between 1854 and 1855. God says, "the day of vengeance is in my heart, and the year of my redeemed is come." Here we have the year or day of the Lord, then in Rev. 6: 17, "For the great day (year) of his wrath is come."

Michael. i. e. Christ is to take the kingdom in the days of these kings. This "kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in peices and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever." This is the time when the sanctuary is cleansed or purified by fire. Peter says, "the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat. The earth also, and the works that are therein shall be burned up." "For as a snare shall it come upon all them that dwell upon the face of the whole earth." When will they be taken in a snare? At the standing up of Michael. Says Jesus, "When once the master of the house is risen up and shut the door * * * he shall say unto you I know you not from whence ye are." Then will they knock in vain, or say give us of your oil. We find after this no more mercy, and here we are brought to a shut door. Jesus says, "I am the door; by me if any man enter in, he shall go in and out and find pasture." Again, at the standing up of Michael the silence takes place in heaven for the space of half an hour, (7 ½ days.) Rev. 8: 1. Zech. 2: 13. "Be silent, O all flesh before the Lord; for He is raised up out of His holy habitation." Is. 26: 21. "For behold the Lord cometh out of His place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity." "The earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no man cover her slain." "But in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God shall be finished, as He hath declared to His servants the prophets." Then the gospel day is ended, and a great voice shall proclaim, "it is done." Then "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still." Here then is the judgment day. God's word is judge. "And behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me to give to every man according as his work shall be."—Then cometh the resurrection; "some to life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt;" "then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority, and power; for he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet."

Faith and Obedience.

Concluded.

Says the Lord by the prophet Joel, "I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke."

A writer in a London paper, dated Sept. 5, 1839, says: "Between the hours of ten on Thursday night, and three yesterday morning, in the heavens, was observed one of the most magnificent specimens of these extraordinary phenomena, the falling stars and Northern lights, witnessed for many years past. The first indication of this singular phenomena, was ten minutes before 10, when a light crimson vapor rose from the northern portion of the hemisphere, and gradually extended to the centre of the heavens, and by ten o'clock, or a quarter past, the whole from east to west, was one vast sheet of light. It had a most alarming appearance, and was exactly like that occasioned by a terrific fire. The light varied considerable; at one time it seemed to fall, and directly after-rose with intense brightness. There were to be seen mingled with it volumes of smoke, which rolled over and over, and every beholder seemed convinced that it was a "tremendous conflagration." The consternation of the metropolis was very great; thousands of persons were running in the direction of the supposed catastrophe. The engines belonging to the fire-brigade stations in Baker st., Farrington st., Watling st., Waterloo Road, and likewise those belonging to the west of England stations—in fact every fire-engine in London was horsed and galloped after the supposed "scene of destruction," with more than ordinary energy, followed by carriages, horsemen, and vast mobs. Some of the engines proceeded as far as Highgate and Holloway, before the error was discovered. These appearances lasted for upwards of two hours, and toward morning the spectacle became one of more grandeur. At two o'clock in the morning the phenomena presented a most gorgeous scene, and are very difficult to describe. The whole of London was illuminated as clear as noonday, and the atmosphere was remarkably clear. The southern hemisphere, at the time mentioned, though unclouded was very dark; but the stars which were innumerable, shone beautifully. The opposite side of the heavens presented a singular, but magnificent contrast; it was clear to extreme, and the light was very vivid; there was a continued succession of meteors which varied in splendor—they appeared formed in the centre of the heavens, and spread till they seemed to burst. The effect was electrical. Myriods of small stars shot out over the horizon and darted with that swiftness toward the earth that the eye scarcely could follow the track; they seemed to burst also, and throw a dark crimson vapor over the entire hemisphere. The colors were most magnificent. At half-past two the spectacle changed to darkness, which, on dispersing, displayed a luminous rainbow in the zenith of the heavens, and round the ridge of darkness that overhung the southern portion of the country. Soon afterward, columns of silvery light radiated from it—they increased wonderfully, intermingled among crimson vapor, which formed at the same time, and when at full height, the spectacle was beyond all imagination. Stars were darting about in all directions, and continued until four o'clock when all died away." Now here is a grand description of celestial phenomena, answering, in a very striking manner, to the prediction: "wonders in the heavens," —"blood and fire, and pillars of smoke." No doubt very many of our readers recollect the evening of Jan. 25, 1837, when the heavens seemed almost to be on fire, and many supposed the day of judgment had actually come. The snow presented the appearance of fire and blood commingled. These remarkable appearances in the heavens have been so frequent during "this generation," that they have ceased to alarm their consciences, as at the first, and they quell their fears by saying, "These things have always been." And then, when we speak of the signs of Jesus' coming being in the past, they say, "We do not know of any signs which have taken place, all things continue as they were." If Jesus could say to the generation who had witnessed the proofs of his Mesiahship: "Ye hypocrites! ye can discern the face of the sky and of the earth (and learn respecting the weather), but how is it that ye do not discern the signs of the times?" How much more might it be said of this generation, who have seen the "wonders in heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath," which were predicted by the prophets, and Christ himself, as precursors of the "great and terrible day of the Lord."

We might cite your attention to multitudes of instances, in which God has spoken in thunder tones to this generation by "signs in the sun, in the moon, and in the stars," but no doubt some are fresh in the minds of all of you. Perhaps an individual could not be found, who has not beheld more or less of these "fearful signs."

Now so sure as all of the signs, commencing with the darkening of the sun and of the moon, have transpired within the limits of a generation, now living upon the earth, so certain will it be that they will not pass away until Jesus be revealed from heaven in flaming fire, with all his holy angels. More than 70 years have past since the darkening of the sun marked the ending of the tribulation; and only here and there can those be found who can remember that remarkable day. O how near are we then to the day of God! The signs in the past, and now the gathering of the nations to the great battle of Armageddon has begun. The pillar of peace has fallen—the Alliance is broken—the winds of war are about to be loosed, by those four powers which have hitherto restrained them, until the sealing of the servants of God was accomplished. Ere the destroying angel is sent forth upon his mission to all the world, a mark must be set upon the foreheads of those who sigh and cry for the abominations that are done in the land, for they shall escape the snare which is coming upon all who dwell upon the face of the whole earth—they shall be delivered from the "time of trouble," which is to come upon the nations at the standing up of Michael. Upon them the day of the Lord will not come as a thief, for they have been on the watch tower and considered the tokens, and caught the gleaming light of the day-star.

As the sound of the midnight cry falls upon their ear, they trim their lamps anew, and replenish them with fresh oil, so that they burn with increased brilliancy, and with these the waiting virgins hasten forth to meet the Bridegroom. O how blessed will those be who are found ready, with robes unspotted, and hearts expectant, to welcome the return of the King of glory. They will enter in with him to the marriage feast, and sit at his right hand.

Their night of weeping is now ended—joy has come in the morning—a morning without clouds—a morning that will not be succeeded by twilight and darkness.—Their joy will never give place to sorrow—their smiles will never be followed by tears—their health will never be succeeded by sickness—their life will never end in death. Their rest will be a glorious one—their mansion, Christ himself prepared—their inheritance will be incorruptible and unfading—their treasure will ne'er wax old, a crown of life is theirs, and a kingdom without end.

But there is another side of the leaf.—The awful state of those who are found in darkness, either because they were "willingly ignorant," or led by blind guides.—Upon such the day of the Lord will come as a "snare,"—as a "thief," and their house will be broken up. So intent are they in their worldly schemes, laying up for themselves treasures upon earth, that they have not become "rich toward God." Little have they been aware that they were heaping together treasures for the last days, and that the rust thereof would testify against them. So fearful have they been, that their children would not have an abundance, they have permitted the poor to suffer for food and for clothing. The wants of the needy they have not searched out as did Job. The widows and fatherless, they have not visited in their affliction, neither kept themselves unspotted from the world; thus proving themselves destitute of the only "religion" which is "pure and undefiled."

They have clad themselves with costly raiment, and decked themselves with golden ornaments; thus gratifying the pride of their hearts and violating the commands of God. They contribute largely, perhaps, for the erection of a splendid church—or the purchase of a fine-toned organ—and the support of a popular and eloquent preacher; for all this gratifies the "lust of the eye, and the pride of life." They give to a so-called benevolent object, when a party of pleasure will compensate measurably for the gift. They labor to build up their Zion by increasing its popularity, and proselyting to their faith persons of wealth and fame. To effect this object, each strives to excel the neighbor church in the splendor of their idol temple, the popularity of their minister—the rich swelling music of their choir—the softness of their cushioned pews, and the affability of their manners towards persons of distinction. With such, "the offence of the cross has ceased," and they fancy they are going to heaven in silver slippers, not in the old-fashioned narrow rugged path, but an open beaten way, where there are no "hills of Difficulty" to climb, nor "valley of Humility," into which to descend. Their name is enrolled on the Church Book, and they have no doubt but it is recorded in the Book of Life. Are these looking for Jesus, and loving his appearing? No, indeed! Why should they wish Him to come, when he would destroy their idols—defeat their worldly schemes—burn up their inheritance, and bring to naught their finely planned projects for the honor and influence of their name among men? Do they "groan, being burdened, earnestly desiring" to have the earthly tabernacle dissolved, and the house which is from heaven put on, "that mortality might be swallowed up of life?" Not they, indeed! Here is their pleasure—here their interest—here their affection, and the thought of dying, or the coming of Christ, would fill them with terror.

How is it with their watchmen? Are they exhorting men to repent, because a day has been appointed in which God will judge the world by Jesus Christ? No.—They present as motives that they will be more honorable—more respected in society if they become religious, have enlarged opportunities for usefulness, and to accumulate wealth. Do they tell them that they must appear before the judgment seat of Christ, and be sentenced to everlasting fire if unholy? O no! such language as that would grate too harshly upon the ear, and probably give offence. Sometimes they will venture to tell them that they must die, and religion will then be a solace. Do they tell them that religion consists of good works, and not a state of mind; and that in order to be Christ's disciples they must be babtized into Christ, and live soberly, godly, self-denying, cross-bearing, not conformed to the world, neither in spirit nor life? That they will have to be hated by the ungodly—persecuted by those who obey not the truth, and have all manner of evil spoken against them falsely for Christ's sake? Nay, verily! Such truths would never win the men of wealth and of honor. "Such declarations as these would never lead those gay and and fashionable ladies to form a connection with our church; and, indeed," says the white-handed, delicate looking, and sickly attired clergyman, "if I should preach thus, would I not condemn myself?" Are these the followers of the despised Nazarine—the Carpenter, whose apostles were firshermen? They profess to be, but, methinks if it were his actual presence they were required to honor, instead of his memory, their professed regard and love would be of the self-same stamp with that of the Jews, who "builded the tombs of the prophets, and garnished the sepulchres of the righteous, saying, if we had lived in the days of our fathers we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets."

Says John, an inspired apostle, one of the ambassadors of Christ:—"We are of God; he that knoweth God heareth us; he that is not of God heareth not us.—Hereby know we the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error."

Here is the Bible touch-stone, by which to determine between truth and error.—Those who conform not to the apostolic rules, and the code of laws administered by them—and preach not the gospel which they preached, are not of God. They are not the Church of Christ—they are not ministers of the doctrine of Christ. What command does the same apostle give respecting our treatment of such as abide not in the doctrine of Christ? "Receive him not into your house neither bid him God speed, for he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds." Do you say, "this is a hard saying, who can bear it?" remember the language previously quoted, "He that knoweth God heareth us," the idea plainly is this, "those who are indeed of God—members of his household—will hear the apostles in all things, as they would hear that prophet like unto Moses, or in other words they would obey the instructions of the apostles, as they would obey Jesus Christ.

Jesus himself says, "He that is of God heareth God's words." But perhaps I have too widely digressed from the subject which was to show the character of that Church, and of those watchmen, upon whom Christ will come as a thief.

Let a sincere inquirer for truth ask one of these watchmen for light respecting the visions of Daniel—he would reply, "I cannot give it you for the book is sealed." Let the inquiry be made in relation to the grand and sublime truths of Revelation, "O that is a book of mysteries and symbols, we cannot explain it." "But you cannot say of this as you did of Daniel, 'it is sealed,' for John was commanded not to seal the sayings of this prophecy." "Ah, yes, very true, but then we ought not to be prying into those secrets of the Almighty, and I think that if we understand the plain teachings of the Savior it will be sufficient for us." But what does this mean, "Behold I come quickly, blessed is he that keepeth the sayings of the prophecy of this book"? "How can we keep them unless we understand them?" "Well, my opinion is that it all had reference to the destruction of Jerusalem. You see, he says, 'Behold I come quickly,' and as it is now almost 1800 years since that was said, he must have referred to his coming in judgment at the destruction of that city." "But he says also, 'My reward is with me to give unto every man according as his work shall be.' And that 'he that is unjust will be unjust still, he that is filthy will be filthy still, he that is holy be holy still,' was it so when Jerusalem was destroyed? Did every one retained from that time an unchangeable character? 'and every man received their reward?'" "O, you must remember that this book is highly figurative, therefore such expressions are not to be literally understood."

We know it to be a fact, that thus the inquirer is often met by those who will not investigate themselves, nor encourage those who would. Said a professed minister, not many months since, "It has been almost 1800 years since Jesus said, 'Behold I come quickly,' and it may be 1800 more, it may be 18000 more." Said another, "That some great event is at hand, I have no doubt, but respecting its character I know nothing." "Do you think that the signs of Jesus' coming are in the past?" was the inquiry. "O I cannot tell anything about it, probably some of them are."

Said a youthful inquirer, not long since, whose mind had become fully awakened and interested in this subject, "Why do not our ministers preach about these things?"

I replied that the fable of a temporal millennium was one, perhaps the greatest, cause of their blindness in relation to the second advent of Christ. You minister, and a great many other ministers, believe that there will be a thousand, or 365,000 years of great spiritual prosperity to the church, prior to Christ's coming. That the gospel will universally prevail, and all nations come under its saving influence. Consequently they watch not for the tokens of the returning of the Nobleman—they do not "take heed" to the "sure word of prophecy"—they do not "search diligently and inquire," respecting the "manner of time," reaching to that grand event. Their eye is on other objects, widely diverging from this point. Their hope is for the exaltation of the Church without the personal presence of her Lord—her reign without her King. Another thing, they associate with Death, all that the prophets, Christ, and the apostles associated with the second appearing of Jesus Christ. Death, is to them "the gate to endless joys," it introduces the saint to the "bliss of immortality," and what care they for the coming of the "Prince of life," or the "resurrection from the dead?" Truly they have "made the Word of God of none effect by their traditions." They have turned the edges of the sword, so that it ceases to pierce the consciences of men when wielded by their hand. "They have seduced my people," saith the Lord, "saying peace, and there was no peace, and one built up a wall, (temporal millennium) and lo others daubed it with untempered mortar. Say unto them which daub it with untempered mortar, that it shall fall; there shall be an over-flowing shower; and ye, O great hail-stones, shall fall; and a strong wind shall rend it."—"Thus will I accomplish my wrath upon the wall, and upon them that have daubed it with untempered mortar, and will say unto you, the wall is no more, neither them that daubed it. Thus saith the Lord of hosts, hearken not unto the words of the prophets that prophecy unto you; they make you vain, they speak a vision out of their own heart, and not out of the mouth of the Lord. They say still unto them that dispise me, 'The Lord hath said ye shall have peace,' and they say unto every one that walketh after the imagination of his own heart, 'No evil shall come upon you,' for who hath stood in the council of the Lord, and hath perceived and heard his word? who hath marked his word and heard it?" The false prophets of the house of Israel always prophesied peace, while the true prophets always foretold judgment. The one class were honored by the people, the other, despised, and often slain. Isaiah said that there would be just such a class in the "last days," and gives us some of the identical language which they would use. "Let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways and we will walk in his paths, for out of Zion shall go forth the law—(the Jewish nation return and establish their offerings)—and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem—(that will be the seat of government—from there the Lord will command the people) and he shall judge among the nations and shall rebuke many people; and they shall beat their swords into plough-shares, and their spears into pruning-hooks, nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." This, says the prophet, is what "many people will go and say" in the "last days," and he farther says, addressing himself to the Lord, "Therefore thou hast forsaken thy people," &c. He then proceeds to speak more particularly of the wealth and idolatry of this professed people of God, their meek humility, and lofty looks—describes the coming of the day of God, and the terror of these vain worshippers—and says that in that day "the Lord alone," not the "mountain," nor the "house of the Lord," "shall be exalted in that day."—It is during the state of things described by the prophet in the commencement of the chapter, that the Lord will arise and shake terribly the earth, and abolish the idols. That state of things now exists—those expressions of peace, safety, and prosperity for the Church, are now being uttered from pulpit and press—the Church is exalted, but not the Lord—the great man humbleth himself, but God forgives him not—the chariots and horses and silver and gold, abounds, and idolatry is seen on every hand. Truly, "sudden destruction cometh!"

O how fearful will be the doom of that shepherd, who fed themselves and not the flock—that watchman who slumbered at his post and saw not the tokens of the morning. When aroused by some inquiring one with the question, "Watchman, what of the night?" he would reply, "It is not for you to know the times and seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power," and then sink again in unconscious slumber. Perhaps another would awaken him with the question, "See you any tokens of the coming day?—has the day-star yet appeared?" and he turns away, "It is to come as a thief in the night—of the time knoweth no man," and again he sleeps. As the "fearful sights" are seen in the heavens, arousing the fears of some poor soul, who recollects that such were foretold by the prophets—and he cries to the watchman, "Watchman what meaneth these strange appearances—the moon seems to be turned to blood—the heavens appear to be on fire—pillars of smoke are rolling across the sky, what do they portend?" "O do not be so foolish—your fears are too easily aroused—these things are nothing new, they have always been."

But says another, "I have heard a man say to-day that these things were signs of the judgment being at hand, and that Christ is coming very soon." "Poh, it is all nonsense, and moonshine, he knows no more about it than I do, why the world is just in its infancy—the people are just beginning to know something in regard to the sciences, and this is to increase wonderfully—telegraphs will send intelligence in a moment from nation to nation—the railroads will unite us to other lands, and by the power of steam we shall have rapid intercourse with the entire globe. The 'good time is coming,' the golden age is soon to dawn, when peace will universally prevail, and the knowledge of the Lord cover the earth, as the waters cover the sea." Thus will the evil servant be found, saying in his heart, "My Lord delayeth his coming," and his preaching and works will correspond with his unbelief. "The Lord of that servant will come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of, and will cut him in sunder, and appoint him his portion with hypocrites and unbelievers."

In conclusion, I will add the words of Hugh M'Neil, in his address to the clergy: "My reverend brethren, watch, preach the coming of Jesus—I charge you in the name of our coming Master, preach the coming of Jesus—solemnly and affectionately in the name of God, I charge you, preach the coming of Jesus, 'Watch ye, therefore, for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at cock-crowing, or in the morning, lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping.'—Take care—'what I say unto you, I say unto all—watch.'"

MARY D. WELLCOME.

CHELSEA, MASS., June 10, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I wish to say a few words to the children. There is a great deal of opposition to the testimony that we know the Lord will come this year. Our heavenly Father commands us, in the cry, "go ye out to meet him." Is the testimony positive? I believe with all my heart it is. The darking of the sun, May 19, 1780, after the 1260 tribulation days ended in 1779, forever settles the question that we understand the time, and "that knowing the time that now it is high time to awake out of sleep." Brethren read the three remaining verses. Do we know this will be a positive fact? The Brother that says yes, in true faith will prepare himself for the celestial cars.—But that Brother that says we do not know, we do not understand, will cleave to his farm, his merchandize &c. He will be on Brother Storr's flat rock holding on to his boat—saying I shall not sell my houses and lands, I do not know that the Lord will come. Brethren, I could say more, but a word to the wise is sufficient. This year we shall go home. Let us be faithful to ourselves then we shall be faithful to all around, Amen. 75 years added to 1260 makes the 1335 days end in 1854, when Daniel is to stand in his lot, and the saints of God will come forth from their dusty beds.

The World's Crisis.

LOWELL, JULY 18, 1854.

To Subscribers.

Many of our subscribers have expressed some fears that their papers may be discontinued. To such we would say, that we do not intend to strike any names from our list, until we are well persuaded that the paper is no longer desired, or that it is no longer doing good. We are laboring for the household of faith, in view of the Judgment; and it is our sincere desire to discharge our duties faithfully to all, and to spread as widely as possible the glad tidings of our Savior's return. We are living in a day of most peculiar trial, and it is of great importance that we endeavor to strengthen each other in the work of God. We thank the Lord for the evidence we have that the Crisis is doing a good work in various parts of the country. We doubt not it will be sustained while it shall be for the glory of God, and we trust that will be until the Lord comes. We have deemed duty it to ascertain, as far as possible, where it is well received, and where it is not, that there be nothing wasted.

We hope our subscribers, who receive their papers in wrappers, will remember our request, as it is the most effective means of ascertaining who desire the paper, and who do not. As we have before stated, our single list subscribers have been picked up in various ways and we have good reason to suppose that many of them do neither appreciate nor desire the paper. We do not feel at liberty to continue sending papers thus indiscriminately. But let all that love the truth, and desire the little sheet, whether they are able to do any thing to support it or not, just give us their names and P. O. address, and we will continue the paper. Remember this request is only to those who receive their papers in single wrappers.

The King of the North.

Concluded.

V. 40. "At the time of the end," &c. The commencement of the time of the end is marked by the close of the persecution; hence it is said, (Dan. 11: 35,) "And some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them and to purge, and to make them white even to the time of the end," (end of the 1260 days;) "for it is yet (when they are being holpen with a little help,) for a time appointed." The saints are to be given into the hands of this power until a time, and times, and the dividing of time, which is evidently the same as the 1290 days; but to show that those days should be shortened, he says: "But" (this conjunction modifies the sentiment expressed,) notwithstanding they are given into his hand for a time, times, and the dividing of time, "the judgment shall set, and they shall take away his dominion," &c. There could be no propriety in saying his domin on was taken away, if he held it the above term, viz, 1290 days. For illustration,

The Constitution of our Federal Government provides that the President of the United States, on his induction into office, shall take the oath prescribed by the Constitution, after which his term of four years shall commence. Now if he retain his power during the entire presidential term, what propriety could there be in saying, at the end of that period, that his dominion is taken away? His power is not forcibly taken away, but ceases in consequence of the expiration of his office. But on the other hand, if the President were guilty of any misdemeanor, and the Chief Justice, or the Supreme Court decides that he shall no longer fill the office to which he has been elected, then it may be said, with propriety, his dominion is taken away—he does not serve his term—his power is gone. Likewise it is the case with this horn; for as remarked above, the saints, times and laws, are given into his hand for a time, times, and the dividing of time, which is explained in chap. 12 to be 1290 days, (years); BUT the judgment shall sit, and they shall TAKE AWAY his dominion. The conjunction but, modifies the sentence expressed, or, it suggests an exception to one or more items involved in the sentence, and the item or exception in the above is evidently, that which relates to the (his) dominion over the saints. Hence the Savior remarks: "For the elect's sake those days shall be shortened;" or in the language of Mark, (chap. 13), "And except that the Lord HAD shortened those days, no flesh should be saved; but for the elect's sake, whom he hath chosen, he HATH shortened the days;" for this reason, we remark, that while the prophet speaks of the 1290 as the time, times, and dividing of time, he also makes reference (indirectly) to the 1260 days, which accords with Rev. 13, where it is said, "power was given unto him (the Beast) to make war (operate) 42 months." Here then we learn that the judgment sits, and they take away his dominion (over the saints) at the expiration of the 1260 days (years), at which time a series of aggressions commences by virtue of which his power or control over the times and laws is being consumed until finally, in 1809, (the end of the 1290 years), the last blow is struck, since which time the political power of the Pope has been a dead letter. Now, then, as the saints ceased to fall by persecution in 1779, it follows as a matter of certainty, that there is the point of time when the space, called "the time of the end," commenced.

"At the time of the end shall the king of the South push at him," &c. Having ascertained, as we believe, that the time of the end commenced in 1779, we wish in the next place to enquire, what is to be understood by the phrase—"at that time?" Before answering this we may remark that this phrase cannot—as is supposed by some—refer to a definite point of time.—Wherever the phrase, at that time, occurs, it invariably has reference to a definite point, if the subject of the remark is definite time; but if, on the other hand, the subject of the prophecy is not a definite point, but a definite circle of time, as it is most certainly in this instance, then the phrase, "at that time," refers distinctly and exclusively to the circle denominated "the time of the end." Hence whatever transpires in this circle, transpires at the time of the end, for the time of the end is a circle of time.

That the above position is agreeable to scriptural usage, will appear evident from the following texts:

"And I fell down before the Lord, as at the first, forty days and forty nights; I did neither eat bread, nor drink water, because of all your sins which ye sinned, in doing wickedly in the sight of the Lord, to provoke him to anger. For I was afraid of the anger and hot displeasure, wherewith the Lord was wroth against you to destroy you. But the Lord harkened unto me at that time also."—[Deut. 9: 18, 19.

"And I stayed in the mount, according to the first time, forty days and forty nights; and the Lord hearkened unto me at that time also, and the Lord would not destroy thee."—[Deut. 10: 10.

In these two passages the space, or circle of time embraced in the expression, "at that time," is 40 days. Again,

"Wherefore remember, that ye being in time past Gentiles in the flesh, who are called Uncircumcision by that which is called the Circumcision in the flesh made by hands;

That at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world."—[Eph. 2: 11, 12.

The phrase, "at that time," in this passage, refers to the period of their past life prior to conversion.

"Shall the king of the South push."—Having ascertained when the time of the end commenced, and also the signification of the phrase, "at that time," we now inquire, who is this "king of the South?" In order to give an intelligent scriptural view of this subject, we will refer to the term South as it occurs in other portions of the word, and then by comparing scripture with scripture, endeavor to obtain a correct idea of its application. The first passage where it occurs is in Gen. 20: 1,

"And Abraham journeyed from thence toward the south country, and dwelled between Kadesh and Shur, and sojourned in Gerar."

Gerar, the place of his sojournment, was a city of Arabia Petraea, a place directly South of Palestine Again, Num. 13: 29, "The Amalekites dwell in the land of the South."

The country of the Amalekites was situated south of Jerusalem, in or near Idumea.

Again, Is. 30: 6, 9, "The burden of the beasts of the south; into the land of trouble and anguish, from whence come the young and old lion, the viper and fiery flying serpent, they will carry their riches upon the shoulders of young asses, and their treasures upon the bunches of camels, to a people that shall not profit them. For the Egyptians shall help in vain, and to no purpose; therefore have I cried concerning this, Their strength is to sit still."

The expression "beasts of the South" refers to Sheba, Dedan and Egypt, countries lying south of Palestine.

Again, Matt. 12: 42, "The queen of the south shall rise up in the judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it; for she came from the uttermost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and behold, a greater than Solomon is here."

The queen of the South was the queen of Sheba, which lay south of Jerusalem.

The term South occurs six times in this chapter: and in every instance reference is had to Egypt, or to the kingdom lying in a southerly direction from Palestine.—To give an idea of its history under different masters from this time, we add, that the Romans held it nearly seven centuries, when it fell into the hands of the Mohammedan caliphs; these were expelled by the Turcomans, who in their turn gave way to the Mamelukes, A. D. 1250. In A. D. 1519 it fell into the hands of the Turkish Sultan, who formed it into a kind of Republic. It remained in nearly the same condition until the time of Ali Bey, who assumed (about 1766) "the rule of an INDEPENDENT sovereign." From this time the Sultan continued to lose his influence in Egypt; this event occurring about 14 years before the 1260 years terminated, so that at the time of the end Egypt was in a condition to push at him, (France), and by virtue of that act fulfil the prophecy.

What are we to understand by the phrase, "push at him?" In giving the definition of this word, Webster remarks, the sense is, "to thrust, press or urge, to make a thrust, as to push with the horns or with a sword, to make an attack as the king of the South shall push at him." (Webster's Dic.) That such an attack was made by Egypt against France, will appear from the following facts. History informs us that Napoleon Bonaparte, the leading spirit of the French government, by virtue of a decree of the Directory, sailed from France on the 20th day of May, 1798, with a fleet of "thirteen ships of the line, and fourteen frigates, and four hundred transports.—They carried 40,000 picked soldiers and officers. This force arrived at Alexandria, (in Egypt,) about the first of July, and this city was soon taken; from this Napoleon proceeded to Cairo, where a fierce conflict took place between the French and the Mamelukes. Alison thus speaks of this assault,"

"Mourad Bey no sooner perceived the lateral movement of the French army, than, with a promptitude of decision worthy of a skilful general, he resolved to attack the columns while completing it.—An extraordinary movement was immediately observed in the Mameluke line, and speedily seven thousand horsemen detached themselves from the remainder of the army, and bore down upon the French columns. It was a terrible sight, capable of daunting the bravest troops, when this immense body of cavalry approached at full gallop the squares of infantry. The horsemen, admirably mounted and magnificently dressed, rent the air with their cries. The glitter of spears and cimeters dazzled the sight, while the earth groaned under the repeated and increasing thunder of their feet. The soldiers, impressed but not panic-struck by this sight, stood firm, and anxiously waited, with their pieces ready, the order to fire. Desaix's division being entangled in a wood of palm-trees, was not completely formed when the swiftest of the Mamelukes came upon them; they were, in consequence, partially broken, and thirty or forty of the assailants penetrated, and died in the midst of the square at the feet of the officers; but before the mass arrived the movement was complete, and a rapid fire of musketry and grape drove them from the front round the sides of the column. With matchless intrepidity, they pierced through the interval between Desaix's and Regmier's divisions, and riding round both squares, strove to find an entrance, but an incessant fire from every front mowed them down as they poured in at the opening.—Furious at the unexpected resistance, they dashed their horses against the rampart of bayonets, and threw their pistols at the heads of the grenadiers, while many who had lost their steeds crept along the ground, and cut at the legs of the front rank with their cimiters. In vain thousands succeeded, and galloped round the flaming walls of steel. Multitudes perished under the rolling fires, which, without intermission, issued from the ranks, and at length the survivors, in despair, fled toward the camp from whence they had issued. Here, however, they were charged in front by Napoleon at the head of Dugua's division, while those of Vial and Bon, on the extreme left, stormed the entrenchments.—The most horrible confusion now reigned in the camp; the horsemen, now driven in disorder, trampled under foot the infantry, who, panic-struck at the rout of the Mamelukes on whom all their hopes were placed, abandoned their ranks, and rushed in crowds towards the boats to escape to the other side of the Nile. Numbers saved themselves by swimming, but a great proportion perished in the attempt. The Mamelukes, rendered desperate, seeing no possibility of escape in that direction, fell upon the columns who were approaching from the right, with their wings extended in order of attack; but they, forming a square again with inconceivable rapidity, repulsed them with great slaughter, and drove them finally off in the direction of the pyramids. The intrenched camp, with all its artillery, stores and baggage, fell into the hands of the victors. Several thousands of the Mamelukes were drowned or killed; and of the formidable array which had appeared in such splendor in the morning, not more than two thousand five hundred escaped with Mourad Bey into Upper Egypt. The victors hardly lost two hundred men in the action; and several days were occupied after it was over in stripping the slain of their magnificent appointments, or fishing up the rich spoils which encumbered the banks of the Nile."

"And the King of the North shall come against him like a whirlwind," &c. In the first part of this chapter, Syria, together with its dependencies, is called the king (kingdom) of the North. There has been some difficulty in applying this to Russia from the fact, that the Prophet nowhere intimates a change in its geographical or relative position; the terms North and South, are arbitrary, they refer to two points of the compass from a certain locality, and that locality so far, at least, as the eleventh of Daniel is concerned, is Jerusalem and Palestine. The phrases, "North parts"—"North quarters"—"North country"—"Families of the North," &c., refer to the countries and nations lying North and Northeast of Palestine, and South of the Black and Caspian seas. When Jeremiah predicted the invasion of Judea by the Babylonians, he remarks:—"Out of the North, an evil shall break forth;" but why is it said that the evil shall come from the North? Ans. Because the Babylonians were in that direction from Palestine. The Medo-Persian and Grecian Empires occupied the same relation, the former occupying a position North of Syria and Palestine, and the latter having overthrown the empire of the Persians possessed in their turn all of those Northern kingdoms and provinces.

Again. On the dismemberment of Alexander's Empire, about three hundred years before Christ, these northern countries fell to Seleucus, whose dominion extended "from the Euphrates to the Indus," (a River of Asia), "and Oxus" (modern name Gihon), "and in a brilliant expedition against the Indian king, Sandracotus," he "carried his arms as far as the Ganges." At the battle of Ipsus he extended it as far as the Mediterranean.

At the time of his death, his kingdom embraced Macedonia, Thrace, Asia Minor, Syria, Cappadocia, Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Susiana, Media, Persia, and all the country clear to the Caucasus Mountains. These countries were bequeathed to his successors, under the denomination of the kingdom of Syria, or kingdom of Asia, the metropolis of which was Antioch.

This very kingdom is the one referred to by Daniel, (ch. 11,) under the title of the king of the north. The phrase "king of the north," occurs in verses 6, 7, 11, 13, and 15, six times, and in every case refers to the kingdom of Syria, which embraced the countries between Palestine and the Black Sea, as far as the Caucasus mountains.

In relation to Syria we may remark: that it was reduced to a Roman province B. C. 65, in which condition it remained until it was taken by the Saracens about A. D. 622; "but at length the power of the Moslems predominated, and in 1186, Saladin, Sultan of Egypt, found himself in possession of it." In A. D. 1517, the Turkish Sultan took possession of Syria, and has retained it ever since. Hence we find the Old Roman Empire at the time of the end, viz.: subsequently to 1779, in very nearly the same condition in relation to its divisions, that it was in the time of the Syrian kings, prior to its overthrow by the Romans. By turning to the 15th verse, (Dan. 11), we find that the king of the North (Syria), is warring against the king of the South, (Egypt); but in the 16th v. Rome, (a western kingdom), is introduced into the prophecy as doing according to its will. He says, "But he," (Rome), "that cometh against him," (Syria), "shall do according to his own will." Here, then, we have three great powers brought to view—Rome, Syria, and Egypt; sixty-five years before Christ, Syria became a Roman province, and thirty years before Christ Egypt was incorporated within the limits of that empire. Passing from this point to verse 36, over a space of time which covers the Pagan and Papal ascendency, we are introduced to a power which shall do according to its will. The power brought to view here is France, a western power (from Palestine) which holds the ascendancy in Europe and answers to the Old Roman Empire brought to view in the 16th verse of this chap., under the denomination of He and Him that shall do according to his will. We have already shown that Egypt did push at the French on its invasion by Bonapart; and this brings us to enquire whether the king of the North, which is Syria or Turkey, has ever come against the French according to this prophecy. Before speaking of this we may remark, that as Turkey occupies the very countries which, under the Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Grecian, and Syrian rule are called North or families of the North; is it consistent or reasonable to suppose, that any other power excepting Turkey is alluded to in the 40th verse? If Seleucus was the king of the North by virtue of reigning over these territories North of of Palestine, and South of the Black and Caspian seas, will not the occupying of those very countries by Turkey constitute her the king of the North? In other words, will the Lord in twenty or twenty-five instances, use the terms North and South as referring to the territory and nations North and South of Palestine, and in one solitary instance and that without the least qualification or intimation, use it as referring to Western Europe? There is no necessity of wresting this prpohecy from its natural application. It cannot refer to Russia, as she does not possess the countries South of the Black sea, and North of Palestine.

"The king of the North shall come against him like a whirlwind, with horsemen, and with chariots, and with many ships," &c. After Bonaparte had subverted the government of Egypt, he set out for Syria; on his way to the capital of that country, he succeeded in taking the fortress of El-Arish, the cities of Gaza and Jaffa, or Joppa. He next came to St. Jean D'Acre in Syria, but here he was defeated. At this time there was arrayed against the French, 1st, the British and Turkish fleets; 2d, a large body of horsemen; 3d, the artillery which was taken from the French by the Turks. Alison, in speaking of this defeat of the French, (vol. 1, pp. 522, 523), says:—

"Napoleon, by a desperate effort, for a time succeeded in effecting a lodgment in the ruined tower; but his men were soon driven out with immense loss, and the Turks regained possession of all their fortifications. The trenches had been opened and the breach practicable for nearly two months, but no sensible progress as yet made in the reduction of the place.—At length, on the evening of the 7th of May, a few sails were seen from the towers of Acre, on the farthest verge of the horizon. All eyes were instantly turned in that direction, and the besiegers and besieged equally flattered themselves that success was at hand. The English cruisers in the bay hastily, and in doubt, stood out to reconnoitre this unknown fleet; but the hearts of the French sunk within them when they beheld the two squadrons unite, and the Ottoman crescent, joined to the English pendant, approach the Road of Acre. Soon after, a fleet of thirty sail entered the bay, with seven thousand men, and abundance of artillery and ammunition, from Rhodes."

Again, in speaking of a desperate struggle between the French and Turks, the next morning, he remarks:

"Immediately a furious contest ensued; the besieged hurled down large stones upon the assailants, who fired at them at half pistol-shot, the muzzles of the muskets touched each other, and the spear-heads of the standards were locked together.—At length the desperate daring of the French yielded to the unconquerable firmness of the British, and the heroic valor of the Mussulmans; the grenadiers were driven from the tower, and a body of Turks, issuing from the gates, attacked them in the flank, while they crossed the ditch, and drove them back with great loss to the trenches." * * * "Notwithstanding this disaster, Napoleon was not yet sufficiently subdued by misfortune to order a retreat. 'The fate of the East,' said he, 'is in yonder fort; the fall of Acre is the object of my expedition; Damascus will be its first fruit.' Although the troops in the fleet were now landed, and the force in the place greatly increased, he resolved to make a last effort with the division of Kleber, which had been re-called in haste from its advanced post on the Jordan. Early on the 10th of May, he advanced in person to the foot of the breach, and, seeing that it was greatly enlarged by the fire of the preceding days, a new assault was ordered. The summit of the breach was again attained; but the troops were there arrested by the murderous fire which issued from the barricades and the intrenchments with which the garrison had strengthened the interior of the tower. In the evening the division of Kleber arrived, and, proud of its triumph at Mount Thabor, eagerly demanded to be led to the assault. 'If St. Jean d'Acre is not taken this evening,' said one of the colonels, as he was marching at the head of his regiment to the assault, 'be assured Venoux is slain.' He kept his word; the fortress held out, but he lay at the foot of the walls. A little before sunset, a dark massy column issued from the trenches, and advanced with a firm and solemn step to the breach. The assailants were permitted to ascend unmolested to the summit, and descend into the garden of the pacha; but no sooner had they reached that point than they were assailed with irresistible fury by a body of janizaries, who, with the sabre in one hand and the dagger in the other, speedily reduced the whole column to headless trunks. In vain other columns, and even the guards of Napoleon, his last reserve, advanced to the attack; they were all repulsed with dreadful loss. Among the killed in this last encounter was General Bon, and the wounded Crosier, aid-de-camp of the general-in-chief, and a large proportion of his staff. On this occasion as in the assault on Shumla in 1808, it was proved that, in a personal struggle, the bayonet of the European is no match for the Turkish cimeter. Success being now hopeless, preparations were made for a retreat, after sixty days of open trenches; a proclamation was issued to the troops, announcing that their return was required to withstand a descent which was threatened from the island of Rhodes, and the fire from the trenches kept up with such vigor to the last moment, that the Turks were not aware of the preparations made for a retreat. Meanwhile, the baggage, sick, and field artillery were silently defiling to the rear, the heavy cannon were buried in the sand, and on the 20th of May, NAPOLEON, for the FIRST TIME IN HIS LIFE, ORDERED A RETREAT."

"He shall overflow and pass over."—Who is it that shall overflow? Ans. The power that shall come with horsemen, chariots, and many ships. This seems to accord with the facts set forth by Alison; for to overflow is not to be defeated as were the French, but it is to defeat. A parallel to this expression may be found in Isa. 8: 8, where the Assyrian power is represented as defeating the Jews or Israelites. Also in Dan. 11: 10, where the king of the north is said to overflow and pass through—refering to the invasion of Crelesyria by Antiochus, at which time he conquered or re-took a number of places which were taken from his predecessor.—Likewise in the case of the invasion of Syria by the French, they were at first victorious, but at length they were most shamefully defeated, lost their artillery and all the country they had wrested from the Turks in Palestine and Syria, and were obliged to re-cross the desert and return again to Egypt. Lord in his modern history when speaking of the invasion of Syria by Bonaparte, remarks: "He crossed the desert which separates Africa from Asia, with his army, which did not exceed sixteen thousand men, invaded Syria, stormed Jaffa, massacred its garrison, since he could not afford to support the prisoners,—a most barbarous measure, and not to be excused even in view of the policy of the act—and then advanced to Acre. Its memorable seige in the time of the Crusades should have deterred Bonaparte from the attempt to subdue it with his little army in the midst of a hostile population. But he made the attack. The fortress succored by Sir Sidney Smith, successfully resisted the impetuosity of his troops, and they were compelled to retire with the loss of three thousand men.—His DISCOMFITED ARMY RETREATED to Egypt, and suffered all the accumulated miseries which fatigue, heat, thirst, plague and famine could inflict."

"He shall enter into the glorious land, and many (countries not being in the original) shall be overthrown," &c. It is a well known fact that when the French retired to Egypt, the holy land, or Palestine, was occupied by the Turks.

But these shall escape out of his hand Edom, Moab, and the chief of the children of Ammon. These nations formerly occupied the nothern portion of Arabia, and were under the administration of the Ottoman Porte, but since the accession of Mehemet Ali, they have been under the government of the Pasha of Egypt. Kitto remarks that, "the authority of Mehemet Ali, the Pasha of Egypt, is acknowledged over a great portion of the northern part of Arabia." They have literally escaped OUT of his (the Turk's) hand.

"He shall stretch forth his hand upon the countries," &c. The stretching out of the hand, says Webster, "denotes an exertion of power." We have a fulfilment of this item in the wars between Russia and Turkey, between 1809, and 1812.—The Porte did exert her power against Servia and Russia; and Russia, by the treaty of July 18, 1812, lost Wallachia, and Moldavia which had been formally annexed to that empire two years before.

"But he shall have power over the treasures of gold and silver." This is exemplified in the heavy tribute which is exacted from Egypt by the Porte, as an annual subsidy; and more especially in the secret development relative to the impending war. Individuals belonging to the Ottoman Empire have contributed as a spontaneous gift to the government, the sum of thirty-six millions of dollars, a large portion of which was raised in Egypt.

"And the Lybians and Ethiopians shall be at his steps." The standing army of the Sultan, (as stated in the Tribune some months since,) amounts to one hundred and sixty thousand, besides a reserve of about two hundred thousand; and thousands of these troops are from Egypt, Libya and Ethiopia. We believe this to be a perfect fulfilment of this prediction.—"But tidings out of the east and out of the north shall trouble him." Adam Clark and Bishop Newton refer the accomplishment of these two verses (viz., the two last), to the future from where they then lived. The powers lying East and North of Turkey, are Persia and Russia. The Ottoman Porte has for a long time been jealous of the growing power of Persia.—"Whatever be the motive and occasion," says Newton, "the Turk will go forth with great fury to destroy and utterly make away many." "The original which we translate, 'utterly to make away many,' signifies to anathemize, to consecrate, to devote to utter perdition. So that it strongly implies that this war shall be made upon a religious account. (Newton on Proph.) The above needs little or no comment. Every person acquainted with the affairs of Turkey and Russia, knows that the present war spirit subsisting between the two belligerent powers partakes largely of the religious element. The time has come for the full development of this prophecy, and the fulfilment of the remaining items. The troops have already assembled on the field of fatal strife; and as one writer remarks, "this is to be the battle of Armageddon." This is the testimony of thousands at the present time. A very able writer on this subject observes, "that all signs and portents indicate the approaching contest to be the decisive struggle so long expected of adverse principles, and that the instinctive conviction of its being so widely spread is attested by the crowd whom, wrong endured; or sympathy with the right, are collecting on the Danube's bank, to constitute a gathering such as the world never even saw at the period of the first crusade, and may never see again till the day of judgment. Men, not only from every State in this Union, but even from California and Australia, are waiting with impatience for the signal to hurry to a scene where Arabs sent by the sheriff of Mecca, Moors under the great Emir, Abd-el-Kader, and Circassian Chiefs, will be already assembled with Anglo-Indian officers and Italian, Polish, Hungarian and German exiles.

Every one, I think, must admit that the public, both in the United States and in Great Britain, was utterly taken by surprise, at the recent attitude of Turkey, at the unanimity and energy displayed by its Mahometan population, at the imposing forces set on foot in that country, at the number of volunteers, at the moneyed resources of the Empire, at the extent of voluntary offerings, and at the tendency of the Turkish Christians rather to sympathize with the Turks than with the Russian invader.

To understand fully the significance of these facts, we must consider that at least 120,000 volunteers have enlisted under the Sultan's standard. We must consider that the sum of $36,000,000 offered by the Turkish population as a spontaneous gift, amounts to a sum much larger than the loan which the Austrian government has twice since the Hungarian Revolution, vainly tried to raise on terms of usurious interest—nay, I speak advisedly in asserting, far exceeds the amount which, on any terms, the Emperor Nicholas, pledging all the resources of his Empire, could now obtain on all the money markets of the world. How reconcile these palpable facts, with popular impressions as to the prevalence in that Empire of misgovernment, decay and apathy—impressions derived from statements so industriously and perseveringly circulated, that I believe that the very diplomatists (Russian and other,) have been caught in some measure by the echo of their own lies, and that the Emperor Nicholas, himself, is not the least astonished in having to confront that majestic figure of armed and ANGRY ISLAMISM which his provocations have evoked."

Some idea of the enthusiasm of the Turks may be gathered from the following proclamation of the commander-in chief of the Ottoman forces:

"Officers and Soldiers! Asiatics, Africans and Europeans! The blood of your ancestors has more than once reddened this soil, when powerful enemies have attempted to destroy you. Committed by your fathers to your patriotic honor, it has hitherto remained intact. Nevertheless, be assured, that you cannot take one step without hearing a voice crying to you from the ground, saying, 'This dust upon which you tread is our ashes—the ashes of your forefathers; defend it!'

"Soldiers! Let us swear to spill the last drop of our blood, to maintain the integrity of the throne of our Emperor and much loved Sovereign, Sultan, Abdul Medjid Khan!"

The extensive preparations for war which have, and are being made by the Turkish government; the millions of money that have been voluntarily contributed for its support; the thousands of volunteers which have flocked to the standard of the Porte; together with the impatient and wrathful condition of the army in the principalities, indicates the fulfilment of that declaration, "He shall go forth with great fury, to destroy, and utterly make away many."

"And he shall plant the tabernacles between the two seas in the glorious holy mountain." "The glorious holy mountain" must be the same as "pleasant land," "the goodly heritage," "the glory of all lands," "the glorious land," Dan. 11, 16, and verse 41. These are appellations of the Holy Land; and so consequently "the glorious holy mountain" "must be Zion, Olivet, or some mountain in the Holy Land, which lieth between two seas, the Dead Sea on the East, and the Mediterranean on the West." The Turk already possesses Palestine, but that cannot be where his palace is established at present. The term Aphedno, which in our Bible is translated palace, is by Newton rendered camp, "he shall plant the tabernacles of his camp between the seas in the glorious holy mountain." Turkey, for some cause or other, will move her forces to Palestine. Although the Porte has been favored with a series of successes warring against Russia, yet in the end she must succumb, either to Russia or to the Allies. "For he shall plant the tabernacles of his palace (camp) between the seas, in the glorious holy mountain; yet he shall come to his end and none shall help him." Only one more development in connection with this affair, and then Michael, the great prince will stand up and deliver his people.

This subject is eminently momentous and sublime, surpassing in importance all preceding events, that have transpired in the history of the world. It is so to the defenders of absolute sovereignty, from the fact that it threatens the dissolution of all oppressive governments and tyrannical power. It is so to the advocates of civil liberty and republican principles, from the fact that they are anticipating the universal extension of freedom and democracy among the nations of earth. It is so to the believer in a temporal millenium, from the fact that he expects the way to be thus prepared for the diffusion of spiritual light, and the dissemination of the Gospel throughout the world. But to the student of prophecy who discerns in these foreshadows of coming events the premonitions of a world's destruction, and a subsequent glory to be revealed in the coming of our Redeemer, the subject is overwhelming. From some cause or other, the world is beginning to feel an intense and all absorbing interest on this question. Says a recent paper in relation to affairs in Europe; "The eastern question exclusively occupies public attention," (referring to England.) Indeed every eye, both in the political and religious world, seems to be directed to Turkey, as about to be the theatre of wonderful events.—And on this spot, which has already become a centre of attraction, we believe God is about to display the energies of omnipotent power; and to bring into operation those mighty instrumentalities that are to prepare the way for "the kings of the East," and usher in the appalling scenes of earth's final conflict, the battle of Armageddon. Says Kossuth, "The decisive struggle in mankind's history draws near." God has endowed the statesmen of our day with a power to scan the future, and unrol the book of destiny. He has raised them up to fulfil His grand designs, and herald forth the proclamation to the Gentiles; "Prepare war, wake up the mighty men; let all the men of war draw near." "Let the heathen be wakened, and come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat: for there will I sit to judge all the heathen round about."

"The day of His preparation" has been reached: and Nahum's chariots come, with their "flaming torches," thundering along the vales, and "shaking terribly the fir trees," "raging" with noise and violence through the streets of our cities, "justling one against another in the broadways," and "running like the lightnings." We have come down to "the valley of decision," and the proclamation has gone forth, "Prepare war; wake up the mighty men; let all the men of war draw near." The master spirits of the age have gone forth from land to land with burning eloquence, and unprecedented ardor, to awaken to action the intellectual and physical energies of the world, preparatory to the battle of Armageddon, and to involve all the powers of earth in the final issue between absolute and democratic rule.

And thus the day of vengeance comes on; and that thunder cloud, which is surcharged with the ire of Jehovah rolls on and hangs over, across the lurid brow of the impending tempest gleams the lightnings of vindictive justice, while the thunder peals mutter the vengeance of omnipotent power. It is at this awful crisis that Michael is to stand up, the great Prince that standeth for the children of Daniel's people, and there shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time. And at that time shall God's people "be delivered, every one that is written in the book."

It is with unutterable emotion that we hail the dawning glories of that morn, that knows no night. It is with anxious eyes that we look for the chariot of salvation, and with ears intent we listen to catch the first sound of the rumbling wheels of that mighty car, which brings from the excellent glory the Son of God, while the Archangel's clarion voice shall awake the sleepers in Jesus to everlasting life. O triumphant day! O joyful summons, whose trumpet tones shall gather the elect resurrected and immortal, to stand on Zion's holy mount with the harps of God, in princely regalia, and crowned with diadems of glory, to sing of victory, to adore the Prince of life, and receive "an inheritance pure and undefiled, and that fadeth not away!!!"

SEVEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The Turks Triumphant!—The Seige of Silistria Raised.—The Russians Driven Over the Danube!

By the America, from Liverpool, at Halifax July 5th, we have one week's later news. The Turkish forces, unaided by their allies, had raised the seige of Silistria, and driven the beseigers across the Danube. Victory has perched on the Turkish banners. No news of interest from the fleets. Prussia and Austria were talking about what they were going to do; but as yet had done nothing but talk. The Greek insurrection was almost at an end. Consols had advanced to 94, and breadstuffs had declined under the influence of the favorable state of the weather. Cotton had experienced much change.

It is telegraphed that at the conference at Teschin, it was decided tha Prussia would not formally declare war on Russia, but would place a portion of the Prussian army under the orders of the emperor of Austria.

General Daunenburg, has succeeded to the command of the Russian forces, in consequence of the wounds received by the general lately in command. General Luders had his jaw carried away with a cannon ball.

The reports of the English loss at Kamia Karlevy are confirmed.

The siege of Silistria has been raised. The Russians were defeated by the Turks and driven across the Danube. Order of events is as follows:—Siege operations were begun on the 17th of May, and from then to June 15th the attack and defence were carried on incessantly and with equal bravery on both sides; retrenchments; mines and counter mines were exploded, causing immense slaughter to the besiegers and besieged. Mussa Pacha, the brave Turkish commander, was killed by a shell, after which Prince Paskiewitch, the Russian commander, was struck and disabled by a spent ball, and will probably die. On the 13th of June a tremendous attack was ordered under Generals Gortschakoff and Schilders, but after severe fighting, the Russians were rpulsed, and a Turkish brigade sent from Shamula by Omar Pacha, succeeded in entering the fortress. Thus reinforced, the garrison on the 15th made a sortie, and a desperate hand to hand contest ensued, and ended in the complete discomfiture of the Russians.

Prince Gortschakoff was severely wounded. Gen. Schilders had his leg shot off, and two other general officers were killed. The carnage among the Russian troops was dreadful, and they retreated fighting across the river; the Turks pursuing their advantage, crossed an arm of the river, seized the Isle of Hops, and blew up the Russian seige works thereon. The Turks then brought out their guns and erected temporary batteries on the Bulgarian bank of the river, before the north face of the fortress. The Russian battalions east and west of Silistria immediately retreated in good order across the river and destroyed their bridges behind them. The Russians are now in the vicinity of Kalaresch, awaiting reinforcements and orders.

The seige of Silistria being raised must alter the whole Russian plan of operations in Bulgaria, and consequently must change the plan of the allies. It is rumored that Paskiewitch will order the whole force to fall back on Jassy.—Ere this the Russians have probably relinquished all their positions on the left bank of the Danube, excepting the forts of Hirsova, Matschin and Isacktcha, and apprehensions of their advance on the Balkan are at an end for the present.

Russian accounts via Bucharest, admit that operations against Silistria are suspended, but say that the seige is not finally raised.

The Russians have evacuated Moquielli and Sianbea. 5000 Turks have occupied Tuskukai and it was reported doubtfully, that the Turkish garrison of Rutschuk crossed to Giurgovo, killed 400 Russians and took 9 guns.

The Russian loan is negotiating at Hamburg, 16,000,000 roubles 5 per cent, at 87. Reports are again current that Russia makes peace overtures through Austria, and that the Czar will abdicate, but no dependence can be placed on the reports. He is also said to be sick, and for that alleged reason did not meet the king of Prussia; he has, however, ordered Prince Dolgroski, minister of war, to proceed immediately to the Danubian principalities and draw up an accurate report of the position of affairs in a military point of view. This unusual mission is said to have caused profound sensation at St. Petersburg.

It is officially announced that the convention between Austria and the Porte, with regard to the Austrian occupation of the Moldavian and Wallachian principalities, was signed on the 14th of June.

At a cabinet council held at Vienna June 19, the Emperor presiding, it was resolved "that if an evasive answer come from Russia, Austria will forward a final ultimatum, demanding a categorical reply within eight days."

It is stated, that the Emperor Napoleon has intimated to the Austrian government that the French will interfere to suppress any revolutionary movement in Hungary or Italy, while Austrian troops are engaged against the Russians. A similar declaration is expected from England.

Black Sea. Admirals Dundas and Hamelin issued a circular on the 7th, announcing a close blockade of the mouth of the Danube. Most of the fleet was cruising off Sebastopol. Six or eight ships were at Varna, assisting the embarkation of troops. Transports with heavy guns having arrived, it was likely that Sebastopol would soon be attacked.

Baltic. Two English steamers destroyed the wharf and some gun boats at Kemi, Gulf of Bothnia. The English ships Odin and Vulture landed 150 men at Gamba Karlchy, but they were attacked by the Russians and driven back to the ships.

Sefer Pasha is appointed Governor of Circassia and Abasia. The Circassians are commanded by Emir Magmot, Schamyl's lieutenant, and are reported to have defeated the Russians at "Darial Sear Karesch," with great loss to the enemy. Schamyl was in full march upon Tiflis, no date given.

The London Times has an editorial expressing the greatest satisfaction with the reciprocity treaty just concluded by Lord Elgin, but regretting that Great Britain has not secured a share in the American coasting trade.

Government organs still advocate an immediate attack on Sebastopol and occupation of the Crimea. They also recommend that a part of the Baltic fleet be sent to the Black Sea.

A difficulty occurred at Liverpool on board the ship Fidelia, between the officers and crew. John Lynagh was shot, and the chief mate stabbed; thirteen of the crew were arrested, but afterwards liberated.

A conspiracy to assasinate the French Emperor during his promised visit to the bath of Pyreu, has been discovered. In the departments of the Seine and Garonne 150 arrests were made. The prefect has been dismissed, and is succeeded by M. Ledetseur, the friend of Lafayette. The report of the minister of the interior on the state of the nation is very favorable.

French agents having arrived at Naples to buy corn, the Neapolitan government immediately forbade the exportation of breadstuffs.

Later from Europe.

By the Baltic, at New York, on Saturday, we have four days later news of a highly important character from Europe. Trade remained without material change. The Chinese Rebellion was not waging very fiercely. The rout of the Russians before Silistria is fully confirmed, with five of their Generals disabled, and the loss of some of their artillery, standards and baggage. The Times of the 27th, publishes a telegraphic despatch that the Czar had succumbed to the threats of Austria, and ordered his forces to evacuate the Principalities.

A despatch from Vienna asserts positively that the Czar has, in reply to Austria, consented to evacuate the principalities, and is already withdrawing his forces to beyond the Pruth.—Lord John Russell officially informed Parliament that the siege of Silistria was raised.—The advanced guard of the French and English have reached Prevendi. Omar Pacha is advancing his whole force to the Danube. From the Baltic, Black Sea, or Asia, there is no news. The Greek insurrection was totally quelled.—The minor German States have accepted the Austro-Prussian note. Brazil has notified France and England of her neutrality. Lord Aberdeen made a speech in the House of Lords defending his conduct in the present war.

The Austrians will march into the principalities as the Russians leave them. The official reply of the Czar to the Austrian Note will not be sent till the 2d or 3d of July. The Russians have taken prisoners two newspaper correspondents on the right bank of the Danube.—The Russian squadron is supposed to have taken refuge on the coast of Kamschatka. One of its vessels was seen at Woosung, where she had put in for intelligence. It is not the Russian squadron that is feared by our mercantile marine, but pirates from California, sailing under Russian colors.

The British government has sent Sir John Bonhave from China to negotiate a commercial treaty with Japan. The dividend of the Bank of France for the last half year is 112 francs.—Weather is very fine in France and Great Britain.

Brother Merriam:—The Florida meeting was one of profit. Brethren came from a great distance to meet on this occasion. The gathering was not large, but active; most of them either brought, or obtained the christian armor while there. The Lord be praised forever. Eight were planted in the likeness of his death; and we trust will share in the first resurrection.—Even so, Amen. Yours, H. PRATT.

Obituary.

Died in Benton, N.H., June 22d, Alice Viola, daughter of Ira and Abby Merrill, aged 1 year and 8 months.

We've laid thee, Alice, down to sleep
Till Jesus bid thee rise;
And though we sometimes now may weep,
He surely hears our cries.

Oh, Jesus come, our loved one take

Then with immortal form she'll wake
Where tears are never shed.

Come, Brethren, all that can, and bring your tents with you, as we expect all to camp on the ground. We shall have provisions made for boarding, and a number of good tents for lodging, and hope our Brethren will bring their bedding with them, that we may dwell in booths a few days and have a refreshing feast. Special Notices.

In consideration of the appointment by Bro. Cummings of a Tent Meeting at Portland, Brn. Couch and [illegible] have thought best to withdraw their appointment at Portland, and go into unoccupied fields.

N. B. We have regretted that some notices of Tent Meetings have not been sent to us at an earlier date. Hope Brn. will send us their notices several weeks before such meetings are to be holden.

NOTICE. To the brethren who wish to let their light shine in dark places, I would say, that in the town of Jay, Franklin Co., Maine, the true light of God's word is very much needed. They have never had any preaching on the subject and time of the Lord's coming, except a few lectures in 1843. Some of the people, as they see more of the nations and the spirits of this age, have some interest to learn what is coming on the earth. Will bro. S. S. Brewer visit that place. I think good might be done in the name of the Lord. My mother's house, at Bean's Corner, Jay, will be a home for pilgrims. Will any one who may feel it to be their duty to go and sound the "Cry" in that place, please to appoint through the Crisis.
JULIA W. GILMAN.

Brother B. T. Manning's P. O. address is Oil Mill Village, Weare, N. H.

CORRESPONDENCE.

HOUGHTONVILLE, Vt. June 20, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—I am thankful to God for his unerring word, while we are passing through the perilous times of these last days, which are prophesied of in 2. Tim. 3: 1-5. Notwithstanding the many sure signs given by Jesus Christ, and his apostles, in the New Testament that were to be fulfilled, just prior to the second Advent of Christ, we have many found in the old testament also, of which Peter says, "We have also a more sure word of prophecy," (than what he saw himself,) "whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts." 1. Pet. 1: 19. And among the many found in the sure word of prophecy, I find one in the 8th chap. of Isaiah, commencing at the 13th verse, and ending with the chapter, which has borne upon my mind much, for the last few months, and I have hoped some abler pen than mine would have written upon the fulfilment of it; but as no one has, I feel constrained by the love of God, and His truth, to pen a few brief thoughts, praying while I write, that all of the professed Israel of God, may ponder upon it, and weigh it well, (for all are concerned in the prophecy), and that it may by the blessing of God enable some to forsake the position they now occupy, and embrace the truth, and be saved from the impending wrath which is about to be poured out, not only upon the impenitent, ungodly sinner, who has made no profession of the religion of Jesus Christ, but also upon a "rebellious house" of Israel. It is a painful subject to meditate and write upon, while we are compelled to make, what I call a true application of it. I have not time or space, in one communication, to say much on the subject, but would direct the minds of the children to the prophecy, that some others may be induced to write upon it.—Some of the words are, "sanctify the Lord of hosts himself; and let him be your dread, and he shall be for a sanctuary; but for a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence to both houses of Israel; for a gin and a snare to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and many among them shall stumble, and fall, and be broken, and be snared, and be taken." Here the prophet declares the Lord will be for a sanctuary, but for a stone of stumbling to both houses of Israel, and by the word "both," we understand that there would be two houses of Israel; and Jesus Christ is called a stone, and a rock, in numerous places in the scriptures. Was he not rejected by the first house, which were the Jews?—Yes. Was he for a sanctuary to any of that house? yes. "He came to his own and his own received him not, but as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name." He was for a sanctuary to all them, but to all the rest, he was a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence. Whoever has read Josephus, has learned how they fell, and were broken, snared and taken, and carried off into all nations; and Jerusalem has been trodden down of the Gentiles ever since. Here we find a complete fulfilment concerning one house of Israel. Now the question arises, where shall we find the other house? Do not all the nominal churches throughout the gentile world, call themselves the Israel of God? They do. Does not the word of the Lord in the 34th chapter of Ezek., inform us, that when he shall gather his flock, and put one Shepherd over them all, that he will gather them out from under the shepherds of Israel? It does. Does not the word of the Lord in Jer. 25: 34-36 describe the awful situation of those shepherds and the principal of the flock, at the closing up scene of this world? It certainly does. We find also in the 13th of Ezek. the word of the Lord, saying, "O Israel, thy prophets are like the foxes of the deserts, ye have not gone up into the gaps, neither made up the hedge" (have not given them meat in due season,) "for the house of Israel to stand in the battle in the day of the Lord."—Also in the 12th chapter they were to use a proverb, just prior to the effect or fulfilment of every vision, all which takes place at the Judgment, or beyond: and there the Lord calls them, a "rebellious house."—Therefore, as the first house stumbled at the truth at Christ's first Advent, and fell through unbelief, and as the word of the Lord assures us that there will be a rebellious house of Israel when the vision speaks, and that their shepherds will be feeding themselves, instead of feeding the flock, with meat in due season, they will be inducing them to believe that the flock are to have a glorious pasture, for them to feed on, a thousand years, saying, "the vision that he seeth, is for many days to come, and he prophesieth of the times that are afar off." The word says, the shepherds will howl, "for the Lord hath spoiled their pasture." And this corresponds with the words of Christ in the 24th chap. of Matt. "But and if that evil servant shall say in his heart, my Lord delayeth his coming," &c. He then portrays his doom, which is like that presented in Jeremiah. Then in view of such testimony, can we look at any other point of time, than just prior to Christ's second Advent, for the other house to be offended, and rebel against the truth of its being nigh at hand? But, says one, there were the ten tribes that constituted the other house. In answer to that, we understand that those ten tribes had revolted, and had been gone among the Gentiles a long series of years before Christ's first Advent, and never had the offer to receive or reject the truth of Christ; and they could not have heard the proclamation, for the Apostles, and the seventy were commanded not to go in the way of the Gentiles, but to the lost sheep of the house (not houses) of Israel; therefore according to the testimony we find one house of Israel rebelling at the truth of Christ being the true Messiah, at his first Advent: and the other rebelling against the truth at his second Advect. Seeing this is the evidence in the case, we are led to enquire, who constitutes the second house of Israel? I understand that it comprehends all who have professed to have found pardoning mercy through the blood of Jesus Christ. Will he be a stone of stumbling to them all? No, for the Lord is to be for a sanctuary, for all them that believe and obey the present truth, "and unto them that look for Him, shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvrtion." He is to be "glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe," while all others are to "be punished with everlasting destruction." 2d. Thess., 1: 9. If this article should happen to fall into the hands of any that do not believe that Christ will come within a year, I would ask, have you given your attention, without prejudice, to the arguments produced from the word of God and history?* If not, attend to it immediately. Some will not hear, nor read on the subject, nor suffer their children to go and hear. When we see such who professedly belonging to the household of faith, can we come to any other conclusion, but that they belong to the rebellious house? The Apostle says, prove all things, and hold fast that which is good. O may the Lord enable us all to examine ourselves, and see whether we are acting in harmony with God's word or rebelling against it.

Yours in hope, JOHN GIBSON.

BASCOE, HANCOCK CO., ILL, June 19, 1854.

Beloved Brethren and Sisters who are looking for the blessed hope, and glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ:—Soon, soon immortality shall be ours. Sighs and tears, temptations, trials, tribulations of whatever sort will all be over, and we with the saints of all ages shall sing "Allelulia! for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth!" The Crisis is to many of us in this far distant west like cold water to a thirsty soul, and as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land. We love every proof which can be drawn from the word of God, from history, and from the attitude of the nations, which brings a coming Saviour near, even at the doors. I never was satisfied that the prophecies were fulfilled in '44, but the thought that it might be so filled me with joy unspeakable; and chronology, to my understanding, made it appear quite probable. Oh how sorrowful and sad was my heart, when the time so confidently believed in by those far more conpetent to judge than myself, had passed by. Trying times have been passed over—many have fallen asleep in Jesus, and some, I fear, have fallen from a love of that bright world to come, and have returned to that country from whence they came out, and are smiting their fellow servants, and eating and drinking with the drunken, saying virtually, my Lord delayeth his coming.—But Oh praise the good Lord, there are a few who think that believing God is more judicious than all the cunning craftiness of the learned and the popular of this world. Brethren Edwin Burnham and P. B. Morgan have been with the Bascoe and St. Albans churches, holding a grove meeting. Sinners were melted into tears, and their anxious countenances, and candid expressions showed that the spirit of God was there. But oh! shall I say it. There is no travailing Zion to bring forth the children. Some are of Paul, some of Apollos and Cephas, and can we expect sinners to be converted when the churches are rent with schisms, and Brethren, professing to be looking for Jesus to appear in the clouds of heaven, for some small difference of opinion, will withhold their feeble, helping hands from each other, and instead of building each other up, use all their influence to pull each other down? Surely we are in the last days; for truth and equity are fallen in our streets. The Godly man ceaseth, and the perilous times have come, described in the third chapter of Paul's epistle to Timothy. I believe that in a very short space of time the folly of those who oppose themselves, and have been taken captive by Satan, will be manifest unto all. My heart bleeds at the desolations of Zion, especially here; and if we do not awake, and confess our wrongs after hearing such faithful warnings, as we had the past week from Brn. Burnham and Morgan, there is very little hope that we shall be found to the praise and glory of God when Jesus comes.—May God help us to heed the warnings we have heard, and to treasure up in good and honest hearts the truths which have been held up before us, as it were, in the blazing sun-light of heaven; and may God preserve them unto his coming and kingdom blameless, and reward them for all their trials here, in the land of eternal life. Bro. S. Chapman was also with us during the meeting. He has passed through burning trials since his sojourn in the West; but out of them all has the Lord delivered him, and blessed him greatly, and given him many souls as seals of his ministry, and may the Lord still preserve him from temptations, come from what source they may. Bro. Caulkins, too, was with us, who gave us some encouragement that he would return again. May God speed his coming, that if it is the will of God, sinners and nominal professors may have a few more warnings before the day for which we wait and pray bursts upon them in all its solemn and awful reality.

But, my Brother, I have been too lengthy. Pursue that even tenor which is manifest in the Crisis. Publish that which you think will best serve the cause, and you have the prayers of your unworthy Sister,

W. CARMALINE PAGE.

PLYMOUTH, IND., June 15th, 1854.

Br. Merriam:—I now write for the purpose of giving a brief account of a course of Lectures recently delivered at this place by Brn. Berrick, Couch and Howell.

The meeting commenced on the 9th, and closed on the 11th inst. Our citizens turned out well and gave them a good hearing; and many became very much interested in the subject under consideration, to wit: "The speedy coming of Jesus Christ to judge the world, and give deliverance to his people."

Br, and Sr. Eastman from N. H. were also in attendance, likewise Br. and Sr. Mansfield of this state. There were many Brn. and Srs. here from a distance, some of whom are settled as to time, whilst others came to hear. But there are many who judge of the matter before hearing it. Such a course they have the privilege of pursuing now. Peter syas of such, that, "they are willingly ignorant." Many persons who had hitherto treated the subject lightly, and in fact rather contemptuously, left the ground under a very different state of feeling.

Some persons were convinced that the Lord will come this year, whilst many are undecided from the fact that they did not hear enough of the testimony on the point, to enable them to arrive at a conclusion. The meeting closed too soon. I think it very good policy when the community is interested to hear on this, as well as other subjects, to continue for a time at least.—For if time is so very short, is it not good policy, and can there not be more effected when an audience is interested, than to get the interest up, and then go to a new field? I merely ask this question for the purpose of calling the attention of our preaching brethren. At such short meetings many persons are left undecided; for all do not come to the same conclusion at once on any subject. I wish the lectures had been continued here so that we could have had all the important evidences presented.

I will now say in conclusion, that I think the words of truth, which our brethren taught, will be productive of much good. Eighteen were baptized, and more were almost persuaded to come out in obedience to the requirements of the gospel.

Yours in hope of immortality at the coming of Christ.

RICHARD CORBALLY.

Dear Bro. Merriam:—If you please, I will suggest a few thoughts touching my faith on the time of the Advent—but first let me enquire what is Faith?—Heb. 11: 1. Paul says it is the ground or confidence of things hoped for or desired, (see margin) the evidence of things not seen. What is the basis of Faith?—Ans. God's promises, as given by Prophets, Christ and the Apostles, of things not seen or realized now, but to be in the reign of Christ. Again—the Prophetic events in the past, present and future, intervening together with the history of their fulfilment, creates faith and assurance in the great and sublime events of the future; Faith then quickens or engages the fine senses and brings them all into lively exercise. 1. Faith sees all the past, present, and future of her history and destiny. 2. She hears as she sees, and feels as she sees and bears, and hope grows with her strength.

Touching my faith in the time of the Advent, I believe the time of the sufferings and the time of the glory that should follow, was revealed, (not to prophets), but to us by prophets—so Peter believed and taught.—See 1 Pet. 1: 11, 12. I believe the time of the glory or glorious appearing of Jesus, and the resurrection of the dead is revealed to us in Dan. 8: 13, 14, and 12: 12. I believe that the 1335 days (years) and 2300, end with the opening of these scenes of glory.

I believe that the 1260, 1290 and 1335 days begin in A. D. 519, by the rise of the little horn of Dan. 7, with eyes and a mouth, or the nationalization of the Catholic church. I believe the saints were delivered out of its hand by 1779, as they were given into his hand by 519. I believe as truly that the 1290 days (years) measuring the Papal Abomination, did end in 1809, by the taking away of the Papal dominion, as that the Declaration of Independence of the United States was declared in 1776.

I believe, without doubt, that the darkening of the sun in May 19, 1780, was the one Jesus said should be in the days after that tribulation,—i. e., the days measuring the abomination of desolation, which Jesus tells us to understand as we read, and by the understanding of which we should know the time of his coming and the signs of that grand event.

I believe that the 1335 days end with this year, 1854, and bring us to the year of redemption, the coming of Jesus, and the resurrection of the dead. All the above I believe from evidence that makes it a reality to me, and evidence that no man can disprove, though he may and will oppose.—But blessed be God I believe it is true, and it fills me with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

You may expect more by and b .

J. C. BYWATER.

COLLINSVILLE, CT. June 10th, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—A few in this place are looking for the speedy coming of our Saviour. We do not from outward signs have much to encourage us in relation to the salvation of perishing mortals; but trusting in the Lord, and believing we have truth on our side, by the help of God we shall labor on. Br. Isaac Adrian preaches to us once in four weeks, and we are strengthened and encouraged in the faith. We would like preaching oftener, and we would be glad to have Br. Adrian, or some other brother, come among us.—We will not send you empty away. I find there are many among us that are studying and searching for more light; and circumstances occur every day in conversation with the people, evincing that many are all ready to receive it. It cheers my heart to hear the glad news of the Saviour's near approach. I thank the Lord for his goodness to me; and by his grace I will strive to be faithful, by precept and example, in spreading the precious news

Yours in the bonds of christian affection. SOLOMON HALE.

Dear Bro. Merriam:—I have spent the two last Sabbaths in Boston. There is a large congregation of Advent Believers in this city. They hold their regular meetings every Sabbath in Chapman Hall, this Church still adhere to the great principles of interpretation adopted by Bro. Miller, and [like him,] still believe that the definite time will be understood by the Church. I was happily disappointed in meeting so many warm hearts. It reminded me of the union and love which characterized the Adventists in their first movements.—The past four weeks of my experience has done much towards confirming me in the conclusion to which I had previously arrived, viz.: that the period for the midnight cry has come, that this is the time to awaken the Church to a readiness for the marriage of the Lamb. The cities of New York and Boston are the two great emporiums of the New World, i. e. in these great national theatres are exhibited the wild spirits of all the great nations of the Globe, and the characteristics of each are abundantly amplified.

The spirit of universal war is as manifest as the oppressive sultriness before the gathering tempest. High towering gleams the unsheathed sword ready to avenge insulted freedom. Loud, burning proclamations threatening extermination looms up from every quarter. A portentous cloud is gathering on the brow of the great mass of mankind, deep rooted and undying hatred, like a pent up vocano, is murmuring impatient for an outbreak. Rifles and revolvers have become the staple article in commercial interest. A feverish restlessness is manifest in every exhibition of the human mind, and the bond of society is broken forever. The gratification of the grosser passions of our fallen natures gains fearfully over the principles of virtue and moraliy; and society is but a little better than a moral chaos. This is indeed a real picture of the world; yet it is as fairly drawn by the divine artist, as though the reality was before him.

To know what these things mean, is the security of the Church. The storm may threaten, the tempest roar, the sword may gleam immersed in human gore, yet still the Christian stands secure; the lashing billows lay still at his feet, and he rests on the promise of his God, "At that time thy people shall be delivered." Dear brethren look up; beyond this dust of human strife, this howling tempest of conflicting elements, the dawn of immortality appears. Welcome, Oh welcome, thou despised and scorned Gallilean, we would welcome thee back again to earth, amen and amen.

ISAAC ADRIAN.

To the saints scattered abroad, greeting:—Grace, mercy and peace be multiplied unto you, through the knowledge of God and our Savior Jesus Christ, who according to his abundant mercy and grace hath begotten us again, to a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead; to an inheritance, incorruptable and undefiled, and that fadeth not away,—and ready to be revealed in the last time.

I wish to say to you that I rejoice that, according to the best light we can now get from the sure word of prophecy, we have reached the last time, (year,) during which we confidently hope for and expect the glorius advent of our King, to bestow that glorius incorruptable inheritance on all who have, by patient continuance in well doing, sought for glory, honor, and immortality. The prize is just before us, the crown is soon to be given, the toil-worn pilgrim is soon to go home.

O what a glorious hope is ours,
While here on earth we stay,
We more than taste the heavenly powers
And antidate that day.

Now, my Brethren, having been brought down to the borders of the heavenly Canaan, shall we, like the children of Israel, in our hearts go back into Egypt? O no!—methinks I hear you say, We are well able to go up and possess the land.—The Lord of hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our refuge. The battle is not always to the strong. The weak may sing the conquerors song. I think we may truly say, the night is far spent, the day is at hand; let us therefore put off the works of darkness and put on the armor of light. And, knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep, for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. I believe with all my heart that the slumbering and sleeping time is over; the saints are waking up and trimming their lamps preparatory to the coming of the Bridegroom; and I do not expect they will go to sleep again, but will be awake, with thir lamps trimmed and burning, their loins girt about with truth, and will really be found like men waiting for their Lord, that when he cometh and knocketh, they will open to him immediately. How much better to be in this position, than saying in the heart, "My Lord delayeth his coming." Men's hearts are now "failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth." The present state of things in this country shows that we are on the eve of a mighty revolution. The storm is gathering fast, we have heard the muttering thunders in the distance, and now it seems as though the clouds had gathered thick and black—that they are just ready to burst in vengeance upon the earth. "Seek ye the Lord, all ye meek of the earth, seek righteousness, seek meekness. It may be ye shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger." "For behold the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity. The earth shall disclose her blood, and no more cover her slain." "Behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 23, '54.

Dear Brother Merriam:—The editorial remarks in your last paper, (Nov. 21,) led me to reflect that when the coming of the Son of man was represented by the transfiguration, the most favored disciples were asleep: but awaked in season to see the glory. And this in connection with the question, "shall he find faith on the earth?" Leads me to suppose that lethargic apathy will prevail as the day approaches; and I shall not be surprised if your brilliant paper should be neglected, and suffered to suspend its weekly visits. I hope you will maintain that perfect resignation which you have thus far evinced: for the glorious Lord may see that if the paper continued to publish the progress of events in connection with prophecy it may produce too much alarm in the world to be consistent with the prophecies. I do not see a more conspicuous sign, than the astonishing apathy of the Churches and of the world on the subject, while the evidence of the time is so manifest. Dear Brother, we are surely right on time; the tenth day of the seventh month (Jewish time) cannot again pass by, but will I expect, come a month earlier than will be generally anticipated!

Hold fast your confidence,

RUFUS PORTER.

PLYMOTH, N. H. June 26th, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—Thinking perhaps you would like to hear from one, fighting under the same banner with yourself, trusting in God for the same glorious reward, and looking for the glorious appearing of our Saviour this present year. I wish to inform you that precious souls, fast sinking into the vilest depths of infidelity, have been plucked as brands from the burning; and are looking for redemption from the thraldom of sin and persecution. I was first awakened to this important subject by a providential meeting with a friend in whom I reposed the utmost confidence, who was awake to the importance of a preperation for the society of the blest in the paradise of God. He gave me one of your valuable papers which I perused at first with distrust; but I soon perceived that the matter was at least worth a candid investigation, and once begun, I rested not, until by the help of God's holy Spirit, the truth as it is in Jesus forced itself upon my mind. The struggle was for a time severe, but principle triumphed, and, amid the sneers of some professed friends, I commenced to arouse the people to action in view of the short duration of time, and the necessity of a preperation for a coming judgment. About twenty have been persuaded to regard the signs of the times, and prepare for the event which must shortly take place. The most mutual good feeling and unanimity is displayed among the brethren. There seems to be a general feeling of respect for the cause, and a disposition for enquiry and investigation, which is truly encouraging. I hope to write of a larger number of believers soon.

Yours, in hope of a blissful immoraality when Daniel shall stand in his lot, and the everlasting kingdom shall be set up.

Brother Merriam:—Our meeting at Florida, Mass., closed last night. It was, all things considered, the best meeting that I ever attended. There was no enthusiasm or excitement, but a deep work of God. All the children felt it good to be there. Their faith strengthened; and they all were better fitted to go out and endure the trials and temptations that beset them.

Our heavenly Father made the wrath of man to praise him. A company of wicked, intemperate men, being well prepared, came with the design of breaking up the meeting, but as our good Lord would have it, the leader of the gang got converted to the Lord; and he with several other converts, was baptized on Sunday by bro. H. Pratt. The rest of the party trembled lest these things should prove true; and we were unmolested—thank the good Lord.

Several professors of religion embraced the blessed truth of the Lord's coming this year.

CABOT, Vt. June 25th, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—The Crisis is like a well of water to a thirsty soul—the doctrine of the Lord soon to come, is truly "meat in due season." It is my duty to do all I can for the support of the Crisis. God has said by the mouth of His servant, "gather my people unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice. Dear Brn., let us sacrifice "the fruit of our lips, giving thanks to God;" and "to communicate forget not; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased." Let us do all His commandments; so that we may be gathered with the saints when He appears, and have a "body fashioned like unto His glorious body." Thank God, the weary pilgrim will soon get through with this world of sorrow and enter a day of endless glory in the kingdom of God.

Yours, looking for redemption soon.

Advent Meetings are held in the School House known as the "Pine Grove School-House," in Rockland, (village) Maine, every Tuesday and Thursday evening, also on Sunday and evening.

"The Last Trumpet."

The gathering of the Saints, and the overthrow of the wicked.

The subject on which we now enter, is momentous, and of the deepest interest to the humble, waiting, longing soul; and as we watch the progress of events as they transpire, and see the fulfilment of the words of Him who spake as never man spake, and behold the time drawing near, faith in the promises of God, and in the certainty of its near approach, fill the soul with unulterable joy; for all things now bespeak that "our redemption draweth nigh." These glorious truths, (treasured and embodied in the hearts of "all who love His appearing," so soon to be realized,) call forth the loudest Hallelujahs of the saints, and engage the hearts of the holy ones to become more holy; that our whole spirit, and soul, and body may be entirely consecrated to God, and be preserved blameless, unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

We have come "to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel," and we anticipate the day as about to open with the sound of "the last Trumpet," to call together "the Church of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven," and to consign the wicked to "everlasting destruction."

A trumpet in scripture is generally put as a substitute for the sound of the trumpet; but the trumpet was used under the law sometimes as a musical instrument, and sometimes to express a shout of victory. There is something connected with the bare mention of "the last trumpet," that strikes the mind with dread; even the unconcerned stand in awe; but to an awakened sinner it increases his alarm, and his countenance tells of horror and remorse within; and exhibits the very evidence of his condemnation, as he anticipates the tremendous realities of that dreadful day, which will be ushered in by the blast of "the last trumpet."

"The last trumpet" has no charms to the wicked; and the subject is fraught with the most awful and alarming consequences to the neglecters and despisers of the "gospel of the kingdom" of Christ.—"Behold, ye despisers, and wonder and perish; for I work a work in your day, a work which ye will in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you."

A trumpet symbolizes the proclamation of the gospel, and is often used as a prelude to great and sore judgments, to be inflicted on antichristian cities and nations; and will be the instantaneous harbinger of the "day of judgment."

After the law was given, we find that the last typical instruments that Moses was commanded to make before their departure from Mount Sinai, were two silver trumpets.

"And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Make thee two trumpets of silver; of a whole piece shalt thou make them, that thou mayest use them for the calling of the assembly, and for the journeying of the camps." Here we find that these trumpets of silver were a type of the last trumpet, and assembling of saints, and of the proclamation of the gospel. "Blow the trumpet in Zion; sanctify a fast; call a solemn assembly; gather the people; sanctify the congregation; assemble the elders, gather the children;" "Let the priests, the ministers of the Lord weep between the porch and the altar; and let them say, Spare thy people O Lord, and give not thine heritage to reproach;"—"Wherefore should the heathen say where is their God?" Here the trumpet represents the preaching of the word with power, and the salutary effects that follow, with the promises, show it to have been successful. Joel 2: 15, to 32. When the gospel trumpet sounds, it sounds an alarm to the sinner, and calls him to "flee from the wrath to come," by repentance, and faith in the efficacy of the blood of Christ to save the soul; that he may enter the straight and narrow way that leads to God. It calls the new born soul to become a stranger and pilgrim on the earth; leads and encourages him in the heavenly race: and it calls those who "have made a covenant with him by sacrifice," to fasts of deep and holy repentance, and to feasts of pure and heavenly joy.

"The sons of Aaron the (high) priest shall blow with the trumpet, and they shall be to you for an ordinance forever, throughout your generations." "And if ye go to war against an enemy that oppresseth you, then ye shall blow an alarm with the trumpet, and shall be remembered before the Lord your God, and shall be saved from your enemies." "Also in the day of your gladness, and in your solemn days, and in the beginning of your months, ye shall blow with the trumpets over your burnt offerings, and over the sacrifice of your peace offerings; and they shall be to you for a memorial before your God. I am the Lord your God." Num. 10: 1, to 10. Here the sounding of the trumpet was a memento to Israel that God was their leader; which prompted believers to trust and confidence in the promise that "they should be remembered before the Lord, and saved from their enemies." It encourages them in the conflict against the great oppressors of the people of God, even the world, the flesh, and the devil, animates them with "a hope of assurance" of final victory, and often protects them by striking the enemy with terror and dismay. Thus these two silver trumpets bear a striking analogy to the preaching of the gospel, both to saints and sinners; and to the last final call of the great assembly to meet the Lord. "And Hezekiah commanded to offer the burnt offering upon the altar. And when the burnt offering began, the song of the Lord began also with the trumpets." 2 Chron. 29: 27. The burnt offering was wholly consecrated to God; the smoke ascended, and it denoted the entire dedication of him that offered it to God, soul, body, and spirit, to his service and glory, by repentance and faith in the atonement of Christ. By its being wholly consumed it is a striking and solemn representation of the intensity of the sufferings of Christ, when "he gave himself a sacrifice for our sins;" and surprisingly shews the perfection of his love toward us, by voluntarily becoming the sufferer of such unparalleled anguish. It is also a most beautiful emblem of the entire devotion of our whole affection to him.

"All ye inhabitants of the world, and dwellers on the earth, See ye! when he lifteth up an ensign on the mountains; and when he bloweth a trumpet, Hear ye!" This trumpet calls all the dwellers on the earth and of the world to see and hear; gathers the down trodden to Mount Zion, and consequently must be "the last trumpet." Isa. 15: 3. How can the world remain in ignorance of the fact, that the Lord's ensign is now floating in the breeze, on the mountains, and that now "See ye"! is our admonition? But when he bloweth the (seventh) trumpet, all the world must hear; for "the kingdoms of this world will then become the kingdoms of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever." The "great voice in heaven" will be unfolding "the mysteries of God" till the living creatures and elders fall on their faces, worshiping him on his accession to the thrones of earth; the nations are angry and his wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged arrives, when he will "reward his servants the prophets, and saints, and all that fear his name, small and great"; and then he will destroy those wicked ones, who have corrupted and destroyed the earth.

"And the Lord said unto Joshua, See, I have given into thine hand Jericho.—And ye shall compass the city, all ye men of war, and go round about the city once. Thus shalt thou do six days. And seven priests shall bear before the Ark seven trumpets of ram's horns; and the seventh day ye shall compass the city seven times; and the priest shall blow with the trumpets."

"And it shall come to pass that when they make a long blast with the ram's horns, and when ye hear the sound of "the trumpet," all the people shall shout with a great shout; and the wall of the city shall fall down flat; and the people shall ascend up every man straight before him." Josh. 6: 2, 3, 4, 5.

Those seven trumpets of ram's horns whose final blast appeared to level the walls of Jericho with the ground, seem to correspond with the mystical horns of the Lamb, Rev. 4: 6. "And I beheld, and lo in the midst of the throne, and of the four living creatures, and in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb as it had been slain; having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven spirits of God, sent forth into all the earth."

We cannot suppose that the blast of the ram's horns, unaccompanied by the spirit of God could raze the walls of the city of Jericho; but the power of his Spirit could give His people possession of the city, through their faith in "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." It is worthy of notice that the number seven, occurring so often in these passages bears a strong resemblance to the mystical language of the Apocalypse; "seven priests"; "seven trumpets"; seven days," and "seven times," "the seventh day." This number seven might have some allusion to the original Sabbath; but beyond all dispute it had a special reference to the "restitution of all things."—Indeed the fall of Jericho was a remarkable type of the fall of the world; for it must have been the sole power of God, without human instrumentality, that laid the city of Jericho in ruins, and gave the inhabitants thereof to irretrievable destruction. So will the inhabitants of the world, at the sounding of "the last trumpet," be devoted to irremediable ruin. And as Rahab and all her father's house were saved through their faith and obedience, so will the Church of Christ be, in the last trying struggle.

Well might the hearts of the inhabitants of Jericho "melt," (though not in contrition,) at the sight of the armies of Israel; with a Commander in Chief at their head from the upper world; success was sure, doubly sure to them. "The Lord is a man of war; and when He mustereth His hosts to battle," and causeth the great trumpet to be blown, to gather the nations, that he may assemble the kingdoms, to pour upon them "the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God," "who shall be able to stand?"

It is remarkable that at the last blast of the ram's horns, a "mystical trumpet" was to be heard; and then, and not till then, were the people to give the "shout of victory."

"The last trumpet" is called "the trump of God"; 1 Thess. 4: 16, and doubtless was the same that was heard at the fall of Jericho. It is called "the great trumpet," Isa. 27: 13, and is the same that gathers the redeemed to their long wished for home, and leaves the wicked without mercy or favor. It is likewise called the seventh trumpet. It was "the trump of God," that sounded so long and so loud on Mount Sinai to call the children of Israel together at the foot of the mount; when "the voice of the trumpet was so exceeding loud, that all the people that were in the camp trembled." Exod. 19: 16. The same trumpet was blown at the fall of Babylon, Jer. 51: 27, the same trumpet will be blown at the fall of mystical Babylon, when "the Lord shall be seen over them, and his arrow shall go forth as lightning: and the Lord God shall blow the trumpet, and save the flock of his people in that day; for they shall be as the (precious) stones of a crown, lifted up, as an ensign upon his hand," Zech. 9: 14, 16, and the same trumpet will summons the world to judgment at the same time.

"The trump of God," will become the jubilee trumpet, whose last sound will awaken the dead, and call the ransomed of the Lord to Mount Zion with songs and everlasting joy, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.

At the entering of the ark of God into the most holy place in the temple of Solomon, on the 10th day of the seventh month, "the Levites, singers, arrayed in white linen, with cymbals, and psalteries, and harps, stood at the east end of the altar, with an hundred and twenty priests sounding with trumpets."

These trumpets were used as musical instruments, but they seem to allude to the Jubilee: and they celebrated one day, which was called the feast of trumpets.—"Blow up the trumpet in the new moon, in the time appointed, on our solemn feast day," says the Psalmist. Ps. 81: 3.—This was the first day of the seventh month; and it is peculiarly interesting to learn how these Jewish institutions were celebrated, and the use of their sacred vessels and instruments; as all the dispensations enjoined by God on the Church of the Old Testament, have a special allusion to that of the New.

When David removed the Ark, it was preceded by the sounding of trumpets, and Dr. Scott speaks of those used at the fall of Jericho, as Jubilee trumpets, that is, those which were used at the ushering in of the year of Jubilee.

Says Amos, "Shall the trumpet be blown in the city, and the people not be afraid?" "Blow the trumpet in Zion," says Joel, "sound an alarm in my holy mountain, Let all the inhabitants of the earth tremble; for the day of the Lord cometh, for it is nigh at hand." Zephaniah says, "The great day of the Lord is near, it is near; a day of wrath, a day of trouble and distress, a day of wasteness and desolation, a day of darkness and gloominess, a day of clouds, and thick darkness; a day of the trumpet and alarm; the mighty men shall cry there bitterly." The prophets had a very near view of the day of judgment, and they called for the trumpet to alarm the sinner; and these two, with Jeremiah, uttered some of the most startling prophecies that are to be found in the Bible. Jeremiah calls for the trumpet to be blown, while he sees a great destruction hastening. "The lion is come up, the destroyer is on his way; his chariots shall be as the whirlwind; his horses are swifter than eagles. To whom shall I speak and give warning? Behold their ear is uncircumcised, and they cannot hearken." Jer. 5 and 6 chs. Who, (that has ever felt the plague of his own heart, and turned to God,) but can feel union of heart with the prophet, when he mourns over the incorrigibly wicked?—But he is constrained to proclaim, "Behold an evil shall go forth from nation to nation, and a great whirlwind, from the coasts of the earth; and the slain of the Lord shall be at that day, from one end of the earth even to the other end of the earth, they shall not be lamented, neither gathered nor buried. Howl ye shepherds and cry; wallow yourselves in ashes, ye principals of the flock: for the days of your slaughter, and your dispersion are accomplished, and ye shall fall like a pleasant vessel, and have no way to flee nor escape." Jer. 25th chap. The above and similar passages show in terms that cannot be mistaken, the terrible calamities that await the world: and if possible, the most fearful doom will fall on unfaithful shepherds who feed themselves, but feed not the flock; and on the leaders of our cold and backslidden churches.

We weep and mourn over a fallen world who will not heed the sound of the trumpet; but we must leave them to be shortly visited with lamentation, and mourning, and woe. Already we see them flying in surprise to some gloomy retreat, in the horrid caverns of earth, with the curse of God pursuing them, and hear their wail of woe; "How have I hated instruction, and nothing now is left to shield me from the vengeance of an inexorable Judge, whose hated presence is insupportably dreadful. I have scoffed at, and trifled with the most solemn asseverations of Jehovah, and squandered my last precious moments in nightly orgies, and bachanalian revels; I have reviled and blasphemed that holy name by which alone I could be saved; and now the last trumpet begins to sound, and I am summoned to the bar of inflexible justice, there to hear my final doom! O that I had never been born!"

Such reflections, even in anticipation, leave no pleasant reminiscences on the mind; and, to an affectionate heart, they are agonizing in the extreme. But as we know the world will be as "in the days of Noah," we must after all our labors and prayers, anxieties and sorrows for them, give them up and say in submission, "the will of the Lord be done." Adieu wretched one! "God will destroy thee forever: He will take thee away, and pluck thee out of thy dwelling place, and root thee out of the land of the living." Ps. 52: 5. But to the believer, the despised child of God, who is waiting for the glorious approach of the heavenly Bridegroom, the mention of the last trumpet has no terrors; but the proclamation of its nearer approach, creates a thrill through the soul; for he is getting ready to hail his first appearance in the opening heavens with the loudest shouts of triumphant joy, "This is my God!"

We are now but a little flock; a despised few; whose names are cast out as evil by the haughty, overbearing emissaries of Satan; who have long been supported by the antichristian principalities and powers of earth and hell; but when the last trumpet sounds, it will call such an assembly as earth never witnessed. "Ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands; a great multitude which no man can number;" and they all "came out of great tribulation!" Not one there, but has tasted the bitter cup. All have suffered persecution. Some have waded through seas of blood; some have pined, and famished in the loathsome prison; some have writhed in chains of torture, on the rack, and in the flame; and thousands and tens of thousands have been cruelly slandered, arraigned and tried, (by every indignity that devils could invent, abusers of power execute, or humanity suffer,) and driven out in the cloudy and dark day (of temptation and persecution,) while their examiners hypocritically shout, "Let the Lord be glorified!" But God will soon appear to the joy of the sufferer, and his oppressors "shall be ashamed." Isa. 66: 5. Some have been publickly scourged, and smitten; and some swallowed up in the mighty deep; but all have witnessed a good confession, and borne a truthful testimony to the religion of Christ, and been sustained by its power alone; all have been baptized with the sufferings of Christ, and "washed their robes, and made them white in his blood."

Tongue cannot express the agonies, sorrows and calamities that the members of the mystical body of Christ have suffered, are suffering, and will continue to suffer, till "the last trumpet" sounds; and "the fruit" of so much "suffering will be only to take away sin;" "to try, to purge, and to make them white," even to the time of the end;" and in view of all this unmitigated suffering, none can wonder that they are waiting and longing, and praying that the day may be quickly ushered in, by the sounding of "the Last Trumpet;" that "the Lord himself would speedily descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the Archangel, and with the Trump of God." Then, and then only, can our hopes be realized. Then, and not till then, "from the uttermost part of the earth will be heard songs, even glory to the righteous." Isa. 24: 16.

This company of redeemed sinners will then begin the song of Moses and the Lamb, ascribing all their salvation to God's everlasting love, and to "the blood of the Lamb." While our minds are borne away to the regions above in anticipation of the gems of glory that will crown this august, palm-bearing company, we would prostrate our whole selves before God in adoring gratitude, thanksgiving and praise for love so infinite, so amazing as this; that we should be fellow-heirs with the eternal Son of God, to such an "unfading inheritance." Glory to God for one glimpse of the King in his beauty! Though discerned "through a glass darkly;" it is infinitely superior to all the pageantry of earth; and if the fullness of Christ is so unexhaustible now as to be imparted to all his chosen ones, and so rapturous as to call forth their highest expressions of glory; what will be their extacy when they are made like him and all behold him face to face, "the chiefest among ten thousand," and "altogether lovely!" In view of these glories, who would not rejoice to hear of the sound of "the Last Trumpet," when we shall be made like him, and live and reign with him forever and ever? From a scene so enrapturing to the soul, I would once more turn my weeping eyes to the poor sinner. "O that my head were waters, and my eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for this people. "Cry aloud," O ye ministers of my God, "spare not, lift up your voice like a trumpet and shew my (professing) people their transgression, the house of Jacob their sins;" for the "Last Trumpet" is about to summon the world before the Judge to receive their final doom! O sinner, while there is one moment of probation left, I warn you to flee "to the strong hold;" I beseech you to secure a seat in the Ark while you are a "prisoner of hope." I entreat you to give your heart to God, while you can hear the sound of salvation. I exhort you to repent "that your sins may be blotted out," when these "times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord." I charge you before my Father, and the holy angels to lay down your weapons of rebellion and sue for peace, before your ears become astounded by the last earth-rending blast of "the Trump of God."

One word to backsliders, for such we know there are; and I wish you to understand that neither the trumpet of the law, nor that of the gospel can sanction any promise of your being remembered before the Lord, or of victory over your enemies, if your hearts are not "sound in his statutes." "He that loveth father or mother, son or daughter, (or any earthly object,) more than me, is not worthy of me;" "he that taketh not his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me." "He that loveth his life, (inordinately,) shall lose it." If Christ himself is not your chief good, and his glory your chief aim you have reason to fear that you are destitute of the oil of faith; and consequently must meet with disappointment. Lay no claim to one promise that God has made, while you continue to walk in "a vain show," for you will find the door shut when you are about to enter. "Repent and believe the gospel;" "believe his prophets, so shall you prosper;" for the end of the vision of 2300 days is upon us; the periods of Nehemiah's administration, the baptism and death of Christ, the conversion of Saul, and "those of the abomination of desolation," are demonstrated to be its legitimate offspring, by their exact fulfilment; and I am truly surprised that any one can be so blind as not to see it, or so faithless as to reject it, for the prophecy of Daniel is inspiration itself; and it is the happy privilege of all the people of God (in this country at least,) to receive it as such; and the explanations being given by Heavenly messengers, are to be regarded as certain, as the prophecy is sure. The punishment of Zacharias for his unbelief, stands as a record of warning to all after generations; "whereby shall I know this?" "I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of JEHOVAH!" and yet you doubt. O faith, where art thou? "Behold thou shalt be dumb, and not able to speak until the day that these things shall be performed, because thou believest not my words, which shall be fulfilled in their season." The very same messenger that was sent to Daniel. Let all who put on the name of Christ depart from iniquity, and become living "epistles, known and read of all men." Can you expect to enter that Kingdom, which is "righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost," if you have [illegible]

"The Last Trumpet."

The gathering of the Saints, and the overthrow of the wicked.

The subject on which we now enter, is momentous, and of the deepest interest to the humble, waiting, longing soul; and as we watch the progress of events as they transpire, and see the fulfilment of the words of Him who spake as never man spake, and behold the time drawing near, faith in the promises of God, and in the certainty of its near approach, fill the soul with unulterable joy; for all things now bespeak that "our redemption draweth nigh." We have come "to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel," and we anticipate the day as about to open with the sound of "the last Trumpet," to call together "the Church of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven," and to consign the wicked to "everlasting destruction."

A trumpet in scripture is generally put as a substitute for the sound of the trumpet; but the trumpet was used under the law sometimes as a musical instrument, and sometimes to express a shout of victory. There is something connected with the bare mention of "the last trumpet," that strikes the mind with dread; even the unconcerned stand in awe; but to an awakened sinner it increases his alarm, and his countenance tells of horror and remorse within; and exhibits the very evidence of his condemnation, as he anticipates the tremendous realities of that dreadful day, which will be ushered in by the blast of "the last trumpet."

"The last trumpet" has no charms to the wicked; and the subject is fraught with the most awful and alarming consequences to the neglecters and despisers of the "gospel of the kingdom" of Christ.—"Behold, ye despisers, and wonder and perish; for I work a work in your day, a work which ye will in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you."

A trumpet symbolizes the proclamation of the gospel, and is often used as a prelude to great and sore judgments, to be inflicted on antichristian cities and nations; and will be the instantaneous harbinger of the "day of judgment."

After the law was given, we find that the last typical instruments that Moses was commanded to make before their departure from Mount Sinai, were two silver trumpets.

"And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Make thee two trumpets of silver; of a whole piece shalt thou make them, that thou mayest use them for the calling of the assembly, and for the journeying of the camps." Here we find that these trumpets of silver were a type of the last trumpet, and assembling of saints, and of the proclamation of the gospel. "Blow the trumpet in Zion; sanctify a fast; call a solemn assembly; gather the people; sanctify the congregation; assemble the elders, gather the children;" "Let the priests, the ministers of the Lord weep between the porch and the altar; and let them say, Spare thy people O Lord, and give not thine heritage to reproach;"—"Wherefore should the heathen say where is their God?" Here the trumpet represents the preaching of the word with power, and the salutary effects that follow, with the promises, show it to have been successful. Joel 2: 15, to 32. When the gospel trumpet sounds, it sounds an alarm to the sinner, and calls him to "flee from the wrath to come," by repentance, and faith in the efficacy of the blood of Christ to save the soul; that he may enter the straight and narrow way that leads to God. It calls the new born soul to become a stranger and pilgrim on the earth; leads and encourages him in the heavenly race: and it calls those who "have made a covenant with him by sacrifice," to fasts of deep and holy repentance, and to feasts of pure and heavenly joy.

"The sons of Aaron the (high) priest shall blow with the trumpet, and they shall be to you for an ordinance forever, throughout your generations." "And if ye go to war against an enemy that oppresseth you, then ye shall blow an alarm with the trumpet, and shall be remembered before the Lord your God, and shall be saved from your enemies." "Also in the day of your gladness, and in your solemn days, and in the beginning of your months, ye shall blow with the trumpets over your burnt offerings, and over the sacrifice of your peace offerings; and they shall be to you for a memorial before your God. I am the Lord your God." Num. 10: 1, to 10. Here the sounding of the trumpet was a memento to Israel that God was their leader; which prompted believers to trust and confidence in the promise that "they should be remembered before the Lord, and saved from their enemies." It encourages them in the conflict against the great oppressors of the people of God, even the world, the flesh, and the devil, animates them with "a hope of assurance" of final victory, and often protects them by striking the enemy with terror and dismay. Thus these two silver trumpets bear a striking analogy to the preaching of the gospel, both to saints and sinners; and to the last final call of the great assembly to meet the Lord. "And Hezekiah commanded to offer the burnt offering upon the altar. And when the burnt offering began, the song of the Lord began also with the trumpets." 2. Chron. 29: 27. The burnt offering was wholly consecrated to God; the smoke ascended, and it denoted the entire dedication of him that offered it to God, soul, body, and spirit, to his service and glory, by repentance and faith in the atonement of Christ. By its being wholly consumed it is a striking and solemn representation of the intensity of the sufferings of Christ, when "he gave himself a sacrifice for our sins;" and surprisingly shews the perfection of his love toward us, by voluntarily becoming the sufferer of such unparalleled anguish. It is also a most beautiful emblem of the entire devotion of our whole affection to him.

"All ye inhabitants of the world, and dwellers on the earth, See ye! when he lifteth up an ensign on the mountains; and when he bloweth a trumpet, Hear ye!" This trumpet calls all the dwellers on the earth and of the world to see and hear; gathers the down trodden to Mount Zion, and consequently must be "the last trumpet." Isa. 18: 3. How can the world remain in ignorance of the fact, that the Lord's ensign is now floating in the breeze, on the mountains, and that now "See ye"! is our admonition? But when he bloweth the (seventh) trumpet, all the world must hear; for "the kingdoms of this world will then become the kingdoms of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever." The "great voice in heaven" will be unfolding "the mysteries of God" till the living creatures and elders fall on their faces, worshiping him on his accession to the thrones of earth; the nations are angry and his wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged arrives, when he will "reward his servants the prophets, and saints, and all that fear his name, small and great"; and then he will destroy those wicked ones, who have corrupted and destroyed the earth.

"And the Lord said unto Joshua, See, I have given into thine hand Jericho.—And ye shall compass the city, all ye men of war, and go round about the city once. Thus shalt thou do six days. And seven priests shall bear before the Ark seven trumpets of ram's horns: and the seventh day ye shall compass the city seven times; and the priest shall blow with the trumpets."

"And it shall come to pass that when they make a long blast with the ram's horns, and when ye hear the sound of "the trumpet," all the people shall shout with a great shout; and the wall of the city shall fall down flat; and the people shall ascend up every man straight before him." Josh. 6: 2, 3, 4, 5.

Those seven trumpets of ram's horns whose final blast appeared to level the walls of Jericho with the ground, seem to correspond with the mystical horns of the Lamb, Rev. 4: 6. "And I beheld, and lo in the midst of the throne, and of the four living creatures, and in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb as it had been slain; having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven spirits of God, sent forth into all the earth."

We cannot suppose that the blast of the ram's horns, unaccompanied by the spirit of God could raze the walls of the city of Jericho; but the power of his Spirit could give His people possession of the city, through their faith in "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." It is worthy of notice that the number seven, occurring so often in these passages bears a strong resemblance to the mystical language of the Apocalypse; "seven priests"; "seven trumpets"; seven days," and "seven times," "the seventh day." This number seven might have some allusion to the original Sabbath; but beyond all dispute it had a special reference to the "restitution of all things."—Indeed the fall of Jericho was a remarkable type of the fall of the world; for it must have been the sole power of God, without human instrumentality, that laid the city of Jericho in ruins, and gave the inhabitants thereof to irretrievable destruction. So will the inhabitants of the world, at the sounding of "the last trumpet," be devoted to irremediable ruin. And as Rahab and all her father's house were saved through their faith and obedience, so will the Church of Christ be, in the last trying struggle.

Well might the hearts of the inhabitants of Jericho "melt," (though not in contrition,) at the sight of the armies of Israel; with a Commander in Chief at their head from the upper world; success was sure, doubly sure to them. "The Lord is a man of war; and when He mustereth His hosts to battle," and causeth the great trumpet to be blown, to gather the nations, that he may assemble the kingdoms, to pour upon them "the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God," "who shall be able to stand?"

It is remarkable that at the last blast of the ram's horns, a "mystical trumpet" was to be heard; and then, and not till then, were the people to give the "shout of victory."

"The last trumpet" is called "the trump of God"; 1 Thess. 4: 16, and doubtless was the same that was heard at the fall of Jericho. It is called "the great trumpet," Isa. 27: 13, and is the same that gathers the redeemed to their long wished for home, and leaves the wicked without mercy or favor. It is likewise called the seventh trumpet. It was "the trump of God," that sounded so long and so loud on Mount Sinai to call the children of Israel together at the foot of the mount; when "the voice of the trumpet was so exceeding loud, that all the people that were in the camp trembled." Exod. 19: 16. The same trumpet was blown at the fall of Babylon, Jer. 51: 27, the same trumpet will be blown at the fall of mystical Babylon, when "the Lord shall be seen over them, and his arrow shall go forth as lightning: and the Lord God shall blow the trumpet, and save the flock of his people in that day; for they shall be as the (precious) stones of a crown, lifted up, as an ensign upon his hand," Zech. 9: 14, 16, and the same trumpet will summons the world to judgment at the same time.

"The trump of God," will become the jubilee trumpet, whose last sound will awaken the dead, and call the ransomed of the Lord to Mount Zion with songs and everlasting joy, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.

At the entering of the ark of God into the most holy place in the temple of Solomon, on the 10th day of the seventh month, "the Levites, singers, arrayed in white linen, with cymbals, and psalteries, and harps, stood at the east end of the altar, with an hundred and twenty priests sounding with trumpets."

These trumpets were used as musical instruments, but they seem to allude to the Jubilee: and they celebrated one day, which was called the feast of trumpets.—"Blow up the trumpet in the new moon, in the time appointed, on our solemn feast day," says the Psalmist. Ps. 81: 3.—This was the first day of the seventh month; and it is peculiarly interesting to learn how these Jewish institutions were celebrated, and the use of their sacred vessels and instruments: as all the ceremonies enjoined by God on the Church of the Old Testament, have a special allusion to that of the New.

When David removed the Ark, it was preceded by the sounding of trumpets, and Dr. Scott speaks of those used at the fall of Jericho, as Jubilee trumpets, that is, those which were used at the ushering in of the year of Jubilee.

Says Amos, "Shall the trumpet be blown in the city, and the people not be afraid?" "Blow the trumpet in Zion, says Joel, "sound an alarm in my holy mountain, Let all the inhabitants of the earth tremble; for the day of the Lord cometh, for it is nigh at hand." Zephaniah says, "The great day of the Lord is near, it is near; a day of wrath, a day of trouble and distress, a day of wasteness and desolation, a day of darkness and gloominess, a day of clouds and thick darkness; a day of the trumpet and alarm; the mighty men shall cry there bitterly." The prophets had a very near view of the day of judgment, and they called for the trumpet to alarm the sinner; and these two, with Jeremiah, uttered some of the most startling prophecies that are to be found in the Bible. Jeremiah calls for the trumpet to be blown, while he sees a great destruction hastening. "The lion is come up, the destroyer is on his way; his chariots shall be as the whirlwind; his horses are swifter than eagles. To whom shall I speak and give warning? Behold their ear is uncircumcised, and they cannot hearken." Jer. 5 and 6 chs. Who, (that has ever felt the plague of his own heart, and turned to God,) but can feel union of heart with the prophet, when he mourns over the incorrigibly wicked?—But he is constrained to proclaim, "Behold an evil shall go forth from nation to nation, and a great whirlwind, from the coasts of the earth; and the slain of the Lord shall be at that day, from one end of the earth even to the other end of the earth, they shall not be lamented, neither gathered nor buried. Howl ye shepherds and cry; wallow yourselves in ashes, ye principals of the flock: for the days of your slaughter, and your dispersion are accomplished, and ye shall fall like a pleasant vessel, and have no way to flee nor escape." Jer. 25th chap. The above and similar passages show in terms that cannot be mistaken, the terrible calamities that await the world: and if possible, the most fearful doom will fall on unfaithful shepherds who feed themselves, but feed not the flock; and on the leaders of our cold and backslidden churches.

We weep and mourn over a fallen world who will not heed the sound of the trumpet; but we must leave them to be shortly visited with lamentation, and mourning, and woe. Already we see them flying in surprise to some gloomy retreat, in the horrid caverns of earth, with the curse of God pursuing them, and hear their wail of woe; "How have I hated instruction, and nothing now is left to shield me from the vengeance of an inexorable Judge, whose hated presence is insupportably dreadful. I have scoffed at, and trifled with the most solemn asseverations of Jehovah, and squandered my last precious moments in nightly orgies, and bachanalian revels; I have reviled and blasphemed that holy name by which alone I could be saved; and now the last trumpet begins to sound, and I am summoned to the bar of inflexible justice, there to hear my final doom! O that I had never been born!"

Such reflections, even in anticipation, leave no pleasant reminiscences on the mind; and, to an affectionate heart, they are agonizing in the extreme. But as we know the world will be as "in the days of Noah," we must, after all our labors and prayers, anxieties and sorrows for them, give them up and say in submission, "the will of the Lord be done." Adieu wretched one! "God will destroy thee forever: He will take thee away, and pluck thee out of thy dwelling place, and root thee out of the land of the living." Ps. 52: 5. But to the believer, the despised child of God, who is waiting for the glorious approach of the heavenly Bridegroom, the mention of the last trumpet has no terrors; but the proclamation of its nearest approach, creates a thrill through the soul; for he is getting ready to hail his first appearance in the opening heavens with the loudest shouts of triumphant joy, "This is my God!"

We are now but a little flock; a despised few; whose names are cast out as evil by the haughty, overbearing emissaries of Satan; who have long been supported by the antichristian principalities and powers of earth and hell; but when the last trumpet sounds, it will call such an assembly as earth never witnessed. "Ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands: a great multitude which no man can number:" and they all "came out of great tribulation!" Not one there, but has tasted the bitter cup. All have suffered persecution. Some have waded through seas of blood; some have pined, and famished in the loathsome prison; some have writhed in chains of torture, on the rack, and in the flame; and thousands, and tens of thousands have been cruelly slandered, arraigned and tried, (by every indignity that devils could invent, abusers of power execute, or humanity suffer,) and driven out in the cloudy and dark day (of temptation and persecution,) while their examiners hypocritically shout, "Let the Lord be glorified!" But God will soon appear to the joy of the sufferer, and his oppressors "shall be ashamed." Isa. 66: 5 Some have been publickly scourged, and smitten; and some swallowed up in the mighty deep: but all have witnessed a good confession, and borne a truthful testimony to the religion of Christ, and been sustained by its power alone; all have been baptized with the sufferings of Christ, and "washed their robes, and made them white in his blood."

Tongue cannot express the agonies, sorrows and calamities that the members of the mystical body of Christ have suffered, are suffering, and will continue to suffer, till "the last trumpet" sounds; and "the fruit" of so much "suffering will be only to take away sin;" "to try, to purge, and to make them white," even to the time of the end;" and in view of all this unmitigated suffering, none can wonder that they are waiting and longing and praying that the day may be quickly ushered in, by the sounding of "the Last Trumpet;" that "the Lord himself would speedily descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the Archangel, and with the Trump of God." Then, and then only, can our hopes be realized. Then, and not till then, "from the uttermost part of the earth will be heard songs, even glory to the righteous." Isa. 24: 16.

This company of redeemed sinners will then begin the song of Moses and the Lamb, ascribing all their salvation to God's everlasting love, and to "the blood of the Lamb." While our minds are borne away to the regions above in anticipation of the gems of glory that will crown this august, palm bearing company, we would prostrate our whole selves before God in adoring gratitude, thanksgiving and praise for love so infinite, so amazing as this; that we should be fellow-heirs with the eternal Son of God, to such an "unfading inheritance." Glory to God for one glimpse of the King in his beauty! Though discerned "through a glass darkly;" it is infinitely superior to all the pageantry of earth; and if the fullness of Christ is so unexhaustible now as to be imparted to all his chosen ones, and so rapturous as to call forth their highest expressions of glory; what will be their extacy when they are made like him and all behold him face to face, "the chiefest among ten thousand," and "altogether lovely?" In view of these glories, who would not rejoice to hear of the sound of "the Last Trumpet," when we shall be made like him, and live and reign with him forever and ever?—From a scene so enrapturing to the soul, I would once more turn my weeping eyes to the poor sinner. "O that my head were waters, and my eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for this people. "Cry aloud," O ye ministers of my God, "spare not, lift up your voice like a trumpet, and show my (professing) people their transgression, and the house of Jacob their sins;" for the "Last Trumpet" is about to summon the world before the Judge to receive their final doom! O sinner, while there is one moment of probation left, I warn you to flee "to the strong hold;" I beseech you to secure a seat in the Ark while you are a "prisoner of hope." I entreat you to give your heart to God, while you can hear the sound of salvation. I exhort you to repent "that your sins may be blotted out," when these "times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord." I charge you before my Father, and the holy angels to lay down your weapons of rebellion and sue for peace, before your ears become astounded by the last earth-rending blast of "the Trump of God."

One word to backsliders, for such we know there are; and I wish you to understand that neither the trumpet of the law, nor that of the gospel can sanction any promise of your being remembered before the Lord, or of victory over your enemies, if your hearts are not "sound in his statutes." "He that loveth father or mother, son or daughter, (or any earthly object,) more than me, is not worthy of me:" "he that taketh not his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me." "He that loveth his life, (inordinately,) shall lose it." If Christ himself is not your chief good, and his glory your chief aim you have reason to fear that you are destitute of the oil of faith; and consequently must meet with disappointment. Lay no claim to one promise that God has made, while you continue to walk in "a vain show," for you will find the door shut when you are about to enter. "Repent and believe the gospel;" "believe his prophets, so shall you prosper;" for the end of the vision of 2300 days is upon us; the periods of Nehemiah's administration, the baptism and death of Christ, the conversion of Saul, and "those of the abomination of desolation," are demonstrated to be its legitimate offspring, by their exact fulfilment; and I am truly surprised that any one can be so blind as not to see it, or so faithless as to reject it; for the prophecy of Daniel is inspiration itself; and it is the happy privilege of all the people of God (in this country at least,) to receive it as such; and the explanations being given by Heavenly messengers, are to be regarded as certain, as the prophecy is sure. The punishment of Zacharias for his unbelief, stands as a record of warning to all after generations; "whereby shall I know this?" "I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of JEHOVAH!" and yet you doubt. O faith, where art thou? "Behold thou shalt be dumb, and not able to speak until the day that these things shall be performed, because thou believest not my words, which shall be fulfilled in their season." The very same messenger that was sent to Daniel. Let all who put on the name of Christ depart from iniquity, and become living "epistles, known and read of all men." Can you expect to enter that Kingdom, which is "righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost," if you have no heart for that purity which is an essential ingredient to qualify you for that state of glory? "Without Holiness no one can see the Lord." O that I could portray to you in living colors the immediate importance of ascertaining now whether you belong to his family, and impress on your mind the eternal consequences that hang on the improvement of a very few days! O take hold of the arm of Christ, which is now extended to you, and "become obedient unto the faith;" embrace his covenant, on his terms, and let no idol crowd between you and your God. He alone can "raise you up at the last day;" he alone can "give you an inheritance among them that are sanctified." O "give all diligence to make your calling and election sure, that so an abundant entrance may be ministered unto you, into the everlasting Kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." Is there one soul in our ranks (professedly) going out to meet the Bridegroom, that is, at this late hour, destitute of oil? O flee this instant (for the last day of grace hastens), and pro-

ure the insurance of your life at the Court of Heaven; and lodge your richest treasures there; for the end of the days is in sight, when Brother Daniel and all his people will stand in their lot, "on the sea of glass," before the throne. Great God, shall I be there? O Brethren and Sisters, let us be faithful to our own souls, as well as to others; and with our loins girded, our shoes on our feet, our staff in our hands, and our lamps well trimmed, and in a blaze, stand waiting, ready to depart the instant we see "the door," (which Brother John saw,) begin to open in Heaven, and we shall hear the great voice of "the Last Trumpet," saying "come up hither!"—Thus it will be seen that the seventh Trumpet is the Great Trumpet, the Great Trumpet is the Jubilee Trumpet, the Jubilee Trumpet is the Last Trumpet, and the Last Trumpet is the Trump of God.

"The God of glory sends his summons forth,
Calls the South nations, and awakes the North;
From East to West his sovereign orders spread
Through distant (lands) and regions of the dead,
The Trumpet sounds, Hell trembles, Heaven rejoices;
Lift up your heads, ye saints, with cheerful voices!"

The World's Crisis.

LOWELL, JULY 19, 1854.

Portsmouth Conference.

The Conference holden at Portsmouth, N. H., last week was to me a meeting of unusual interest. Portsmouth has been, in years past, one of the most congenial soils for the growth of Advent principles and devotional feeling, known to me on earth. The genuine, practical faith of that doctrine has flourished in that place to an unusual extent. Some ten years since there was a body of Christians there identified as believers in the speedy coming of Christ, who enjoyed, in an eminent degree, the power of that truth and the glory of that blessed doctrine. Firmly united in the bonds of love, intelligent in relation to the Advent theory, and rejoicing in hope of the glory of God, those beloved Brethren and Sisters were bright examples and living epistles known and read of all. But subsequently to the passing of the '44 time error crept in, distraction ensued, and prostration was the inevitable result.—Some, however, thank God, have endeavored to hold on their way, and stem the storm; but it was not until recently that a general rally of the virgins on the midnight cry and time has been effected. If ever my feelings have been agonized in view of the desolations of Zion, it has been in reference to that people, who have by their spirituality and consecration to God and love of the truth entwined themselves around the deepest affections of my heart. With gratitude to God for His goodness I can now truly congratulate them on the spread of light and truth and love in that place, through the instrumentality of the recent series of meetings. In their beaming countenances and cordial salutations I could discover, at once, the old "'43 grip," and the glory of the Advent doctrine, as it were, resurrected from the dead.

Preaching by Bro. Couch and Hemenway was highly interesting and instructive. On Sunday, Bro. Couch gave us two discourses on the Abomination of desolation, presenting the subject in such clearness and simplicity, that it would seem all might understand, and Bro. Hemenway closed the exercises of the Conference by a discourse on the kingdom of God, demonstrating that it is to be organized, not in this life, but in the world to come. These discourses were listened to with great attention, and doubtless many souls will praise God forever for the blessings received at the Portsmouth Conference.

After the services closed in the afternoon, some of the sweet singers of Israel struck the hymn, beginning,

"The Lord, our Savior, will appear," &c.

Words cannot convey an idea of the sweetness and solemnity of that sacred song.—It seemed as though the glories of heaven were embodied in it. The interest and effect of the meeting was much increased by that enchanting harmony.

Five, if I mistake not, were baptized during the session of the Conference.

Bro. and Sisters in this city had honestly feared that the present arousing of the Virgins was a spirit of delusion, and unworthy to be countenanced, until God by His faithful messengers so effectually removed the barriers to the reception of truth, and then poured in the light accompanied by the power and demonstration of the spirit, that the humble, teachable children, who were famishing for the bread of life, eagerly seized on the instructions of the word, as portrayed by the ambassadors of Christ, and comparing scripture with scripture came to the conclusion that the house was not built on the sand, but on immovable rock. Some ventured their whole weight on the foundation, and feared not to consecrate their entire being to the blessed work of proclaiming the midnight cry, and sounding the alarm in the holy mountain. There was a mutual attraction among the friends of the cause such as the world knoweth not of, a binding cord that rendered it hard parting even for a little season. I cannot thank and praise God enough for what He is doing for that dear people. May they continue in the truth as it is in Jesus, walking in the light, and having fellowship one with another, and maintaining a constant readiness to hail the coming King with joy, and enter into His glorious kingdom when all the jewels shall be gathered to shine in the casket of heaven.

The Time.

We quote from the Harbinger and Advocate of Aug. 5, 1849, the following highly interesting and instructive remarks in relation to time. Although the writer does not admit, with us, that the definite time may be known, yet in relation to the proximity of the event, he says:—

Every Bible student will readily admit that much is said in that book on the time of the coming of the Lord. To reveal the time, was an important end for which the wonderful vision and its interpretation, recorded in the second chapter of Daniel, were given. Leave the time out of the account, and it is, in part, superfluous.—Instead of giving, in regular detail, the history of the four successive earthly monarchies, and minutely describing the divisions of the last,—and then informing us that "in their days," the God of heaven would set up his kingdom,—we say, if time was no object of the prophetic history, instead of this regular and minute detail of events, from the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, down to the reign of the Lord of glory, it would have been all sufficient to have simply said, the God of heaven will ultimately set up his kingdom, without marking any preceding events by which the time when he would do it might be known. But as he has carefully marked a regular chain of the most stupendous events, down to the end of time, it amounts to an absolute certainty that he designed that the time, not only of their occurrence, but of the end, should be known.

The seventh and twelfth chapters of Daniel, inclusive, bear evident marks of the design of God to make known the time when Michael shall commence his universal reign, and the saints of the Most High possess the kingdom. If this was not a prominent object of giving those most sublime prophecies, then, to us, many parts of them are entirely superfluous. The regular detail of the beasts, horns, little horn, and symbolic time, in the seventh chapter, might have been omitted. The two thousand and three hundred days, in the eighth chapter,—the seventy weeks, in the ninth chapter,—and the thirteen hundred and thirty five days, and the other "times," in the twelfth chapter, are not only useless, but calculated to confuse and perplex the student of prophecy. This cannot be; for his revelation, or revealed will, God has not made dark and inexplicable, by superfluous words, and unmeaning symbols. His Word is perfect; consequently, that portion of it that treats on time, means what it says: it makes known the time when Christ shall come and set up his kingdom under the whole heavens.

The signs given by the Savior, which were shortly to precede his coming, are entirely superfluous, on the supposition that the time of that great and most glorious event is not to be previously known. But admitting that it may be known, then they are of the utmost importance in the Savior's discourse; and his words, "When ye shall see all these things, know that he is near, even at the doors," are full of the most important meaning.

Similar remarks might justly be made on Paul's second letter to the Thessalonians, and no small portion of the Apocalypse. Strike the time out of the latter, and but a few broken, disconnected fragments would be left. In a word, God has been lavish in his predictions relative to the time of the return to this earth of his Son. He has not only spoken fully, but variously; or, in other words, he has revealed the time, by numerous historic and symbolic prophecies,—by signs in the natural, political, moral, and religious world; and, in plain words, the meaning of which may be understood by all who desire a correct knowledge of the truth—Hence, if any do not know the time of this near visitation of the Lord of glory, they will be left without excuse, should be come upon them as a snare, or as a thief, and find them unprepared to meet him.

That the time of the personal advent of our blessed Lord is emphatically near, is absolutely certain. We know this by the most exact fulfilment of numerous prophecies, too numerous even to name in this article. But we will say, that God, by the mouth of his prophets, his Son, and his apostles, has most definitely pointed out certain way marks, covering a period of time of two thousand and three hundred years, terminating in the cleansing of the sanctuary; and that we are now actually entering upon or passing the very last—the time of trouble, and battle of the great day of the Lord; so that according to the infallible prophetic chart before us, the next important event will be the coming of the Son of man.

Our faith in this matter rests upon the sure basis of inspired prophecy, and corresponding immutable and well known and accredited facts. As we commenced tracing the prophetic line, we soon found here a prophecy, and down a little further, a fact which justifies that prophecy. A little further on, we found another prophecy, and on still further, a corresponding fact; and so we have gone on, carefully comparing prophecies with facts, prophecies with facts, down to the end of both of the infallible lines, viz, prophecies and facts; and without a single exception in the numerous comparisons we have made, there has been the most perfect agreement between prophecies and facts. And now that we clearly see, in the angry state of the nations of the earth, especially of Europe, the very last prophecies, concerning the events which precede the Lord's coming, having their most literal fulfilment, why should we not believe, that those prophecies, the very last in the divine chain, and which proclaim the coming of the Lord, will have their fulfilment soon? We do believe—it would be unreasonable and sinful to doubt in a case so clear.

Viewing the subject in this light, we are glad to see that some of our correspondents are being turned to its further investigation. We say, let them, and others, continue their researches on this important subject. The result will be good, provided they keep within the bounds of the prophetic word. But above all, may we be ready, at all times, to meet our Lord in peace. Our faith on time, as well as on any other truth of the Bible, may become cold, inactive, and dead, and, consequently, useless. Let us see well to this matter, and keep our faith, in this respect, perfect, alive, and active,—that by it we may be justified now, and in that great day, when He, who is the Author and Finisher of our faith, shall come in all his glory.

From another article in the same paper we quote the following upon the same subject:

While many make a merit of their opposition to time, we should "watch" against all such insidious snares of the adversary. The first advent occurred when "the time" was "fulfilled," Mark i. 15; Dan. ix. 25; 1 Pet. i. 11. It was the time that pins our faith on to Jesus as the Messiah. As there is time "appointed" for the judgment—for "the glory which shall follow" Christ's sufferings, it should have its due weight with all who would be accounted faithful servants—giving "meat in due season."

Mark! The periods alone give definiteness to the signs and descriptive prophecies; for distinct from "the time appointed," the passing events might stretch on into future ages. But the advent movement—the deep conviction on all thinking minds that there is an impending crisis, put together with the speedy, necessary ending of the "time," puts new life in me. We "KNOW THAT HE IS NIGH." Amen.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK CITY, July 10, 1854.

Dear Bro. Merriam:—I write to inform you of the death of our dear Bro. George Marsh Wadsworth. He was taken sick last Tuesday evening about 11 o'clock, but did not apprehend any danger until three o'clock on Wednesday morning, when he called his partner, and his family physician was sent for, but his disease was of that nature that medicine could not remedy.—He had four physicians, but they could not help him. He died at 11 o'clock on Wednesday morning, and was interred on Friday last, in the burying ground at Greenwood Cemetery, to wait the sound of the Trump. The physicians pronounce his disease cholera. We feel sorely afflicted here by this sudden change. As he was with us the Sabbath previous, and spoke in our meeting, he gave in his testimony at the close, expressing his firm belief in the speedy coming of our Lord and Savior this year, expecting to live till Jesus comes. He never expected to die, but often expressed himself thus, he might sleep for a little time. When I attended his funeral, and tried to comfort his dear partner and children, when they let him down into the cold grave, I felt something like as my Master felt when he came to the grave of Lazarus. "Jesus wept." I could not refrain from weeping too. I felt I had lost a dear and faithful Bro., whom I had often taken sweet counsel with, and who was always foremost to help and further the good cause of his Master. He was truly a philanthrophist and a Christian in every sense of the word. "He being dead, yet speaketh." I could say a great deal about him, but I expect Bro. I. Adrian will send you an obituary of him for the Crisis.

We had a blessed time here yesterday, while our dear Bro. Adrian was ministering unto us the word of life. After the afternoon service five happy souls obeyed the command of their Lord, and were buried with Christ by Baptism unto his death, and raised in the likeness of his resurrection. Our Bro. Adrian baptized eight, three weeks ago; so that the Lord is still blessing us in this city, and we are looking for deliverance this year. My faith is strong, and I consider the argument for the Lord's coming on the tenth day of the seventh month, in 1844, just as good for 1854, as I believe we have got the right year. I cannot see beyond it; it must be so, as I consider the argument for this year conclusive. 519, there can be no mistake, is the year for the taking away of the daily sacrifice, or true worship of God, and placing the abomination that maketh desolate. All historians, as far as I can learn, are agreed on this point. The 1290 days did end in 1809, as all history shows. The judgment did sit, and they did take away his dominion to consume and destroy unto the end. 45 years more bring the resurrection in 1854. Oh! my Bro., be faithful, take courage, for Jesus is coming this year, and then comes the reward. I must conclude with my Christian love to you, my dear Bro., though not personally acquainted, I esteem you a Brother in the Lord.

I subscribe myself your Brother, and fellow laborer in the vineyard of the Lord,

ELDER WILLIAM ROWORTH.

MASSENA, N. Y., July 4, 1854.

To the Editor of the Crisis:

Dear Brother:—I have been blest with the privilege of perusing your paper, the World's Crisis, and by reading those cheering epistles from Brethren and Sisters of like precious faith, and examining the testimony it holds forth on those great prophetic chains of reckoning, I can say truly I have been instructed, comforted and edified. It has been to me good news, as it were, from a far country. And I feel willing to cast in my mite on the side of truth. I have examined all the evidences held forth in the Crisis in favor of the time, also in the Herald against it, by the word of God; and now I am ready to give in my verdict, that the darkening of the sun in 1780 did mark the termination of the 1260 years of tribulation, and 75 years from that time will end the 1335 years, when Daniel will stand in his lot, together with all the saints that sleep in Jesus, and and those living ones that love his appearing. But O, do I realise that time is so short? I fear not; and my prayer is that God would apply those truths to my heart by His Spirit, that I may be sanctified thereby, and preserved, with all the rest of my Brothers and Sisters, blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ—Amen.

Your Brother, waiting for the hope of Israel,

IRA HODGKIN.

PROSPECT, ME., July 7, 1854.

Bro. Merriam:—Wishing to inform the Brethren respecting my tour in New Brunswick, I pen these few lines for the Crisis. On Tuesday, June 6, I left Boston for St. John. It was a fine morning, and the sun shone beautifully on the deep blue sea, whose sparkling surface was scarcely ruffled by a breath of wind; but ere long the wind began to blow—the sea to roll, and the waves to dash against the ship's side. But "She onward pressed her way," and seemed not to heed the rolling sea, nor the tempest's angry howl. Thought I, this is like the Christian's course, which is onward, and onward, till glory crowns what grace begun. Brethren, then let us onward press our way; and when the sun of glory seems, for a moment, dimmed by clouds, and the waves of time's tempestuous ocean dash around us, like the gallant steamer, let us onward press our way, looking unto Jesus, having an eye single to his glory, and the surging billows will soon bear us to Canaan's happy shore, where we will wave the palm of victory in that eternal world of joy. We arrived at St. John at 8 o'clock A. M., Wednesday. We did not have any opportunity to hold meetings here, so passed on to Petitcodiac Bend. Arrived on Sunday morning, obtained a large meeting house, and in the afternoon commenced a course of lectures. The people listened attentively; some believed, and some believed not, just as it was in the days of the Apostles. I suppose we were the first Adventists that have visited the place, in consequence of which the people had great curiosity to hear. Some were full of prejudice, which was all swept away at once, and they confessed that the argument was based on the scriptures of truth; so that those who exclaimed "false Prophet" so boldly at first, were constrained to acknowledge to the contrary.

But in consequence of my poor state of health, I thought best to return, the climate affecting me considerably; and other circumstances being unfavorable to my remaining any longer. So I came home, and was glad once more to shake the friendly hand with those who are on their way to the celestial city, and to unite with them in prayer and praise. Brethren, be faithful a little while longer, and "let patience have her perfect work." We will face the storm, knowing "it can't be long;" and soon we will cast anchor in heaven's broad bay. "Lift up your heads," said the blessed Savior, "when these things begin to come to pass;" and when you see them all, "know that it is nigh, even at the door," not ten years off, no not five years off, but even at the door. "But above all things, Brethren, let us have fervent charity among ourselves; for charity covers a multitude of sins." Iniquity abounds and the love of many waxes cold; but he that endures unto the end, the same shall be saved. Yes, the despised, way-worn, and downtrodden pilgrim will soon gain his Eden, and sing on the heights of Zion the triumphant song of redeeming grace and dying love! O thanks be to Jesus, who brought life and immortality to light; through whose merits will be brought to pass the saying, "death is swallowed up in victory," "O death where is thy sting, O grave where is thy victory."—Yes, Brethren, when "the Lord himself descends from heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the Archangel, and the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first, then we, which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air."—Paul tells us to comfort one another with these words; and they are truly comforting words to the pilgrims. May God enable us all to do just right, that we may "stand before the son of man," without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing."—Amen.

ROBERT H. CLARK.

WINDSOR, ME., April 24, 1854.

Bro. Merriam:—I thank God to-day for the hope I have in his mercies, which hope is like an anchor, sure and steadfast; and while the nations are getting angry, while the proclamation is going forth, "Prepare war, wake up the mighty men: let all the men of war draw near: let them come up," I thank the blessed Redeemer for another proclamation, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet Him!" Yes, while "men's hearts are failing them for fear and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth," the man who dare believe God's word, who has abiding in his heart faith, hope, and charity, can see amid all the confusion the working of Him who hath said, "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it until He come whose right it is, and I will give it Him." Dear Brethren, and all who may read, may we, while living in this eventful period, have our loins girt about with truth, our lamps trimmed and burning, and we like unto men who wait for their Lord. Oh may we have on the wedding garment, and be admitted through the all prevailing name of Jesus, as worthy to the marriage supper of the Lamb.

Yours, waiting for deliverance,

J. T. PEIBBLE.

GAYSVILLE, VT, June, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—Truly we can say that the Lord is good to us in this place. A few weeks ago, there were but a few brethren; not enough to sustain meetings. But the good Lord has awakened the old professors, and reclaimed the wanderer, and caused sinners to tremble, in view of the coming judgment, and to seek a preparation requisite to enable them to stand in that eventful day. Now thank God there is a goodly number that meet together, to talk of the coming Kingdom. I have had the privilege of immersing sixteen dear souls, who, I have reason to hope, will be among those that will be accounted worthy to escape all that is coming upon the earth, and to stand before the Son of man. O Brethren and Sisters, let us be awake, for behold the Bridegroom cometh this year. Yes, this is the last year of suffering for the dear saints of God. The way-worn pilgrim, the despised followers of that once despised, but lovely Savior, will be liberated this year; Glory to God. The conflict will soon be over, the warfare will be ended, "in glory they'll reign."

Yours, looking for redemption in a few weeks.

J. A. PACKARD.

CONCORD, N. H., July 12, 1854.

Dear Bro. Merriam:—As I am about to leave this section of country to go into the Western and Southern regions, and give "the midnight cry" to the slumbering virgins, I would sincerely ask my Dear Brethren and Sisters in Christ to remember me at the throne of grace; that I may be enabled to proclaim to all, high and low, rich and poor, black and white, the coming of the Bridegroom in 1854. Farewell, dear friends at the East.

I expect to attend the Grove Meeting at Fort Brewerton, also in Vanburen, Onondaga Co., N. Y., as noticed in last week's Crisis.

JOHN G. HOOK.

LEVANT, 1854.

Pilgrim Brother:—I do feel to thank God with all my heart, that we are on the track of truth. We find that we have past the signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars. The Virgins have been forth to meet the Bridegroom, they have had their disappointment. And now what do we hear sounding through the land? O praise God's dear name, we hear from the faithful Watchman, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him." I believe this to be the true cry; the Virgins were not disappointed the second time in the parable, neither shall we be. I expect in a few months from this, that prayer will be turned into praise, and our faith will be turned into sight.—O yes, soon the last prayer will be offered for sinners, soon the last saint will be sealed, then the door of mercy will be closed forever.

ELIZABETH B. GRIFFIN.

ALNA, July 3, 1854.

Dear Bro. Merriam:—I enclose two dollars for the support of the Crisis. I think it the best paper I have ever seen. Am glad that I live at this period of the world, when the earth is lighted up by the rainbow Angel, and we are called out from Babylon to wait for the Son of God from heaven. I was lost, but am found, and have hope towards God that there will be a resurrection of the dead.

Brethren and Sisters, in Christ, let me say to you, hold fast, believe the word and live forever.

CHARLES FAIRSERVICE.

Brother Merriam:—I have reason to bless the Lord for his goodness to me, that he has spared my life during the sleeping time, and has caused me to hear and feel the force of the midnight cry. How plain the way looks in which he has been pleased to lead us to fulfil his word. Yet how solemn the thought that we have so far advanced in the last year of time! How important that we should improve every moment as if it were the last. O blessed thought, that we are to see the king in his beauty this year; yes, this year. O brethren, let us strive to be ready, for those that are ready are to enter into the marriage of the Lamb. Be faithful, brethren.

EZRA S. EASTMAN.

MANCHESTER, July 3, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—The Lord is yet on the giving hand, Glory to his blessed name; and he is at work in the hearts of the people by his spirit. I baptized one happy soul one week ago yesterday in Auburn; yesterday I baptized one in this place, and she is on her way rejoicing.—Praise the Lord forever, Amen. The line is drawn between the two kingdoms; and people are deciding for the Judgment. O that men would be wise and decide for the truth. What is done must be done quickly. My love to all the saints. Amen.

Your Brother, waiting for Jesus,

BENJ. P. MANNING.

THE BATH CHURCH-BURNING. The burning of this building used as a Catholic Church in Bath, Me., has been mentioned by telegraph. The Bath Mirror of Saturday says the name of the itinerant speaker who stirred up the passions of the mob was Brown, and that they had become exasperated because some persons in a carriage attempted to pass through their midst. The crowd was composed of thousands.—The Mirror adds:—

The work of firing the church was carried on so rapidly that in a few minutes from the first alarm the building was in a complete mass of flames, which shooting high up into the heavens, presented a scene of surpassing grandeur and sublimity.—The sparks and cinders were carried to a great distance, and the most superhuman exertions alone prevented a wide-spread and disastrous conflagration. The fire caught on the roofs of many buildings, but was immediately extinguished. Mr Benjamin Blasland, while endeavoring to extinguish the fire which had caught on the roof of his house, fell to the ground, and broke his shoulder blade.

FURTHER RIOTS AT BATH. The Bath Tribune of yesterday, states that a crowd of from two to four hundred assembled in the vicinity of an old building, in the north part of the city, and proceeded to make preparations to pull it down. The Marshal and Oliver Moses, Esq., who was interested in the building, assisted by persons present, prevented the accomplishment of this purpose. In the mean time, the Mayor arrived, read the riot act and ordered the gathering to disperse. This was greeted with hisses and insults. The Mayor finding his efforts to disperse them unavailing, ordered the City Grays to be called out. The bells were rung and the members of the company assembled at their armory, in strong force, when the order was countermanded, the rioters in the mean time having dispersed.—[Boston Traveller.

CONSCRIPTION IN ITALY. Accounts from Lombardy represent the sufferings of the middle classes there at this moment as something perfectly heart-rending, in consequence of the extreme measure of conscription to which the Government has resorted.

To understand this, it is necessary to explain that in ordinary years the levy has never exceeded 10,000 men, and as many men were freed from service at the same time as the fresh draught was made, there was no difficulty in finding substitutes, because numbers who had served their time and stood well for promotion, had no ob-sure the insurance of your life at the Court of Heaven; and lodge your richest treasures there, for the end of the days is in sight, when Brother Daniel and all his people will stand in their lot, "on the sea of glass," before the throne. Great God, shall I be there? O Brethren and Sisters, let us be faithful to our own souls, as well as to others; and with our loins girded, our shoes on our feet, our staff in our hands, and our lamps well trimmed, and in a blaze, stand waiting, ready to depart the instant we see "the door," (which Brother John saw,) begin to open in Heaven, and we shall hear the great voice of "the Last Trumpet," saying "come up hither!"—Thus it will be seen that the seventh Trumpet is the Great Trumpet, the Great Trumpet is the Jubilee Trumpet, the Jubilee Trumpet is the Last Trumpet, and the Last Trumpet is the Trump of God.

"The God of glory sends his summons forth,
Calls the South nations, and awakes the North;
From East to West his sovereign orders spread
Through distant (lands) and regions of the dead,
The Trumpet sounds, Hell trembles, Heaven rejoices;
Lift up your heads, ye saints, with cheerful voices!"

The World's Crisis.

LOWELL, JULY 19, 1854.

Portsmouth Conference.

The Conference holden at Portsmouth, N. H., last week was to me a meeting of unusual interest. Portsmouth has been, in years past, one of the most congenial soils for the growth of Advent principles and devotional feeling, known to me on earth. The genuine, practical faith of that doctrine has flourished in that place to an unusual extent. Some ten years since there was a body of Christians there identified as believers in the speedy coming of Christ, who enjoyed, in an eminent degree, the power of that truth and the glory of that blessed doctrine. Firmly united in the bonds of love, intelligent in relation to the Advent theory, and rejoicing in hope of the glory of God, those beloved Brethren and Sisters were bright examples and living epistles known and read of all. But subsequently to the passing of the '44 time error crept in, distraction ensued, and prostration was the inevitable result.—Some, however, thank God, have endeavored to hold on their way, and stem the storm; but it was not until recently that a general rally of the virgins on the midnight cry and time has been effected. If ever my feelings have been agonized in view of the desolations of Zion, it has been in reference to that people, who have by their spirituality and consecration to God and love of the truth entwined themselves around the deepest affections of my heart. With gratitude to God for His goodness I can now truly congratulate them on the spread of light and truth and love in that place, through the instrumentality of the recent series of meetings. In their beaming countenances and cordial salutations I could discover, at once, the old "'43 grip," and the glory of the Advent doctrine, as it were, resurrected from the dead.

Preaching by Brn. Couch and Hemenway was highly interesting and instructive. On Sunday, Bro. Couch gave us two discourses on the Abomination of desolation, presenting the subject in such clearness and simplicity, that it would seem all might understand, and Bro. Hemenway closed the exercises of the Conference by a discourse on the kingdom of God, demonstrating that it is to be organized, not in this life, but in the world to come. These discourses were listened to with great attention, and doubtless many souls will praise God forever for the blessings received at the Portsmouth Conference.

After the services closed in the afternoon, some of the sweet singers of Israel struck the hymn, beginning,

"The Lord, our Savior, will appear," &c.

Words cannot convey an idea of the sweetness and solemnity of that sacred song.—It seemed as though the glories of heaven were embodied in it. The interest and effect of the meeting was much increased by that enchanting harmony.

Five, if I mistake not, were baptized during the session of the Conference.

Brn. and Sisters in this city had honestly feared that the present arousing of the Virgins was a spirit of delusion, and unworthy to be countenanced, until God by His faithful messengers so effectually removed the barriers to the reception of truth, and then poured in the light accompanied by the power and demonstration of the spirit, that the humble, teachable children, who were famishing for the bread of life, eagerly seized on the instructions of the word, as portrayed by the ambassadors of Christ, and comparing scripture with scripture came to the conclusion that the house was not built on the sand, but an immovable rock. Some ventured their whole weight on the foundation, and feared not to consecrate their entire being to the blessed work of proclaiming the midnight cry, and sounding the alarm in the holy mountain. There was a mutual attraction among the friends of the cause such as the world knoweth not of, a binding cord that rendered it hard parting even for a little season. I cannot thank and praise God enough for what He is doing for that dear people. May they continue in the truth as it is in Jesus, walking in the light, and having fellowship one with another, and maintaining a constant readiness to hail the coming King with joy, and enter into His glorious kingdom when all the jewels shall be gathered to shine in the casket of heaven.

The Time.

We quote from the Harbinger and Advocate of Aug. 5, 1849, the following highly interesting and instructive remarks in relation to time. Although the writer does not admit, with us, that the definite time may be known, yet in relation to the proximity of the event, he says:—

Every Bible student will readily admit that much is said in that book on the time of the coming of the Lord. To reveal the time, was an important end for which the wonderful vision and its interpretation, recorded in the second chapter of Daniel, were given. Leave the time out of the account, and it is, in part, superfluous.—Instead of giving, in regular detail, the history of the four successive earthly monarchies, and minutely describing the divisions of the last,—and then informing us that "in their days," the God of heaven would set up his kingdom,—we say, if time was no object of the prophetic history, instead of this regular and minute detail of events, from the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, down to the reign of the Lord of glory, it would have been all sufficient to have simply said, the God of heaven will ultimately set up his kingdom, without marking any preceding events by which the time when he would do it might be known. But as he has carefully marked a regular chain of the most stupendous events, down to the end of time, it amounts to an absolute certainty that he designed that the time, not only of their occurrence, but of the end, should be known.

The seventh and twelfth chapters of Daniel, inclusive, bear evident marks of the design of God to make known the time when Michael shall commence his universal reign, and the saints of the Most High possess the kingdom. If this was not a prominent object of giving those most sublime prophecies, then, to us, many parts of them are entirely superfluous. The regular detail of the beasts, horns, little horn, and symbolic time, in the seventh chapter, might have been omitted. The two thousand and three hundred days, in the eighth chapter,—the seventy weeks, in the ninth chapter,—and the thirteen hundred and thirty five days, and the other "times," in the twelfth chapter, are not only useless, but calculated to confuse and perplex the student of prophecy. This cannot be; for his revelation, or revealed will, God has not made dark and inexplicable, by superfluous words, and unmeaning symbols. His Word is perfect; consequently, that portion of it that treats on time, means what it says: it makes known the time when Christ shall come and set up his kingdom under the whole heavens.

The signs given by the Savior, which were shortly to precede his coming, are entirely superfluous, on the supposition that the time of that great and most glorious event is not to be previously known. But admitting that it may be known, then they are of the utmost importance in the Savior's discourse; and his words, "When ye shall see all these things, know that he is near, even at the doors," are full of the most important meaning.

Similar remarks might justly be made on Paul's second letter to the Thessalonians, and no small portion of the Apocalypse. Strike the time out of the latter, and but a few broken, disconnected fragments would be left. In a word, God has been lavish in his predictions relative to the time of the return to this earth of his Son. He has not only spoken fully, but variously; or, in other words, he has revealed the time, by numerous historic and symbolic prophecies,—by signs in the natural, political, moral, and religious world; and, in plain words, the meaning of which may be understood by all who desire a correct knowledge of the truth—Hence, if any do not know the time of this near visitation of the Lord of glory, they will be left without excuse, should be come upon them as a snare, or as a thief, and find them unprepared to meet him.

That the time of the personal advent of our blessed Lord is emphatically near, is absolutely certain. We know this by the most exact fulfilment of numerous prophecies, too numerous even to name in this article. But we will say, that God, by the mouth of his prophets, his Son, and his apostles, has most definitely pointed out certain way marks, covering a period of time of two thousand and three hundred years, terminating in the cleansing of the sanctuary; and that we are now actually entering upon or passing the very last—the time of trouble, and battle of the great day of the Lord; so that according to the infallible prophetic chart before us, the next important event will be the coming of the Son of man.

Our faith in this matter rests upon the sure basis of inspired prophecy, and corresponding immutable and well known and accredited facts. As we commenced tracing the prophetic line, we soon found here a prophecy, and down a little farther, a fact which justifies that prophecy. A little further on, we found another prophecy, and on still further, a corresponding fact; and so we have gone on, carefully comparing prophecies with facts, prophecies with facts, down to the end of both of the infallible lines, viz, prophecies and facts; and without a single exception in the numerous comparisons we have made, there has been the most perfect agreement between prophecies and facts. And now that we clearly see, in the angry state of the nations of the earth, especially of Europe, the very last prophecies, concerning the events which precede the Lord's coming, having their most literal fulfilment, why should we not believe, that those prophecies, the very last in the divine chain, and which proclaim the coming of the Lord, will have their fulfilment soon? We do believe—it would be unreasonable and sinful to doubt in a case so clear.

Viewing the subject in this light, we are glad to see that some of our correspondents are being turned to its further investigation. We say, let them, and others, continue their researches on this important subject. The result will be good, provided they keep within the bounds of the prophetic word. But above all, may we be ready, at all times, to meet our Lord in peace. Our faith on time, as well as on any other truth of the Bible, may become cold, inactive, and dead, and, consequently, useless. Let us see well to this matter, and keep our faith, in this respect, perfect, alive, and active,—that by it we may be justified now, and in that great day, when He, who is the Author and Finisher of our faith, shall come in all his glory.

From another article in the same paper we quote the following upon the same subject:

While many make a merit of their opposition to time, we should "watch" against all such insidious snares of the adversary. The first advent occurred when "the time" was "fulfilled," Mark i. 15; Dan. ix. 25; 1 Pet. i. 11. It was the time that pins our faith on to Jesus as the Messiah. As there is time "appointed" for the judgment—for "the glory which shall follow" Christ's sufferings, it should have its due weight with all who would be accounted faithful servants—giving "meat in due season."

Mark! The periods alone give definiteness to the signs and descriptive prophecies; for distinct from "the time appointed," the passing events might stretch on into future ages. But the advent movement—the deep conviction on all thinking minds that there is an impending crisis, put together with the speedy, necessary ending of the "time," puts new life in me. We "KNOW THAT HE IS NIGH." Amen.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK CITY, July 10, 1854.

Dear Bro. Merriam:—I write to inform you of the death of our dear Bro. George Marsh Wadsworth. He was taken sick last Tuesday evening about 11 o'clock, but did not apprehend any danger until three o'clock on Wednesday morning, when he called his partner, and his family physician was sent for, but his disease was of that nature that medicine could not remedy.—He had four physicians, but they could not help him. He died at 11 o'clock on Wednesday morning, and was interred on Friday last, in the burying ground at Greenwood Cemetery, to wait the sound of the Trump. The physicians pronounce his disease cholera. We feel sorely afflicted here by this sudden change. As he was with us the Sabbath previous, and spoke in our meeting, he gave in his testimony at the close, expressing his firm belief in the speedy coming of our Lord and Savior this year, expecting to live till Jesus comes. He never expected to die, but often expressed himself thus, he might sleep for a little time. When I attended his funeral, and tried to comfort his dear partner and children, when they let him down into the cold grave, I felt something like as my Master felt when he came to the grave of Lazarus. "Jesus wept." I could not refrain from weeping too. I felt I had lost a dear and faithful Bro., whom I had often taken sweet counsel with, and who was always foremost to help and further the good cause of his Master. He was truly a philanthrophist and a Christian in every sense of the word. "He being dead, yet speaketh." I could say a great deal about him, but I expect Bro. I. Adrian will send you an obituary of him for the Crisis.

We had a blessed time here yesterday, while our dear Bro. Adrian was ministering unto us the word of life. After the afternoon service five happy souls obeyed the command of their Lord, and were buried with Christ by Baptism unto his death, and raised in the likeness of his resurrection. Our Bro. Adrian baptized eight, three weeks ago; so that the Lord is still blessing us in this city, and we are looking for deliverance this year. My faith is strong, and I consider the argument for the Lord's coming on the tenth day of the seventh month, in 1844, just as good for 1854, as I believe we have got the right year. I cannot see beyond it; it must be so, as I consider the argument for this year conclusive. 519, there can be no mistake, is the year for the taking away of the daily sacrifice, or true worship of God, and placing the abomination that maketh desolate. All historians, as far as I can learn, are agreed on this point. The 1290 days did end in 1809, as all history shows. The judgment did sit, and they did take away his dominion to consume and destroy unto the end. 45 years more bring the resurrection in 1854. Oh! my Bro., be faithful, take courage, for Jesus is coming this year, and then comes the reward. I must conclude with my Christian love to you, my dear Bro., though not personally acquainted, I esteem you a Brother in the Lord.

I subscribe myself your Brother, and fellow laborer in the vineyard of the Lord, ELDER WILLIAM ROWORTH.

MASSENA, N. Y., July 4, 1854.

To the Editor of the Crisis:

Dear Brother:—I have been blest with the privilege of perusing your paper, the World's Crisis, and by reading those cheering epistles from Brethren and Sisters of like precious faith, and examining the testimony it holds forth on those great prophetic chains of reckoning, I can say truly I have been instructed, comforted and edified. It has been to me good news, as it were, from a far country. And I feel willing to cast in my mite on the side of truth. I have examined all the evidences held forth in the Crisis in favor of the time, also in the Herald against it, by the word of God; and now I am ready to give in my verdict, that the darkening of the sun in 1780 did mark the termination of the 1260 years of tribulation, and 75 years from that time will end the 1335 years, when Daniel will stand in his lot, together with all the saints that sleep in Jesus, and and those living ones that love his appearing. But O, do I realise that time is so short? I fear not; and my prayer is that God would apply those truths to my heart by His Spirit, that I may be sanctified thereby, and preserved, with all the rest of my Brothers and Sisters, blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ—Amen.

Your Brother, waiting for the hope of Israel, IRA HODGKIN.

PROSPECT, ME., July 7, 1854.

Bro. Merriam:—Wishing to inform the Brethren respecting my tour in New Brunswick, I pen these few lines for the Crisis. On Tuesday, June 6, I left Boston for St. John. It was a fine morning, and the sun shone beautifully on the deep blue sea, whose sparkling surface was scarcely ruffled by a breath of wind; but ere long the wind began to blow—the sea to roll, and the waves to dash against the ship's side. But "She onward pressed her way," and seemed not to heed the rolling sea, nor the tempest's angry howl. Thought I, this is like the Christian's course, which is onward, and onward, till glory crowns what grace begun. Brethren, then let us onward press our way; and when the sun of glory seems, for a moment, dimmed by clouds, and the waves of time's tempestuous ocean dash around us, like the gallant steamer, let us onward press our way, looking unto Jesus, having an eye single to his glory, and the surging billows will soon bear us to Canaan's happy shore, where we will wave the palm of victory in that eternal world of joy. We arrived at St. John at 8 o'clock A. M., Wednesday. We did not have any opportunity to hold meetings here, so passed on to Petticodiac Bend. Arrived on Sunday morning, obtained a large meeting house, and in the afternoon commenced a course of lectures. The people listened attentively; some believed, and some believed not, just as it was in the days of the Apostles. I suppose we were the first Adventists that have visited the place, in consequence of which the people had great curiosity to hear. Some were full of prejudice, which was all swept away at once, and they confessed that the argument was based on the scriptures of truth; so that those who exclaimed "false Prophet" so boldly at first, were constrained to acknowledge to the contrary.

But in consequence of my poor state of health, I thought best to return, the climate affecting me considerably; and other circumstances being unfavorable to my remaining any longer. So I came home, and was glad once more to shake the friendly hand with those who are on their way to the celestial city, and to unite with them in prayer and praise. Brethren, be faithful a little while longer, and "let patience have her perfect work." We will face the storm, knowing "it can't be long;" and soon we will cast anchor in heaven's broad bay. "Lift up your heads," said the blessed Savior, "when these things begin to come to pass;" and when you see them all, "know that it is nigh, even at the door," not ten years off, no not five years off, but even at the door. "But above all things, Brethren, let us have fervent charity among ourselves; for charity covers a multitude of sins." Iniquity abounds and the love of many waxes cold; but he that endures unto the end, the same shall be saved. Yes, the despised, way-worn, and downtrodden pilgrim will soon gain his Eden, and sing on the heights of Zion the triumphant song of redeeming grace and dying love! O thanks be to Jesus, who brought life and immortality to light; through whose merits will be brought to pass the saying, "death is swallowed up in victory," "O death where is thy sting, O grave where is thy victory."—Yes, Brethren, when "the Lord himself descends from heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the Archangel, and the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first, then we, which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air."—Paul tells us to comfort one another with these words; and they are truly comforting words to the pilgrims. May God enable us all to do just right, that we may "stand before the son of man," without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing."—Amen. ROBERT H. CLARK.

WINDSOR, ME., April 24, 1854.

Bro. Merriam:—I thank God to-day for the hope I have in his mercies, which hope is like an anchor, sure and steadfast; and while the nations are getting angry, while the proclamation is going forth, "Prepare war, wake up the mighty men: let all the men of war draw near: let them come up," I thank the blessed Redeemer for another proclamation, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet Him!" Yes, while "men's hearts are failing them for fear and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth," the man who dare believe God's word, who has abiding in his heart faith, hope, and charity, can see amid all the confusion the working of Him who hath said, "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it until He come whose right it is, and I will give it Him." Dear Brethren, and all who may read, may we, while living in this eventful period, have our loins girt about with truth, our lamps trimmed and burning, and we like unto men who wait for their Lord. Oh may we have on the wedding garment, and be admitted through the all prevailing name of Jesus, as worthy to the marriage supper of the Lamb.

Yours, waiting for deliverance,
J. T. PEIBBLE.

GAYSVILLE, VT, June, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—Truly we can say that the Lord is good to us in this place. A few weeks ago, there were but a few brethren; not enough to sustain meetings. But the good Lord has awakened the old professors, and reclaimed the wanderer, and caused sinners to tremble, in view of the coming judgment, and to seek a preparation requisite to enable them to stand in that eventful day. Now thank God there is a goodly number that meet together, to talk of the coming Kingdom. I have had the privilege of immersing sixteen dear souls, who, I have reason to hope, will be among those that will be accounted worthy to escape all that is coming upon the earth, and to stand before the Son of man. O Brethren and Sisters, let us be awake, for behold the Bridegroom cometh this year. Yes, this is the last year of suffering for the dear saints of God. The way-worn pilgrim, the despised followers of that once despised, but lovely Savior, will be liberated this year; Glory to God. The conflict will soon be over, the warfare will be ended, "in glory they'll reign."

Yours, looking for redemption in a few weeks. J. A. PACKARD.

CONCORD, N. H., July 12, 1854.

Dear Bro. Merriam:—As I am about to leave this section of country to go into the Western and Southern regions, and give "the midnight cry" to the slumbering virgins, I would sincerely ask my Dear Brethren and Sisters in Christ to remember me at the throne of grace; that I may be enabled to proclaim to all, high and low, rich and poor, black and white, the coming of the Bridegroom in 1854. Farewell, dear friends at the East.

I expect to attend the Grove Meeting at Fort Brewerton, also in Vanburen, Onondaga Co., N. Y., as noticed in last week's Crisis. JOHN G. HOOK.

LEVANT, 1854.

Pilgrim Brother:—I do feel to thank God with all my heart, that we are on the track of truth. We find that we have past the signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars. The Virgins have been forth to meet the Bridegroom, they have had their disappointment. And now what do we hear sounding through the land? O praise God's dear name, we hear from the faithful Watchman, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him." I believe this to be the true cry; the Virgins were not disappointed the second time in the parable, neither shall we be. I expect in a few months from this, that prayer will be turned into praise, and our faith will be turned into sight.—O yes, soon the last prayer will be offered for sinners, soon the last saint will be sealed, then the door of mercy will be closed forever. ELIZABETH B. GRIFFIN.

ALNA, July 3, 1854.

Dear Bro. Merriam:—I enclose two dollars for the support of the Crisis. I think it the best paper I have ever seen. Am glad that I live at this period of the world, when the earth is lighted up by the rainbow Angel, and we are called out from Babylon to wait for the Son of God from heaven. I was lost, but am found, and have hope towards God that there will be a resurrection of the dead.

Brethren and Sisters, in Christ, let me say to you, hold fast, believe the word and live forever.

CHARLES FAIRSERVICE.

Brother Merriam:—I have reason to bless the Lord for his goodness to me, that he has spared my life during the sleeping time, and has caused me to hear and feel the force of the midnight cry. How plain the way looks in which he has been pleased to lead us to fulfil his word. Yet how solemn the thought that we have so far advanced in the last year of time! How important that we should improve every moment as if it were the last. O blessed thought, that we are to see the king in his beauty this year; yes, this year. O brethren, let us strive to be ready, for those that are ready are to enter into the marriage of the Lamb. Be faithful, brethren. EZRA S. EASTMAN.

MANCHESTER, July 3, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—The Lord is yet on the giving hand, Glory to his blessed name; and he is at work in the hearts of the people by his spirit. I baptized one happy soul one week ago yesterday in Auburn; yesterday I baptized one in this place, and she is on her way rejoicing.—Praise the Lord forever, Amen. The line is drawn between the two kingdoms; and people are deciding for the Judgment. O that men would be wise and decide for the truth. What is done must be done quickly. My love to all the saints. Amen.

Your Brother, waiting for Jesus,
BENJ. P. MANNING.

THE BATH CHURCH-BURNING. The burning of this building used as a Catholic Church in Bath, Me., has been mentioned by telegraph. The Bath Mirror of Saturday says the name of the itinerant speaker who stirred up the passions of the mob was Brown, and that they had become exasperated because some persons in a carriage attempted to pass through their midst. The crowd was composed of thousands.—The Mirror adds:—

The work of firing the church was carried on so rapidly that in a few minutes from the first alarm the building was in a complete mass of flames, which shooting high up into the heavens, presented a scene of surpassing grandeur and sublimity.—The sparks and cinders were carried to a great distance, and the most superhuman exertions alone prevented a wide-spread and disastrous conflagration. The fire caught on the roofs of many buildings, but was immediately extinguished. Mr Benjamin Blasland, while endeavoring to extinguish the fire which had caught on the roof of his house, fell to the ground, and broke his shoulder blade.

FURTHER RIOTS AT BATH. The Bath Tribune of yesterday, states that a crowd of from two to four hundred assembled in the vicinity of an old building, in the north part of the city, and proceeded to make preparations to pull it down. The Marshal and Oliver Moses, Esq., who was interested in the building, assisted by persons present, prevented the accomplishment of this purpose. In the mean time, the Mayor arrived, read the riot act and ordered the gathering to disperse. This was greeted with hisses and insults. The Mayor finding his efforts to disperse them unavailing, ordered the City Grays to be called out. The bells were rung and the members of the company assembled at their armory, in strong force, when the order was countermanded, the rioters in the mean time having dispersed.—[Boston Traveller.

CONSCRIPTION IN ITALY. Accounts from Lombardy represent the sufferings of the middle classes there at this moment as something perfectly heart-rending, in consequence of the extreme measure of conscription to which the Government has resorted.

To understand this, it is necessary to explain that in ordinary years the levy has never exceeded 10,000 men, and as many men were freed from service at the same time as the fresh draught was made, there was no difficulty in finding substitutes, because numbers who had served their time and stood well for promotion, had no objection to remain in the service for a consideration; consequently those who could afford to pay 600 florins to the Government chest might reckon with tolerable security on being free from military service.

But this year the levy will amount, according to the official documents published, to 27,478, and as no soldiers are allowed to return home, it is impossible to find substitutes for less than 8,000f., and then with difficulty. The sum is, of course, beyond the means of the former class, and their dismay is described as pitiable, as the whole family is made responsible in case the member liable to the conscription should not be forthcoming, which has, it appears, not unfrequently been the case.

Extract from Kossuth's Speech at the Music Hall.

Austria is so much the irreconcilable enemy of Turkey, that if there be a man here who doubts that she would this day gladly share in her partition,—he is worthy a mad-house.

If you can find in England one statesman, who is not convinced that Austria is, and always will be found perfectly ready to share in a partition of Turkey, if she can arrive at it—if you find only one such man all over England, then—well, I don't know what to say, it is so absurd. Only remember the secret Seymour correspondence which made such a noise, though there was nothing new in it to thinking men. What is it, the Czar has answered, when asked whether Austria would go in for a partition of Turkey? Why, he answered, that is as much as if you would ask him whether he (the Czar) himself would go in for it. This was the meaning, though these were not the precise words. Of course it is quite as much. Why, in the name of common sense, how can England and France commit the enormous, unheard-of blunder, to force such a dangerous ally upon poor Turkey, and to allow him to occupy her provinces? (Loud cheers.) Upon honor and conscience I give it to you, not as an opinion, but as a positive fact, that all Turkish statesmen, from the highest to the lowest, are extremely afraid of the very idea of Austrian friendship.—You may find, in the great Divan, partizans of every imaginable idea, perhaps even of Russia, but not one single partizan of Austrian friendship will you find either in the Divan or amongst the Turkish people, or even amongst the Christian population of Turkey; all of them agree in what the Servian Government declared so emphatically—that Austria is hated by all of them as the personification of a grasping ambition, endeavoring to exercise the most egotistical influence in Turkey. Indeed, it is but barking at the prey, ready to fall upon. And really, how could Turkey do otherwise but be afraid of the alliance with Austria? It knows her nature, it knows her hereditary ambition, it knows her partitioning aspirations, and besides, it knows that Austria entering Turkey as an ally, will arouse all the Christian population of Turkey against herself, and consequently in this case, against Turkey, as the Servian Government declared it officially to the Sublime Porte. (Renewed cheers.)

Why, in the name of good faith and common sense, I ask, how can England and France think to force such an alliance upon Turkey, and drive her into confusion and internal dissolution, all the while pretending to be tenderly careful of her independence and integrity? (Hear, hear.) Further, (and this is again an essential consideration) at entering into alliances, the most ordinary common sense suggests as an imperative condition, that he whom you take for your ally, should agree with you in will and purpose; his object must be the same as yours. If that be not the case, then there is no real alliance—there is division and difference. Now, I would ask you has your Government, with all its infinite submission, come at least so far as to make Austria agree with you in purpose and object? No, a thousand times no. Austria, though she never had the slightest objection through all history to lie and to swear false oaths, did, in this case, not even take the pains to belie you—she dared not go so far from fear to offend the Czar. (Vehement applause.) She told you openly, clearly, that she does not join you in your object of disarming the ambition of Russia, by taking material guarantees against her future encroachments upon Turkey: all in what she would join is, that the Czar should go home this time. Of course, she does desire so much.—Why? Is it from any solicitude for Turkey which she would like to partition rather to-day than to-morrow? No, it is from mere fear that this war in the immediate neighborhood of Hungary, could possibly endanger the duration of her despotic oppression of nations whom she deprived of their national existence. That is the case. You desire to reduce the overwhelming preponderance of Russia—this is your object; in this object Austria does not join you, but she accepts your co-operation to make her own despotism secure. In what manner do you co-operate? Why, you co-operate because by forcing the alliance of Austria upon Turkey, you force her not to take the Polish and Hungarian nations by the hand; which would have saved Turkey, and also have re-constructed Poland and Hungary. Thus do you co-operate to make Austrian despotism sure. Now, if you accept this situation, am I not right in saying, that, from complacency to Austria you have changed the character and the bearing of the war; you are no more fighting for the future security of Turkey, nor for the reduction of Russia's preponderance, but you are fighting for the security of Austrian despotism. Now, I conjure you by the All-seeing eye, is that your object?—is that your aim? You say no; but if such be the object with the Government of England, let it at least be manly acknowledged; let public opinion not be misguided; let us not hear the boast of fighting for the freedom and independence of Europe, because that is not true; let those sacred words not be profaned by lip-worship. (Loud cheers.)

The fact, however, that during the repeated desperate assaults, nearly all the commanding officers were wounded and disabled—Pashkiewitch, Schilders, whose leg has since been amputated, Gorchakoff, Luders and Orloff who was shot through the eye, clearly proves that the Russians were under orders, not merely to take the place at any cost, but to take it within a certain fixed time. Indeed the whole was conducted on their part in a manner which reminds us more of the barbarian method of carrying the cities of Koordistan by Timour Tamerlane, than of the proceedings of regular modern warfare. On the other hand, it is evident that the heroic and able defence of Silistria created equal surprise with the allied powers and the Ottoman Divan. Our readers may remember that about six weeks ago the allied commanders met at Varna, that they discovered that the Balkan line formed the natural defence of Turkey, and that now many of the British journals not only confess, but glory in the avowal, that Silistria was not relieved by a single French or English soldier. Lastly, it cannot be denied that Silistria was a point of great military importance, that the fate of this fortress decides the fate of the campaign, and that with the abandonment of its siege and the sudden retreat of the Russians upon the Pruth, the whole of the Russian conquests of territory made this year as well as the last are lost.

Still it must be said that our English cotemporaries, many of them, greatly exaggerate the extent of the present Muscovite reverses. It certainly requires a high degree of credulity to believe that the sortie made by the garrison of Silistria on June 13, and the succor of 2,000 men they are said to have received from Omer Pasha, resulted in the total defeat of Russians, and forced 90,000 to 100,000 men to fly before 15,000. The sudden retreat of the Russians is, so far as we can judge, quite as mysterious as their sudden attack. It is only to be explained by a previous understanding with Austria, involving the occupation of the Principalities by Austrian troops. Under these circumstances, the following passage which we find in a letter of The Morning Chronicle's Constantinople correspondent, revealing this plot on June 10, as early as four days before the conclusion of the Austro-Turkish treaty, is of a peculiarly interesting character:

"The Turks think that diplomacy is playing with them, and that it is their intention to allow Silistria to fall into the hands of Russia. Those suspicions receive confirmation from the news that has been received here of the preparation of a new protocol at Vienna, in which the fall of Silistria is, I learn, spoken of as if it were accomplished, and, the military honor of Russia being satisfied, Austria would consider the time to have arrived for her armed intervention to bring about an arrangement by the means of her co-operation—occupying the Danubian Principalities, which would be evacuated by the armies of Russia."

According to this, if the Russians had taken Silistria in due time, all would have been right. But though they did not succeed in satisfying the military honor of the Czar, they must, according to the compromise with Austria, beat back in a somewhat inglorious manner. The Russians receding behind the Pruth, the Austrians advance up to that river, and thus place themselves between the Muscovites and the Turks and their allies. In this position they are arbiters of the quarrel, preventing both parties from moving forward. If we look at the relative strength of the Russians before Silistria and in Bulgaria, now on their retreat behind the Pruth, and of the allied armies as far as they can, thanks to their ingenious arrangements, be thrown at all into the balance, it is plainly seen that, with even with the best intentions, the latter would not be capable of baffling this combination of Austria with Russia.

The Russian forces employed against Turkey and the allies on the European shores of the Black Sea, amount to thirteen divisions of infantry, three of the third, three of the fourth, one of the fifth, three of the sixth army corps, and three reserve divisions. Besides these, the third, fourth, fifth and sixth divisions of light cavalry, and the third, fourth and fifth divisions of artillery. These troops, making up nearly one-half of the grand army of operations, should amount, according to the official statements, to 16,000 men per division of infantry, 5,000 per division of cavalry, and 160 guns per division of artillery; altogether something like 250,000 to 260,000 men, inclusive of train and camp followers. But, if we measure the strength of a Russian army by what it actually was in the Hungarian war, we cannot estimate a division of Russian infantry at more than 13,000 to 14,000 men, and the cavalry and artillery must be reduced in proportion. The actual forces, then, which the Russians have successively marched into the Principalities would be reduced to about 210,000 men, and even from this number must be deducted, on account of loss in battle and by sickness, at least 20,000 to 25,000 more. Recollecting the ravages made by the marsh-fever in the ranks of the Russian army during 1828-29, and comparing the letters of a Russian surgeon in the Vienna Medical Journal, we cannot consider a loss of from eight to ten per cent. upon the total of the army as exaggerated. Thus about 180,000 Russians are left as the disposable number of their army.

Operations of Admiral Plumridge in the Gulf of Bothnia. The squadron of steam frigates, Leopard, Odin, Valorous, and Vulture, under Admiral Plumridge, have sunk, burned, or otherwise destroyed fifty ships, from the Aland group of islands, on the South, to Tornea, at the extreme North of the Gulf of Bothnia. The public stores and magazines of Uleaborg, Brahestad, and Tornea, have been fired. Sixteen ships in first-mentioned port, loaded with stores, tar and wood, and others on the stocks, became the prey of one grand conflagration.

The inhabitants hoped, by offering supplies, that they might succeed in ransoming those places. They were polite and civil. The supplies which were taken were paid for immediately. The inhabitants of Tornea baked bread for three days for the ships, and piled up the barracks, which they offered to burn. The bread was paid for, but the orders against the enemy were fully carried out, and the work of destruction went on. By those operations, it is estimated that a loss of about £400,000 has been inflicted.

In giving an account of an attack on Gamla Thareby, on the Gulf of Bothnia, the Traveller says:—

The action was maintained for one hour and a quarter, at the end of which time, out of the two hundred and thirty men engaged, fifty-four officers and men were killed, wounded, and missing, together with the paddle-box boat mentioned, and its twenty-four pounder howitzer. Thus about one-fourth of the force employed were cut down; Lieut. M. W. Carrington, Mr. Charles F. H. Montague, mate, and Mr. Althorpe, midshipman, belonging to the Odin, were killed; Lieut. A. O. L. Lewis, R. M., and a naval cadet of the same ship, were wounded—the former having been struck in the face by a musket or Minie ball. Mr. H. Murphy and twenty-seven seamen and marines are missing in the paddle-box boat of the Vulture—most of whom, if not all, are supposed to have been killed.

The Austrian Occupation of the Principalities. It has already been stated that the entrance of Austrian troops into Wallachia is decided on. Count Coronini, with a first division, to be followed by a second, has orders to keep himself in readiness to descend the Danube as far as Giurgevo. M. de Bruck has been ordered to put himself in communication with the Porte, and to come to an understanding respecting the political and military combinations that will ensue from the movement of the Austrian army. Col. Halek sets out for the headquarters of Omer Pasha, and has orders to communicate with the commanders of the French and English troops, but the cabinet of Vienna will only take its final resolution after receiving the reply of the cabinet of St. Petersburg to its last summons.

Col. Manteuffel would arrive at St. Petersburg on the 19th or 20th of June. Nothing would be done before the delivery of the Prussian note, and the reply of the Emperor Nicholas could not be known at Vienna before the beginning of July.

The total strength of the Austrian army will amount, a fortnight hence, to 300,000 men, reaching on a line from the frontiers of Dalmatia, to those of the Bukowina. Gen. Hess, the commander-in-chief, is a man of ability, and enjoys the confidence of the army.

Riot at Manchester, N. H. On Monday night a number of Irish lads, at the lower end of Elm street, kindled bonfires, which were twice extinguished by the authorities. In passing by this spot, some Americans were assailed with insulting speeches, brick bats, and other missiles some being badly injured. There were about one hundred Irish engaged in the assault.—About midnight they attacked the building of Marshall & Cheney, breaking the windows, and doing other damage, and also, without provocation, knocked down and seriously hurt Mr. Charles Lee. The report was now carried through the city, that Lee and another man was killed, when a mob of Americans was formed, who rushed indiscriminately upon the Irish settlements, breaking the doors and windows of fifteen houses. They then started for the Catholic church, breaking in the windows, which were of beautiful stained glass, and doing damage to the amount of six hundred dollars. At this time, John H. Maynard, Esq., appeared, and influenced the mob to desist, which they did for the time, but an effort was made on Wednesday evening to form another mob, for renewed assaults on the Irish, the ring leaders in which were arrested. The mayor appeared and exhorted all persons to keep the peace.—[Her. Gos. Lib.

☞ From Babylon also very interesting accounts have been received from Major Rawlinson, in the first place narrating the progress of his own exhumations, and in the next, describing some tablets of cuneiform character, discovered in the earliest diggings of the new Assyrian Association, and sent to him from the locality about 90 miles to the south of Babylon, where the ruins of a city, apparently equal, or superior, in extent to Nineveh, now offer themselves for the operations of the society. Here again a great and extraordinary field is opened for inquiry. The inscriptions contain the names of Selenius and Antiochus, successors of Alexander the Great, and there seems to be little doubt that the monuments disinterred from this site will furnish the most important facts of the Grecian wars in Asia, of which so little except generalities is known.—Truly we may be led to the belief that the secrets of the old world are about to be revealed in a manner quite unhoped for till the present era.

Correction. In last week's Crisis there was an expression over the head of foreign news, taken from another paper, which was not noticed at the time, or it would not have been published. It was this, "prospect of a terminus to the war." We have no idea that peace will ever reign again among the nations, until the administration of "the Prince of peace" begins.

Later from Europe.

Change in the Aspect of the War.

By the Asia at New York, July 12, we have three days later advices from Europe—dates to the 1st inst. There would be a union of the allied army at Varna in a few days. Negotiations were still active. Amicable relations between Turkey and Greece would soon be restored. Odessa was no longer blockaded. Austria had raised a new loan of 350,000,000. The markets complained of a depression in prices.—The Czar was on his way to the Crimea.

Austria is ready to march 200,000 troops into the Principalities, thus interposing between the combatants and preventing further actual hostilities in that quarter. Austria has not yet received the Czar's official reply, and cannot probably before July 3d, and will not act decisively until received. The action of Austria is in accordance with the convention between herself individually and the Porte.

The whole Anglo French force is now at Varna, preparing, it is supposed, for an expedition under Gen. St. Arnaud, in person, into the Crimea.

The whole of the Russian army of occupation, is falling back in good order with all its stores on the pruth. The Garrison of Ismail Gallaty &c., was already on march to the Crimea, and also the disposable force will immediately follow, as that is supposed to be the next battlefield.

On the 20th and 23d of June, the Turkish vanguard of 25,000 men attacked the rear guard of the Russians, and drove it beyond the Trajan Wall.

Despatches are stated to have been received from St. Petersburgh, containing the Russian answer to the Austrian requisition. Well informed persons believe that they give no reason why negotiations would be further prolonged..

In the treaty between Austria and Turkey it is added that Austria will not enter into any arrangement which shall not proceed on the assumption of the sovereign right of the Sultan and the integrity of his Empire. Austria will evacuate the Principalities on the conclusion of peace with the least possible delay.

The Baltic.—The bombardment of Bornersund began at 5 o'clock on the evening of the 21st; by 7 o'clock masked batteries were dismounted and abandoned, and at 10 o'clock the Russian Magazine was in a blaze. One account says the English lost three men; another says four killed and seven wounded. Sir Charles Napier's forces near Cronstadt consists of 12 screw line of battle ships, 9 frigates, 5 French ships of the line, 7 French corvettes. The London Times says it expected that Admiral Napier wished to offer battle to the Russian fleet, or to reconnoitre the defences of Cronstadt, rather than make a regular attack on that place.

For the World's Crisis.

The Pilgrim's Voyage.

As o'er the stormy sea of time
Our steady course we keep,
We're bound to Canaan's happy land,
Where none shall sigh or weep.
Our hope is like an anchor sure,
Which mariners do cast
To hold their gallant bark secure,
Until the storm be past.
Through many storms and tempests drear,
And dangers oft we've pass'd;
But now the heavenly land is near,
Our home 's in sight at last,—
And beacon lights on either hand,
How bright and clear they shine!
And thougn the coast is perilous,
Our Pilot is Divine.
Then let us heed our Pilot's voice,
And doubt his skill no more,
And soon, the weary toil-worn crew
Will land on Canaan's shore.
And then with all the blood-wash'd throng,
We'll walk the golden street,
With cheerful hearts and voices too,
Each other there to greet. M. G. E.

Obituary.

Bro. Job Holt, of North Hermon, died in the city of Bangor, June 17, aged 56 years. He was taken sick at eleven o'clock, P. M., and died at six o'clock the next morning, as was supposed of the billious colic. His distress was inexpressible, but he was calm and composed just before he fell asleep in Christ. He has left a dear companion, seven children and a large circle of friends to mourn his loss; but praise the Lord they do not mourn as those that have no hope. It is truly comforting to the widow, and the fatherless children, to believe that they shall see him immortal this year. He was a member of the Methodist church for 20 years; and for two years past, he has believed in the speedy coming of the Lord. For several months prior to his death his faith was strong in the coming of the Lord this year to raise the dead and change the living; and his faith was made perfect by works, by leaving his farm in the spring without being sowed or planted, and though he sleeps his farm proclaims that he was expecting the land promised to Abraham. His last testimony was, "the old ship is right and under good headway,—we shall anchor in 1854."

To those of the children who are not professedly ready to meet their Father in the kingdom, let me say, I hope you will get ready while mercy lingers, for it is your privilege to meet your father in a land where sickness, sorrow, pain and death will never come.

The mourners were comforted by a discourse from 1 Thess 4: 18, delivered by bro. N. Read. It was truly comforting to know that the time is near when friends will meet whom death has sundered here. May the grace of God comfort the afflicted family, and they all be gathered this year around the table of their Lord, at the Marriage supper of the Lamb. S. Bragg.

Died in East Otis, June 30th, sister Mary A. Benton, wife of Riley Benton, aged 39. She had been a member of the Methodist E. Church for a number of years, and had never left the communion; but last fall under the preaching of brother Grant she adopted the faith of the "Sleep of the Saints," destruction of the wicked, and the coming of Christ soon to restore the kingdom and reign on David's throne. She leaves a husband and two children to mourn her loss. She said just previous to her death—"I would rather wait till Jesus comes, but if I sleep it will be but short, my hope is in the Lord."

She sleeps, but soon the trump
Will rouse her from her bed;
Not long will be her slumbers there
Among the lowly dead.

Nancy M. Henry.

Deceased in East Granville, April 18, sister Mary M. Pheeland, wife of Lorenzo Pheeland, aged 29. She died in the faith, and is resting in hope.

And in the morn all bright
And glorious she'll arise,—
And hail with joy her coming king
Descending from the skies.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige and save us immense labor and perplexity if they will strictly adhere to the following rules:

1. Over all communications designed to be published write, For the World's Crisis.

2. Over all communications not designed for the public write, Private.

3. At the head of all letters write the date, never failing to give the STATE, and also County, if written from the Middle, Western or Southern States.

4. Write all orders for the paper or for books on a page by itself, beginning thus, Order for the Crisis, or, Order for books, as the case may be.

5. At the close of each letter containing money write the amount, and to whom it is to be credited.

6. Be careful to write names and P. O. addresses in a legible hand.

7. In returning papers write on the paper the name and P. O. address of the person to whom it had been sent.

8. In preparing matter for the Crisis we hope our correspondents will adopt, as the most important and indispensible of all rules, the practice of commending the subject to God, praying fervently for light to be reflected on the position of the Church, and for heavenly manna to feed and nurture the little flock unto eternal life—also that sinners may be induced to flee from impending wrath, and take refuge in the ark before the deluge takes them all away.

9. Let the letters and communications be carefully read over, corrected, and, if need be re-written, punctuated and prepared for the press, so far as the writer has ability so to do. If, however, the writer does not understand punctuation, &c., the Editor is just as willing, and if possible more so, to serve the humblest member of the flock in bringing his or her sentiments and feelings before the public, as those who have been favored with higher educational advantages, provided only they write under the influence of the Spirit of God.

jection to remain in the service for a consideration; consequently those who could afford to pay 600 florins to the Government chest might reckon with tolerable security on being free from military service.

But this year the levy will amount, according to the official documents published, to 27,478, and as no soldiers are allowed to return home, it is impossible to find substitutes for less than 8,000f., and then with difficulty. The sum is, of course, beyond the means of the former class, and their dismay is described as pitiable, as the whole family is made responsible in case the member liable to the conscription should not be forthcoming, which has, it appears, not unfrequently been the case.

Extract from Kossuth's Speech at the Music Hall.

Austria is so much the irreconcilable enemy of Turkey, that if there be a man here who doubts that she would this day gladly share in her partition,—he is worthy a mad-house.

If you can find in England one statesman, who is not convinced that Austria is, and always will be found perfectly ready to share in a partition of Turkey, if she can arrive at it—if you find only one such man all over England, then—well, I don't know what to say, it is so absurd. Only remember the secret Seymour correspondence which made such a noise, though there was nothing new in it to thinking men. What is it, the Czar has answered, when asked whether Austria would go in for a partition of Turkey? Why, he answered, that is as much as if you would ask him whether he (the Czar) himself would go in for it. This was the meaning, though these were not the precise words. Of course it is quite as much. Why, in the name of common sense, how can England and France commit the enormous, unheard-of blunder, to force such a dangerous ally upon poor Turkey, and to allow him to occupy her provinces? (Loud cheers.) Upon honor and conscience I give it to you, not as an opinion, but as a positive fact, that all Turkish statesmen, from the highest to the lowest, are extremely afraid of the very idea of Austrian friendship.—You may find, in the great Divan, partizans of every imaginable idea, perhaps even of Russia; but not one single partizan of Austrian friendship will you find either in the Divan or amongst the Turkish people, or even amongst the Christian population of Turkey; all of them agree in what the Servian Government declared so emphatically—that Austria is hated by all of them as the personification of a grasping ambition, endeavoring to exercise the most egotistical influence in Turkey. Indeed, it is but barking at the prey, ready to fall upon. And really, how could Turkey do otherwise but be afraid of the alliance with Austria? It knows her nature, it knows her hereditary ambition, it knows her partitioning aspirations, and besides, it knows that Austria entering Turkey as an ally, will arouse all the Christian population of Turkey against herself, and consequently in this case, against Turkey, as the Servian Government declared it officially to the Sublime Porte. (Renewed cheers.)

Why, in the name of good faith and common sense, I ask, how can England and France think to force such an alliance upon Turkey, and drive her into confusion and internal dissolution, all the while pretending to be tenderly careful of her independence and integrity? (Hear, hear.) Further, (and this is again an essential consideration) at entering into alliances, the most ordinary common sense suggests as an imperative condition, that he whom you take for your ally, should agree with you in will and purpose; his object must be the same as yours. If that be not the case, then there is no real alliance—there is division and difference. Now, I would ask you has your Government, with all its infinite submission, come at least so far as to make Austria agree with you in purpose and object? No, a thousand times no. Austria, though she never had the slightest objection through all history to lie and to swear false oaths, did, in this case, not even take the pains to belie you—she dared not go so far from fear to offend the Czar. (Vehement applause.) She told you openly, clearly, that she does not join you in your object of disarming the ambition of Russia, by taking material guarantees against her future encroachments upon Turkey: all in what she would join is, that the Czar should go home this time. Of course, she does desire so much.—Why? Is it from any solicitude for Turkey which she would like to partition rather to-day than to-morrow? No, it is from mere fear that this war in the immediate neighborhood of Hungary, could possibly endanger the duration of her despotic oppression of nations whom she deprived of their national existence. That is the case. You desire to reduce the overwhelming preponderance of Russia—this is your object; in this object Austria does not join you, but she accepts your co-operation to make her own despotism secure. In what manner do you co-operate? Why, you co-operate because by forcing the alliance of Austria upon Turkey, you force her not to take the Polish and Hungarian nations by the hand; which would have saved Turkey, and also have re-constructed Poland and Hungary. Thus do you co-operate to make Austrian despotism sure. Now, if you accept this situation, am I not right in saying, that, from complacency to Austria you have changed the character and the bearing of the war; you are no more fighting for the future security of Turkey, nor for the reduction of Russia's preponderance, but you are fighting for the security of Austrian despotism. Now, I conjure you by the All-seeing eye, is that your object?—is that your aim? You say no; but if such be the object with the Government of England, let it at least be manly acknowledged; let public opinion not be misguided; let us not hear the boast of fighting for the freedom and independence of Europe, because that is not true; let those sacred words not be profaned by lip-worship. (Loud cheers.)

The fact, however, that during the repeated desperate assaults, nearly all the commanding officers were wounded and disabled—Pashkiewitch, Schilders, whose leg has since been amputated, Gorchakoff, Luders and Orloff who was shot through the eye, clearly proves that the Russians were under orders, not merely to take the place at any cost, but to take it within a certain fixed time. Indeed the whole was conducted on their part in a manner which reminds us more of the barbarian method of carrying the cities of Koordistan by Timour Tamerlane, than of the proceedings of regular modern warfare. On the other hand, it is evident that the heroic and able defence of Silistria created equal surprise with the allied powers and the Ottoman Divan. Our readers may remember that about six weeks ago the allied commanders met at Varna, that they discovered that the Balkan line formed the natural defence of Turkey, and that now many of the British journals not only confess, but glory in the avowal, that Silistria was not relieved by a single French or English soldier. Lastly, it cannot be denied that Silistria was a point of great military importance, that the fate of this fortress decided the fate of this campaign, and that with the abandonment of its siege and the sudden retreat of the Russians upon the Pruth the whole of the Russian conquests of territory made this year as well as the last are lost.

Still it must be said that our English contemporaries, many of them, greatly exaggerate the extent of the present Muscovite reverses. It certainly requires a high degree of credulity to believe that the sortie made by the garrison of Silistria on June 13, and the succor of 2,000 men they are said to have received from Omer Pasha, resulted in the total defeat of Russians, and forced 90,000 to 100,000 men to fly before 15,000. The sudden retreat of the Russians is, so far as we can judge, quite as mysterious as their sudden attack. It is only to be explained by a previous understanding with Austria, involving the occupation of the Principalities by Austrian troops. Under these circumstances, the following passage which we find in a letter of The Morning Chronicle's Constantinople correspondent, revealing this plot on June 10, as early as four days before the conclusion of the Austro-Turkish treaty, is of a peculiarly interesting character:

"The Turks think that diplomacy is playing with them, and that it is their intention to allow Silistria to fall into the hands of Russia. Those suspicions receive confirmation from the news that has been received here of the preparation of a new protocol at Vienna, in which the fall of Silistria is, I learn, spoken of as if it were accomplished; and, the military honor of Russia being satisfied, Austria would consider the time to have arrived for her armed intervention to bring about an arrangement by the means of her co-operation—occupying the Danubian Principalities, which would be evacuated by the armies of Russia."

According to this, if the Russians had taken Silistria in due time, all would have been right. But though they did not succeed in satisfying the military honor of the Czar, they must, according to the compromise with Austria, beat back in a somewhat inglorious manner. The Russians receding behind the Pruth, the Austrians advance up to that river, and thus place themselves between the Muscovites and the Turks and their allies. In this position they are arbiters of the quarrel, preventing both parties from moving forward. If we look at the relative strength of the Russians before Silistria and in Bulgaria, now on their retreat behind the Pruth, and of the allied armies as far as they can, thanks to their ingenious arrangements, be thrown at all into the balance, it is plainly seen that, with even with the best intentions, the latter would not be capable of baffling this combination of Austria with Russia.

The Russian forces employed against Turkey and the allies on the European shores of the Black Sea, amount to thirteen divisions of infantry, three of the third, three of the fourth, one of the fifth, three of the sixth army corps, and three reserve divisions. Besides these, the third, fourth, fifth and sixth divisions of light cavalry, and the third, fourth and fifth divisions of artillery. These troops, making up nearly one-half of the grand army of operations, should amount, according to the official statements, to 16,000 men per division of infantry, 5,000 per division of cavalry, and 160 guns per division of artillery; altogether something like 250,000 to 260,000 men, inclusive of train and camp followers. But, if we measure the strength of a Russian army by what it actually was in the Hungarian war, we cannot estimate a division of Russian infantry at more than 13,000 to 14,000 men, and the cavalry and artillery must be reduced in proportion. The actual forces, then, which the Russians have successively marched into the Principalities would be reduced to about 210,000 men, and even from this number must be deducted, on account of loss in battle and by sickness, at least 20,000 to 25,000 more. Recollecting the ravages made by the marsh-fever in the ranks of the Russian army during 1828-29, and comparing the letters of a Russian surgeon in the Vienna Medical Journal, we cannot consider a loss of from eight to ten per cent. upon the total of the army as exaggerated. Thus about 180,000 Russians are left as the disposable number of their army.

OPERATIONS OF ADMIRAL PLUMRIDGE IN THE GULF OF BOTHNIA. The squadron of steam frigates, Leopard, Odin, Valorous, and Vulture, under Admiral Plumridge, have sunk, burned, or otherwise destroyed fifty ships, from the Aland group of islands, on the South, to Tornea, at the extreme North of the Gulf of Bothnia. The public stores and magazines of Uleaborg, Brahestad, and Tornea, have been fired. Sixteen ships in first-mentioned port, loaded with stores, tar and wood, and others on the stocks, became the prey of one grand conflagration.

The inhabitants hoped, by offering supplies, that they might succeed in ransoming those places. They were polite and civil. The supplies which were taken were paid for immediately. The inhabitants of Tornea baked bread for three days for the ships, and piled up the barracks, which they offered to burn. The bread was paid for, but the orders against the enemy were fully carried out, and the work of destruction went on. By those operations, it is estimated that a loss of about £400,000 has been inflicted.

In giving an account of an attack on Gamla Thareby, on the Gulf of Bothnia, the Traveller says:—

The action was maintained for one hour and a quarter, at the end of which time, out of the two hundred and thirty men engaged, fifty-four officers and men were killed, wounded, and missing, together with the paddle-box boat mentioned, and its twenty-four pounder howitzer. Thus about one-fourth of the force employed were cut down; Lieut. M. W. Carrington, Mr. Charles F. H. Montague, mate, and Mr. Althorpe, midshipman, belonging to the Odin, were killed; Lieut. A. O. L. Lewis, R. M., and a naval cadet of the same ship, were wounded—the former having been struck in the face by a musket or Minie ball. Mr. H. Murphy and twenty-seven seamen and marines are missing in the paddle-box boat of the Vulture—most of whom, if not all, are supposed to have been killed.

THE AUSTRIAN OCCUPATION OF THE PRINCIPALITIES. It has already been stated that the entrance of Austrian troops into Wallachia is decided on. Count Coronini, with a first division, to be followed by a second, has orders to keep himself in readiness to descend the Danube as far as Giurgevo. M. de Bruck has been ordered to put himself in communication with the Porte, and to come to an understanding respecting the political and military combinations that will ensue from the movement of the Austrian army. Col. Halek sets out for the headquarters of Omer Pasha, and has orders to communicate with the commanders of the French and English troops, but the cabinet of Vienna will only take its final resolution after receiving the reply of the cabinet of St. Petersburg to its last summons.

Col. Manteuffel would arrive at St. Petersburg on the 19th or 20th of June. Nothing would be done before the delivery of the Prussian note, and the reply of the Emperor Nicholas could not be known at Vienna before the beginning of July.

The total strength of the Austrian army will amount, a fortnight hence, to 300,000 men, reaching on a line from the frontiers of Dalmatia, to those of the Bukowina. Gen. Hess, the commander-in-chief, is a man of ability, and enjoys the confidence of the army.

RIOT AT MANCHESTER, N. H. On Monday night a number of Irish lads, at the lower end of Elm street, kindled bonfires, which were twice extinguished by the authorities. In passing by this spot, some Americans were assailed with insulting speeches, brick bats and other missiles [illegible] one hundred Irish engaged in the assault. About midnight they attacked the building of Marshall & Cheney, breaking the windows, and doing other damage, and also, without provocation, knocked down and seriously hurt Mr. Charles Lee. The report was now carried through the city, that Lee and another man was killed, when a mob of Americans was formed, who rushed indiscriminately upon the Irish settlements, breaking the doors and windows of fifteen houses. They then started for the Catholic church, breaking in the windows, which were of beautiful stained glass, and doing damage to the amount of six hundred dollars. At this time, John H. Maynard, Esq., appeared, and influenced the mob to desist, which they did for the time, but an effort was made on Wednesday evening to form another mob, for renewed assaults on the Irish, the ring leaders in which were arrested. The mayor appeared and exhorted all persons to keep the peace.—[Her. Gos. Lib.

☞ From Babylon also very interesting accounts have been received from Major Rawlinson, in the first place narrating the progress of his own exhumations, and in the next, describing some tablets of cuneiform character, discovered in the earliest diggings of the new Assyrian Association, and sent to him from the locality about 90 miles to the south of Babylon, where the ruins of a city, apparently equal, or superior, in extent to Nineveh, now offer themselves for the operations of the society. Here again a great and extraordinary field is opened for inquiry. The inscriptions contain the names of Selenius and Antiochus, successors of Alexander the Great, and there seems to be little doubt that the monuments disinterred from this site will furnish the most important facts of the Grecian wars in Asia, of which so little except generalities is known.—Truly we may be led to the belief that the secrets of the old world are about to be revealed in a manner quite unhoped for till the present era.

CORRECTION. In last week's Crisis there was an expression over the head of foreign news, taken from another paper, which was not noticed at the time, or it would not have been published. It was this, "prospect of a terminus to the war." We have no idea that peace will ever reign again among the nations, until the administration of "the Prince of peace" begins.

Later from Europe.

Change in the Aspect of the War.

By the Asia at New York, July 12, we have three days later advices from Europe—dates to the 1st inst. There would be a union of the allied army at Varna in a few days. Negotiations were still active. Amicable relations between Turkey and Greece would soon be restored. Odessa was no longer blockaded. Austria had raised a new loan of 350,000,000. The markets complained of a depression in prices.—The Czar was on his way to the Crimea.

Austria is ready to march 200,000 troops into the Principalities, thus interposing between the combatants and preventing further actual hostilities in that quarter. Austria has not yet received the Czar's official reply, and cannot probably before July 3d, and will not act decisively until received. The action of Austria is in accordance with the convention between herself individually and the Porte.

The whole Anglo French force is now at Varna, preparing, it is supposed, for an expedition under Gen. St. Arnaud, in person, into the Crimea.

The whole of the Russian army of occupation, is falling back in good order with all its stores on the pruth. The Garrison of Ismail Gallaty &c., was already on march to the Crimea, and also the disposable force will immediately follow, as that is supposed to be the next battlefield.

On the 20th and 23d of June, the Turkish vanguard of 25,000 men attacked the rear guard of the Russians, and drove it beyond the Trajan Wall.

Despatches are stated to have been received from St. Petersburgh, containing the Russian answer to the Austrian requisition. Well informed persons believe that they give no reason why negotiations would be further prolonged..

In the treaty between Austria and Turkey it is added that Austria will not enter into any arrangement which shall not proceed on the assumption of the sovereign right of the Sultan and the integrity of his Empire. Austria will evacuate the Principalities on the conclusion of peace with the least possible delay.

The Baltic.—The bombardment of Bornersund began at 5 o'clock on the evening of the 21st; by 7 o'clock masked batteries were dismounted and abandoned, and at 10 o'clock the Russian Magazine was in a blaze. One account says the English lost three men; another says four killed and seven wounded. Sir Charles Napier's forces near Cronstadt consists of 12 screw line of battle ships, 9 frigates, 5 French ships of the line, 7 French corvettes. The London Times says it expected that Admiral Napier wished to offer battle to the Russian fleet, or to reconnoitre the defences of Cronstadt, rather than make a regular attack on that place.

For the World's Crisis.

The Pilgrim's Voyage.

As o'er the stormy sea of time
Our steady course we keep,
We're bound to Canaan's happy land,
Where none shall sigh or weep.
Our hope is like an anchor sure,
Which mariners do cast
To hold their gallant bark secure,
Until the storm be past.
Through many storms and tempests drear,
And dangers oft we've pass'd;
But now the heavenly land is near,
Our home 's in sight at last,—
And beacon lights on either hand,
How bright and clear they shine!
And though the coast is perilous,
Our Pilot is Divine.
Then let us heed our Pilot's voice,
And doubt his skill no more,
And soon, the weary toil-worn crew
Will land on Canaan's shore.
And then with all the blood-wash'd throng,
We'll walk the golden street,
With cheerful hearts and voices too,
Each other there to greet.

Obituary.

Bro. Job Holt, of North Hermon, died in the city of Bangor, June 17, aged 56 years. He was taken sick at eleven o'clock, P. M., and died at six o'clock the next morning, as was supposed of the bilious colic. His disease was [illegible] Christ. He has left a dear companion, seven children and a large circle of friends to mourn his loss; but praise the Lord, they do not mourn as those that have no hope. It is truly comforting to the widow, and the fatherless children, to believe that they shall see him immortal this year. He was a member of the Methodist church for 20 years; and for two years past, he has believed in the speedy coming of the Lord. For several months prior to his death his faith was strong in the coming of the Lord this year to raise the dead and change the living; and his faith was made perfect by works, by leaving his farm in the spring without being sowed or planted, and though he sleeps his farm proclaims that he was expecting the land promised to Abraham. His last testimony was, "the old ship is right and under good headway,—we shall anchor in 1854."

To those of the children who are not professedly ready to meet their Father in the kingdom, let me say, I hope you will get ready while mercy lingers, for it is your privilege to meet your father in a land where sickness, sorrow, pain and death will never come.

The mourners were comforted by a discourse from 1 Thess 4: 18, delivered by bro. N. Read. It was truly comforting to know that the time is near when friends will meet whom death has sundered here. May the grace of God comfort the afflicted family, and they all be gathered this year around the table of their Lord, at the Marriage supper of the Lamb.

S. BRAGG.

Died in East Otis, June 30th, sister Mary A. Benton, wife of Riley Benton, aged 39. She had been a member of the Methodist E. Church for a number of years, and had never left the community; but last fall under the preaching of brother Grant she adopted the faith of the "Sleep of the Saints," destruction of the wicked, and the coming of Christ soon to restore the kingdom and reign on David's throne. She leaves a husband and two children to mourn her loss. She said just previous to her death—"I would rather wait till Jesus comes, but if I sleep it will be but short, my hope is in the Lord."

She sleeps, but soon the trump
Will rouse her from her bed;
Not long will be her slumbers there
Among the lowly dead.

NANCY M. HENRY.

Deceased in East Granville, April 18, sister Mary M. Pheeland, wife of Lorenzo Pheeland, aged 28. She died in the faith, and is resting in hope.

And in the morn all bright
And glorious she'll arise,—
And hail with joy her coming king
Descending from the skies.

3. At the head of all letters write the date, never failing to give the STATE, and also County, if written from the Middle, Western or Southern States.

4. Write all orders for the paper or for books on a page by itself, beginning thus, Order for the Crisis, or, Order for books, as the case may be.

5. At the close of each letter containing money write the amount, and to whom it is to be credited.

6. Be careful to write names and P. O. addresses in a legible hand.

7. In returning papers write on the paper the name and P. O. address of the person to whom it had been sent.

8. In preparing matter for the Crisis we hope our correspondents will adopt, as the most important and indispensible of all rules, the practice of commending the subject to God, praying fervently for light to be reflected on the position of the Church, and for heavenly manna to feed and nurture the little flock unto eternal life—also that sinners may be induced to flee from impending wrath, and take refuge in the ark before the deluge takes them all away.

9. Let the letters and communications be carefully read over, corrected, and, if need be re-written, punctuated and prepared for the press, so far as the writer has ability so to do. If, however, the writer does not understand punctuation, &c., the Editor is just as willing, and if possible more so, to serve the humblest member of the flock in bringing his or her sentiments and feelings before the public, as those who have been favored with higher educational advantages, provided only they write under the influence of the Spirit of God.

For the World's Crisis.

"Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."—Matt. 6: 21.

I seek not a home in this dark world of woes,
Where earth's sweetest chalice with poison o'erflows;
Where death revels freely on frail mortal bloom,
Selecting the dearest and best for the tomb.

I ask not a treasure in this bankrupt state,
With no power to hold and no skill to create;
Claims higher than mine render all insecure,
And the whirlwind may dash, or the fire may devour.

I'd not purchase honor, the price is too dear,
Did I wish to secure it for one fleeting hour;
Oh no, I'd not barter my conscience and peace,
And a title in Christ, for a false, meteor bliss.

The home that I seek is unfading and pure,
Where the rose blossoms sweet on the evergreen shore;
And death holds no sway in that glorious land,
And severs no hearts in that blood ransomed band.

The treasure I seek is where gold cannot rust,
Where thieves cannot enter, my riches I'll trust;
All riches, all honors below, I count loss,
But the riches of faith, and reproach of the cross.

Yes, I would invest, in a safe bank above,
A portion of kindness, obedience and love,
A servant unprofitable still I would feel,
For no ransom but Christ's blood my pardon can seal.

Soon, soon will probation and trials be o'er,
The righteous rewarded to suffer no more;
And I find by the will, I've examined with care,
That my title is good to that treasure this year.

VESTA N. CUDWORTH.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WEST WINSTED, July 8, 1854.

Dear Bro. Merriam:—I believe we are almost home, and that soon we shall see the King in his beauty. Our better prospects are continually brightening, as we approach the land of rest, where all is joy and peace.

Praise the Lord for the light and truth that are spreading in every direction, causing sinners to tremble, and saints to rejoice.

"O 'twill be but a little longer,
We must these many woes endure,
Then let our faith and hope be stronger,
Our Father's promise still is sure."

Perhaps some may be interested to learn the incidents of my pilgrimage for the last few weeks. Well, after leaving Waterbury, the last place mentioned in my former epistle, I went to Bridgeport, Ct., and commenced meetings in Baylies' large hall, and although the travelling was bad, we had it well filled before the close of our meetings, and deep interest was manifested to hear on the subject of the Second Advent.

Our communion season, at the close of the last meeting Sabbath evening, was a refreshing season.

Six members of the M. E. Church were baptized in the faith of soon seeing Jesus in the clouds of heaven, believing that without a resurrection the dead will never know any thing.

From Bridgeport, I went to Merwinsville, on the Housatonic Rail Road, a place where prejudice and superstition sit enthroned. We were kindly entertained at Mr Merwin's excellent Rail Road house. Some inquired the way to eternal life, and seemed resolved to become followers of Jesus, that they might be ready to meet him at his coming. Bro. Levi is a faithful soul, and doing what he can to scatter the truth and light in the place.

My next appointment was at Lanesville, where we had some very interesting meetings during the great flood. Eight were baptized, and went on their way rejoicing in the hope of soon seeing Jesus in all his glory. Sabbath evening we sat down around the table at Bro. Way's to commemorate the sufferings of our Savior, and it was truly a heavenly season, as we looked forward to the marriage supper of the Lamb so soon to be celebrated.

May 7th, we commenced meetings in Fairhaven, Mass., and continued eight days. The series of meetings was one the best, if not the best, that I have enjoyed in my eleven year's pilgrimage. We held meetings three times a day in a large hall well filled with people deeply interested in the truth. Some of the best members of the churches embraced the truths we preach, and eight were baptized, showing their faith in the burial and resurrection of Christ. Sabbath day Bro. Hemenway preached twice to large congregations, and in the evening some seventy or eighty sat down to the table of the Lord's Supper, and truly we had a refreshing from the Lord. It was a season long to be remembered. The love feast Sabbath morning was one of the most heavenly seasons I ever enjoyed. The work is still going on in that place. O praise the Lord for his wonderful works unto the children of men.

Thursday, May 18, I met Bro. H. V. Davis at Plymouth, Mass. where we continued meetings for one week. Five were baptized near where the Pilgrims landed in 1620. Our meetings at Plymouth, [illegible] interesting character. All seemed to be in perfect union with each other, and loving the appearing of Jesus, with the expectation of seeing him this year. We closed our meetings by commemorating the death and sufferings of our Lord in company with some sixty or seventy of his followers. It was a blessed time, that will not be easily forgotten.

June 1st. Commenced a series of meetings in West Winsted, and continued them one week in company with Bro. Barker. Many of our best and first citizens became deeply interested in the truths presented, and treated the subject with becoming respect. Eight were baptized.

I need not speak of our excellent meeting at Westfield, as our Brethren here learned that the good Lord was pleased to make it a feast indeed.

Thursday, June 22. Commenced meetings at North Canton, Ct., where the Lord was pleased to bless us, and four were baptized, who expect to see Jesus this year.

Monday, 26th June, the Florida Camp-Meeting began on the top of the Green Mountains in a beautiful grove. This was the best meeting, I think, that I ever attended. One wicked backslider came on to the ground in company with others to break up the meeting, and before the meetings closed he was baptized into Jesus, rejoicing in the hope of seeing the Lord this year. Seven others were baptized by Bro. H. Pratt, who has labored faithfully in the region of the Camp Meeting, and seen a happy company of pilgrims start for the heavenly Canaan, who expect to get home this year. Some of the best members of the M. E. Church have seen the light, and are rejoicing in the same blessed hope of going home before another year rolls around. Yes, praise the Lord, my faith is growing stronger, that before the 19th of next May we shall see Jesus.

Your Brother in Jesus,
M. GRANT.

WARE, July 4th, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I am a pilgrim and stranger striving to gain that better country that God's children anciently discovered; and by God's grace I expect to arrive there this year. I know, according to the testimony, that it is a blessed HEAVENLY land; and my whole soul is absorbed in the contemplation of getting there myself, and trying to induce others to go likewise. But while I urge them to go, I must inform them of the cost; and I find but few that are willing to pay the price; for it will cost them all, whether they possess little or much. I thank the Lord that I ever started on this journey. It is a good way although rough and thorny, and so narrow that we can carry nothing with us; yet we can travel safely if we take heed to our steps and not turn out on either side. But we see many that murmur and complain because the way is so narrow that they cannot carry the rubbish of this world with them, and so rough and thorny that it is crossing to their selfish desires; therefore we see them turning out of the way, falling on either side of us; and we are led to exclaim, who will reach the promised land? But, thank the Lord, we find some that counted the cost before they started, and are intent on gaining the city; they will follow the track, although they suffer from the roughness of the path, and the prickling thorns. Glory to God, they cannot be induced to turn out of the way, although their companions turn back; yet they will pursue their journey, for their heart is set on the durable riches they will gain at the end.

I have had some good seasons since I left Lowell, and some trials; but it is all good. We have no reason to expect a smooth sea as we are nearing the harbor. We must encounter dangers and perils, endure hardness as good soldiers, labor and toil. But, thank the Lord, there remains a rest for the weary pilgrim. It rejoices my heart that in a few weeks we shall gain it if faithful. How cheering, how consoling to the tried and tempted child of God! The home of the blessed. Ah, how sweet—glory to God! "We're going home in fifty four." Hallelujah to God and the Lamb forever. This hope is like an anchor to our souls, both sure and steadfast. Yes, it is sure, there is no disappointment here, we are on the track of truth. The vessel will make the port this year, and we shall go into the marriage supper of the Lamb. If we constitute the bride, we shall make ourselves ready.—God help us to examine ourselves and see if we have the characteristics of the bride according to the word. We have the rule; we can try ourselves by it. God help us to be careful in this matter, there is much pending here. Eternal life will be gained or lost in a very short time. O God, help us to realize these things. Probationary time is almost out. What we do must be done quickly; God nerve us up to the work. The preparation time is almost over. The company that will gain the everlasting kingdom will be a pure class; without spot or wrinkle. O God, search our hearts, is my prayer. May we live out our faith, and clear our skirts of the blood of our fellow beings. God requires more of us, who believe that Jesus is coming this year, than of any other class. O for corresponding action. We see many who profess to believe that the Lord is coming this year, and yet move on like the world. I believe that God abhors such mockery. It injures the cause of God; and it seems to me that this is the class that will knock for admittance when the door is closed against them.

O awful thought; and is it so?
Must all the world the harvest know?
Is every one a wheat or tare?
Me for that harvest, Lord, prepare.

Yours, in expectation of seeing Jesus this year,
MARY STEARNS.

BLANDFORD, Mass., June 26, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I wish to tell you how very clear the light shines upon my path since I came from the Tent Meeting in Westfield. The light has been streaming, as it were, "from the court of Glory" on the prophetic numbers, till they seem almost like burnished gold; so clear, SO BRIGHT, SO GLORIOUS. O that the world could see it as I do. Almost home, pilgrim? Yes, almost home. Said a friend to me, one day, not long ago, I think you place too much dependence on the Lord's coming this year. I overheard, said he, two young converts in conversation, not long since, they were telling their trials to each other; said one to the other, "Well, Sister, try and hold out faithful a little while longer, till the Lord comes, for 'tis but a little while." "Now," said he, "I think it was a wrong inducement." Well, I do not think so, do you, Brother? Let me illustrate it. Suppose I were a long distance from home, and the way were like that of "Christian's," on the right hand a very deep ditch, and on the left a very dangerous quag, toilsome and rough in the extreme, and dark withal, but not so dark but that I could see to read the inscriptions upon the guideboards. Well, I have a little one with me, too young to read distinctly, and she grows weary and tired. "Oh, Mother," says she, "I am so tired, I think I can hold out but a little longer." Try, darling, I say, and then tell her how glad Father will be to see us safe home; and she cheers up for a while. But again weariness steals over her, and she has almost given up.—The way is hard and weary, Mother. I know it, darling, but we are almost home now. How do you know, Mother? O, we have passed the last mile stone; yes, and now I see the light streaming from the windows, and I hear Father's voice calling to us, as he holds out a lantern.—Oh, Mother, I am so glad, says the little one, and her tired limbs gain new elasticity; and instead of dragging along so heavily, she leaves my hand and goes bounding forward in the light of the Father's lantern, till she reaches his arms.

Was it wrong to cheer the little one along? I know you will say, no. We will cheer them on, Brother; we are almost home; we can see the light from Father's big lantern, so to speak; for his word is our lamp. We have passed the last mile stone, we can almost count the steps now; and the little ones that cannot see it without, we will hold them up in our arms, and say, see there, do you see that house twelve stories high, built of precious stones, and pearls, with its floors of pure gold? Yes, Oh yes, I see that. Well, that is Father's house. Cheer up, Brother, though we are poor and despised by the world, we have a Father that is rich, and our oldest Brother is a Prince. We are rich, heirs of a kingdom that shall stand forever.

"Cheer up, cheer up, the light breaks o'er thee;
Thy name is graven on the throne"

Your Sister, looking for the glorious appearing of Jesus, N. M. HENRY.

CINCINNATI, O., June 22, 1854.

Dear Brother in Christ:—Inclosed I send you one dollar, and one dollar for Brother R. Thomson for the Crisis, and we wish to say that we appreciate the truth it contains, and having a desire to say a few words to the Brothers and Sisters also, and as I have no scripture subject to present, I will give a little of my own experience for the encouragement of those who are soon to be gathered from the four winds. I was a member of the Presbyterian Church, and my great desire was to be prepared and live to see the Millennium begin; and when I heard the midnight cry in '43, "behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him," I thought it good news, and with joy obeyed, believing that I should soon see Jesus and be made like him; and from that time my prayer was for God to prepare me and my family for the event. I could not think of leaving them; but as the tenth day of the seventh month drew near, and Brother Storr's flat rock was presented to me, I knew I had a work to do to give up all I held dear. The Lord heard my prayer and answered it; and I was able to say, through his power and mercy, thy will be done. I gave up my family and the world, and arrived at the flat rock, and here I am yet. The world has no charm to lure me back, nor do I want the Lord to delay his coming because my family is not ready, and when storms come and waves rise high, it makes me pray the more earnestly that I may hold out to the end; for only such shall be saved. But where is the company that went with me? I do not know where to find them; there are only a few left, which is a grief to me, although it was to be so; only one half of those that the midnight cry roused from their slumbers went in, and the other half was shut out. Solemn thought. Since then the Herald, Advocate and Watchman have been holding up their lights to help us to see that we might get the first glimpse of the steamer, as she comes in sight. They have been a comfort to me; and when their views to my mind have been in accordance with scripture I have with joy received them: and now comes the Crisis to give us the last warning; and with the signs of the times we can see we are almost there. I expect the captain of our salvation will soon say, "come up higher;" and I hope it will be this year. I have believed that we should never see seventy-five full years on this side of the darkening of the sun before the Savior would appear, and still believe it. If this is the year, we are in the day of the Lord that Peter speaks of, that shall come as a thief in the night, in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise. On whom will it come as a thief? Not on those who are looking for him, certainly; for Paul says the Brethren are not in darkness about that day. Matthew says immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened; so we may look with certainty before the end of another year.

From your unworthy Sister in Christ,
SARAH B. SAXTON.

NEW HARTFORD, April 29, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I would like to communicate a few lines to the Brethren and Sisters scattered abroad. The Crisis comes weekly laden with truths that are welcome to one who has been deprived of the privilege of meeting with the children of God. Over five years I have been confined to my bed most of the time, unable to converse but little, and that in a whisper. Though yet confined to my bed, and only able to write a few words at a time with my pencil, (a friend transcribes for me,) I felt desirous of addressing a few lines to the dear flock of God with whom I hope soon to be associated, possessing strength sufficient to help swell that grand chorus of praise "where the music will be like the voice of many waters and as the voice of mighty thunderings!" "There the inhabitant shall no more say, I am sick"—and there shall be no more sorrow, either mental or physical, but "these vile bodies will be fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body."

In view of these good and glorious things, so soon to be given to the little flock, I say give me ALL my evil things in this life. Yes, I prefer affliction with the children of God now, rather than the pleasures of sin for a season. I expect in a few weeks, or months at most, our trials will be over, "the righteous saved, the wicked damned, and God's eternal government approved." In view of this, "what manner of persons ought we to be" in our conversation and deportment, being at all times what Christ said His disciples would be, "lights to the world, salt of the earth," &c. Let us not fear to venture out on the word of God, and let the world know we are actually waiting for the revelation of the Son of God! so that when he shall be seen descending on his azure throne, we may be ready to exclaim, "lo this is our God, we have waited for him." Let us count nothing dear to ourselves, either our reputation or worldly goods; but let us take the spoiling of these JOYFULLY, and patiently wait for durable riches and HONOR which will be conferred on us at the appearing of Jesus Christ!—And now, my dear Brethren and Sisters, I humbly ask you to pray, that my present affliction may be sanctified to me, that it may work out for me a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; and that, if consistent with the Divine Will, I may be speedily restored to health; if not that I may with patience wait until the last great change. May the richest of heaven's blessings rest on all that are loving and waiting for the King of kings, is the prayer of your unworthy Sister in tribulation,

NANCY S. HARRIS.

PROPHETIC PERIODS.—1260, 1290, 1335 Years of Daniel and John.

The daily sacrifice taken away, and the Abomination of Desolation set up, or the Saints given unto the hand of the Little Horn. 519.

1260 years of tribulation.—Rev. 11: 2, 3, and 12: 6, 14, and 13: 5. The sun darkened May 19, 1780, to show its termination. 1779.

1290 years, or time times and the dividing of time—or time times and a part, in which the TIMES and LAWS are in the hands of the Little Horn. 1809. Napoleon takes away the civil power of the Little Horn.

Fall of the Stars 1833.

1335 years, reaching from the setting up of the Abomination of Desolation, or the time when the Saints' times and laws were given into the hand of the Little Horn, to the end, when Daniel with all the Saints will stand in their lot.......1854.

THE END.

☞ The above Diagram is designed to illustrate the measurement of time from the rise of the little horn, with eyes and a mouth (the civil power of the Greek Empire, or Eastern Rome incorporated with the Ecclesiastical Power of the Papacy.—Dan. 7: 8) until the coming of Christ at the resurrection of the saints.

The 1290 years, or time, times and the dividing of time, (Dan 7: 25) measure the period during which the saints, times and laws were to be given into his hand—The period of the saint's tribulation, we understand, were shortened to 1260 years, (Rev. 12: 6, 14—11: 2 and 13: 5); but times and laws were to remain in his hand during 1290 years, extending 30 years beyond the 1260. "But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion to consume and destroy unto the end." 45 years from the close of the 1290 make 1335 years, when Daniel will stand in his lot, which must be at the resurrection of the saints.

Christ, speaking of this desolating power—the papacy—says, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened,"—which marks a point previous to which the saints were taken out of the hands of the little horn power. Thus we perceive that 1260 years of the 1335 ended prior to the 19th of May, 1780, when the sun was darkened. Add 75 years to 1260 and you have 1335 years, which must end before May 19th, 1855, according to the evidence from the darkening of the sun. But we have abundant historical evidence that the papal power, i. e. the abomination that maketh desolate, was set up in 519, hence the 1335 days (years) end in 1854, which brings the coming of the Lord and the resurrection of the saints the present year.

CLEMENTS, N. S., June 20, 1854.

Bro. Merriam:—I wish to say, through the Crisis, to the Brethren and Sisters scattered abroad, that I am still looking for the speedy coming of the Lord. The evidence is quite clear to my mind, that He will come this year to gather his ransomed ones home and give them the kingdom. Dear Brethren and Sisters, seeing the great day of the Lord is right at hand, "What manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for, and hasting unto the day of God," loving the appearing of the Lord, that we may be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless. We are living in an important age of the world, when we can, from the fulfilment of prophecy, and the signs of the times, look for the speedy return of our Master. The marshalling of the nations of the earth to the battle field bespeaks the great time of trouble; and the deliverance of God's saints is right at hand: what is done to get ready, or to get others ready must be done quickly. Let us all strive to do all we can for the salvation of our fellow men the little while that time remains, that we may hear the Master say to us, well done, good and faithful servants, enter ye into the joy of your Lord. There is some interest at Hillsburough on the subject of the Lord's speedy coming; some are looking for him this year. There have been a number of backsliders reclaimed, and a few converted during the Fall and Winter. I have baptized three since I returned. Hope they will endure to the end. Let us all remember that, "without holiness no man shall see the Lord." May we contend for that faith that "works by love, and purifies the heart, and overcomes the world." Amen.

Yours, looking for Jesus at the end of the 1335 days,
WM. M. INGHAM.

PLAINVILLE, ONONDAGA CO., N. Y., June 30, 1854.

Dear Bro. Merriam:—There is still a little company in this neighborhood that love to meet together and comfort one another with the "Christians Hope," which is made up of a number of "items," the prominent one, "the coming of the Lord." On it depends our "life," and "eternal home," which we believe we shall enter in a few months. Last Sabbath Bro. I. G. Smith, of Meredith, N. H., and Bro. T. Ford, of Concord, N. H., were with us. We had a good time. Two willing souls were buried by baptism; and at the close of the afternoon services, the Lord's Supper was administered. Fifty-three partook of the same. And my prayer is, that we may all so live as to set around the table of our Heavenly Father in the kingdom to come.

Yours, looking for redemption this year,
JOHN T. ONGLEY.

BIGELOW'S MILLS, LAPORTE CO., IND., June 30, 1854.

Dear Bro. Merriam:—Our Grove Meeting at Union Mills, Ind., was indeed one of interest and profit, although from the interesting and glowing description of it in the Crisis some might be led to over-estimate its influence on the community.—That influence however was good, and many were satisfied that we have the truth. During the continuance of the meeting ten were baptized into the faith of the gospel. I was exceedingly gratified to meet with Brethren Berrick, Couch, Bro. and Sister Eastman and Bro. Judkins from the East. Bro. Clark, too, formerly from the East, was present, and after he left, addressed a letter to Bro. Mansfield informing him that he believed the Lord would come this year. Bro. Hull also has embraced the faith, and Bro. Chaplin expressed his conviction of its truth. I formed a very agreeable acquaintance with Brethren Seymour and Stone from Michigan, who, though to them the argument was quite conclusive, did not commit themselves on time. We enjoyed a very precious season with the Brethren at Union Mills last Wednesday evening, at which time we commemorated the death and sufferings of our Lord, and anticipated his coming. About sixty Brethren and Sisters were present. It was one of the best seasons I ever enjoyed. And wishing to observe all that was enjoined upon us by our Savior, we followed his example in washing the saints' feet. John 13th ch.—The presence of the Lord was graciously manifested toward us on the occasion. O may the Lord aid us in doing right, preserve us from evil, and save us this year. Amen.

Yours in the truth,
JOHN HOWELL.

LEVANT, June 27th, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—It may not be amiss to give you a brief account of our Tent meeting in Madison, Me. This meeting commenced June 22d, under circumstances not so favorable as could be desired. There are but few in that community who are looking for the speedy return of the Nobleman, the majority being prejudiced against the views we entertain. However, we pitched the tent agreeably to appointment, trusting alone in Him who has said all things shall work together for good to them that love God. Our congregations were comparatively small until Saturday and Sunday, when the multitude came together. Judging from the appearance, while those prophecies were presented and explained, which cover the history of the Church from a given point down to the setting up of God's everlasting kingdom, and our position on the stream of time clearly defined, I should think a deep conviction was felt by many, that our position might prove to be correct in the end. I do believe that notwithstanding we did not realize all that victory we desired, the self-sacrificing labors of Brn. Cummings, Sunderland, Randall, and others, will not be in vain. Judging from outward circumstances and appearances, we are not always able to tell the amount of good we accomplish. Our next meeting is to be held in Levant, commencing tomorrow, June 28th. The brethren are gathering from different sections of the country, and we are expecting a glorious time.

Affectionately yours, looking for Jesus in '54.
A. ROSS.

"Behold I will make thee know what shall be in the last end of the indignation: for at the time appointed the end shall be." Daniel 8: 19. The angel in his explanation takes the prophet through Media, Persia, Grecia, and Grecia divided; to the king of fierce countenance that destroys the mighty and the holy people, and when this king stands up and becomes mighty, but not by his own power, the indignation commences, and it is upon the saints. See v. 12, also chap. 7: 25; chap. 11: 30–36. But the last end of the indignation will be upon the wicked. Chap. 8: v. 25, "But HE shall be broken without hand." Isaiah 34: 2, "For the indignation of the Lord is upon all nations, and his fury upon their armies; he hath utterly destroyed them; he hath delivered them to the slaughter."

In 1854 the Lord will bring his sons from afar and his daughters from the ends of the earth; hide them in their chambers for a little moment, until the indignation be over past. "He which testifieth these things saith, surely I come quickly; amen. Even so come Lord Jesus." More anon.

Scripture view of the Second Advent.

St. Paul was an Adventist, for in all his preaching he referred to the second coming of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ as the consummation of our hope; and furthermore, he believed in all things written, both in the law and in the prophets; a promise of the Savior, both of his first and second advent, and a hope of a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust, and a promise to the children of God that they shall inherit the earth: when the wicked are cut off they shall see it, (i. e. the land). Now I find written in the word of God that the word was made flesh, (John 1: 14), that he dwelt among us, that he died and was buried; that he rose again the third day, thus bringing life and immortality to light. Paul, in his teachings, gives the time when we shall obtain it. In 1 Cor. 15: 22, 23, we read, "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. Christ the first fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming. Then cometh the end," etc. Now there are but two Advents of Christ that I can find written in the law or in the prophets, and I do not find anything written there that tells me that Jesus comes at death, although it is preached from almost every pulpit at the present day, and by some of the most learned men in theology, thus making what Paul says true: "Ever learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth," (2 Tim. 3: 7.) But I do thank God, that He has given us a promise worth waiting for. Yes, glory be to God, what a blessed promise. O what a blessed hope to the child of God. It is something worth striving for. Paul says, "But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen: and if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain," (1 Cor. 15: 13, 14). Paul looked for the redemption of the body. Hear him, "and not only they, but ourselves also, which have the first fruits of the spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." If Paul were to preach thus at the present day the professed people of God would say that is a subject with which we have no concern; for we shall receive our reward at death. Let us see if Paul received his crown at death. We read in 2 Tim. 4: 7, 8, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." Now I take the position that if Christ appeared at Paul's death, then all those that were alive and loved the appearing of the Savior received their crown also; for mark, it was to be given unto all who loved his appearing. He did not, however, expect to obtain it then; "For," says he, "our conversation is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ; who shall change our vile BODY, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body," (Phil. 3: 20, 21.)—What kind of a body did he have? The word teaches that he had flesh and bones. (Luke 24: 39,) "For a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have."—We have evidence that he ascended with this same body, in which he appeared unto them, from the testimony of many infallible witnesses, he being seen of them forty days, and in Acts 1: 9, we read, "And when he had spoken these things, while they beheld, he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight." In the same chapter we find, that the Angels declare to the disciples that "This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Now Paul was looking for his crown to be given at that time, and when is that time coming? It is under the sounding of the seventh trumpet. In Rev. 11: 15, 18, we read, "And the seventh angel sounded; and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ; and he shall reign for ever and ever." "And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that thou shouldest give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great; and shouldest destroy them which destroy the earth." Yes, that is the time when we shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory, "and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him, and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him." O my God, help me to avoid the dreadful state of those who pierce him and shall wail because of him. And may all of us who love his appearing have our conversation in heaven, so that when he shall appear, we also may appear in glory. "For yet a little while, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry," (Heb. 10: 37). Yes, my Brethren and Sisters, our Lord will soon come; I believe it with all my heart; for it is now as it was in the days of Noah, the world was so wicked then, that God destroyed it. Noah preached to the antediluvians, and they believed him not; so it is at the present time.—Some Noahs are preaching the day of Judgment at hand; but few have believed their report. The great mass of mankind are more inclined to scoff and ridicule the doctrine than believe. But so it is written, "Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying where is the promise of his coming?" etc., (2 Pet. 3: 3, 4). But let them scoff, let them revile, they have their reward. "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven: for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you." (Matt. 5: 11, 12). But O that they could see the error of their ways, that they might come to the knowledge of the truth and be saved. My prayer is that they may before the day of the Lord comes, that it may not take them in a snare; for the day of redemption draweth nigh. Yes, I can see it approaching. Soon the 1335 days that God gave to Daniel, will run out; soon Michael, the great Prince, will stand up to deliver his people; then those that are holy will be holy still, those that are filthy will be filthy still. O what a glorious time for the children of God! Yes, glory be to God. Bless his holy name for his goodness to us ward. We can see that the end is nigh, when the gathering time will come, when he shall come with all the holy angels, and they shall gather the tares into bundles to be burned. I pray God that I may not belong to the tares. O may I be found among that blessed throng, unto whom He shall say, "Come ye blessed of my Father inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." O I bless God for the promises which await the child of God. Yes, blessed be his holy name, it seems as if we could not praise him enough for what he has done for us. I feel for one like saying with David, "Praise ye the Lord. Praise the Lord, O my soul. While I live will I praise the Lord: I will sing praises unto my God while I have any being." (Ps. 146). I thank the Lord that he has called after me at this late hour, although I have held the truth in unrighteousness, and have been a decided advocate for the Advent cause for a long time. For more than a year past I have borne the name of "Millerite." Inasmuch as I endured the reproach without the glory, I set myself about seeking after it, and with the help of God I found it. Yes, glory be to his name, I found him the balm of Gilead to my soul; my joy, my love, my only consolation in weal or wo; and, by the Grace of God, I will hold on to Him until he shall come. For soon we shall see him coming with all the holy angels. O glorious thought, that he who is our life is so soon to appear; and that we shall appear with Him in Glory, and then we shall be with him, and shall see good old Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and sit down with them and all the martyrs in the kingdom of God. O the very thought of it makes my heart leap for joy! It seems as though I could not contain myself till I shall see him. But I must wait patiently for him. I feel like saying with John, "come, Lord Jesus, and come QUICKLY."

Some tell us we have no right to talk about the kingdom or the resurrection.—But the Psalmist says, "All thy works shall praise thee, O Lord; and thy saints shall bless thee. They shall speak of the glory of thy kingdom and talk of thy power; to make known to the sons of men his mighty acts, and the glorious majesty of his kingdom." (Ps. 145: 10, 11).—Paul, speaking to the Thessalonians concerning the resurrection, tells them to "comfort one another with these words." Yes, Glory be to God in the highest, that he spake these words of comfort by the mouth of Paul; and I thank God for having raised up a little company in this place, that do not fear to speak of things pertaining to the kingdom, and the second coming of Christ; for we do expect him this year; yes, praise the Lord. I request an interest in the prayers of all the Brethren and Sisters, that we remain faithful until the end, so that we may have an abundant entrance into the kingdom of God. DAVID BOOD.

"Watchman, What of the Night?"

If ever the ab[illegible] im-portant bearing [illegible] the world, and was thereb[illegible] answer, it is at present [illegible] has veiled the whole earth with its sable curtain, and gross darkness has made a lodgment in the minds of the people. There are but few, compared with the mass of mankind, that can, with propriety, be called the wise. And while that despised few are crying, "Watchman, what of the night?" the mass are heaping to themselves "teachers, having itching ears," and crying unto them, "[illegible] not right things, [illegible] prophecy deceit[illegible]" and therefore, the blind lead the blin[illegible] both fall into the ditch. [illegible] classes brought to view, [illegible] running the same race, and expecting [illegible] share in the same reward. But [illegible] contrast in the roads which they [illegible] and how different their customs and [illegible]sires by the way! Methinks one of [illegible] two companies are building their faith on a sandy foundation: for there is but one road marked out in the Scriptures of truth, whereby man could run and win the prize, and that is the straight and narrow way; and because of the straightness thereof, few there be that find it. Now it behooveth all who are professedly travelling that way, to examine well their hopes for eternity, and see if they are based on the Rock of Ages; for if they are not, they will not be able to stand the test of that trying day. Now the Bible has told us of but one way whereby we can tell the wise from the unwise, and that is "by their fruits." The sure word says, that "if we have not the spirit or mind of Christ, we are none of his." Let us see what kind of a spirit or mind Christ possessed, that we may be enabled to discern the wheat from the tares, in the two classes brought to view. Jesus says, "learn of me, for I am meek and lowly of heart." Now, if we see any professed Pilgrims with that spirit we call them Christ-like. Jesus sought not that honor which is earthly, but only that honor which cometh from the Father: for when men would have exalted him to the throne by making him King, he refused the wordly reputation. Said he, my "Kingdom is not of this world" In every thing he sought not his own will, or temporal pleasure, but only the will of the Father. Because he partook not of the vanities and forms of earth to please man, the world hated, reviled, persecuted and killed him. He condemned the world by his godly life; and told his disciples that they would be treated in the same way, if they were followers of that which is good; and so it has ever been from the Apostolic age to the present time. It is but about 75 years since the Saints of God have had to render up their lives for the cause of their Redeemer. Jesus has told his followers that if they loved him they would keep his commands, and so it is to this day; all that love him in sincerity and truth, and are keeping ALL of his commands, watching and discerning the "signs of the times," that betoken his near approach, are despised, not only by the world, but by the professed followers of the meek and lowly Jesus. How unlike their blessed Master! Surely by their fruits we can know them. They love not his appearing; for if they did they would be anxious to know the reasons why his followers expect him so soon, instead of scoffing at, and reviling them for their faith. Paul says there is a crown of righteousness laid up for all that love the appearing of Christ; plainly implying, by that language, that there was none laid up for those who did not love his appearing. But blessed be God, he will have a few people who are willing to both hear and receive the truth into good and honest hearts; and when they see the signs take place that indicate the near approach of the Savior, they are willing to examine and believe for themselves, and show their faith by their works, by heralding the same to all around, whether men will hear or forbear; and if [illegible] require, are willing to take joyfully the spoiling of their goods, for the sake of Christ. It has been 11 long years since that despised few first went forth to meet the Bridegroom, but their fond anticipations were blasted. He has tarried, and during that tarrying time [illegible] endured manfully the scoffs and re[illegible]es of the world. But, th[illegible] they will not always dwell [illegible] fond anticipation of their hope. No! soon they will enjoy the reality; for lo! what says the faithful Watchman now as they cry to him, "what of the night?" He says, as he gazes on the eastern horizon, "the morning cometh!!" And so zealous is he that they should be thorougly convinced of the near approach of their long-expected Deliverer, that he tells them not to take his word alone for it, but see for themselves. And he points them to the beams that reflect from the rising day star, along the eastern horizon; and says he, my long experience has made me sure that those beams reflect from none other than the Morning Star, and lo! hear the pathe[illegible] strains of that exhortation to the faith[illegible] few, from the lips of that way worn Watchman, while he says,

> "[illegible] your armor now, ye righteous! put
> The helmet of salvation on, and gird
> [illegible] loins about with truth; add righteousness,
> And add the shield of faith; and take the sword
> Of God, awake! and watch: the day is near,
> Great day of God Almighty, and the Lamb."

But while the faithful Watchman says, "the morning cometh," he adds, "and also the night." "The long dark, dark night, that has no morn beyond it, and no star." But both periods of time could not be for one and the same class of people. The dawn of day could not bring light and darkness at the same time to the same people. No! there is another class to whom the dawning of the day of God will be darkness rather than light. Yes, to the scoffer, "that day will be a day of wrath, a day of trouble and distress, a day of wasteness and desolation, a day of darkness and gloominess, a day of clouds and thick darkness." "Alas! for that day is great, there is none like it!" O, Sinner, how will you stand in that day, when summoned before the bar of God to give an account for the deeds done in the body? You may be esteemed great and wise in this world, but the "wisdom of this world is foolishness with God." "For in that day the mighty men shall cry bitterly—yes they will cry "for the rocks and mountains to hide them from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb." But rocks and mountains will flee away, and leave them to suffer the consequences of their unwise choice; for there is no chance for repentance then; for "vengeance begins to tread the great winepress of fierceness and of wrath; and mercy that pleaded long—she pleads no more." The sinner's destiny will be sealed then, and sealed forever. O turn now from the error of your way, for why will ye die? ELIZABETH L. T. PRICE.

Extract from Apocalyptic Sketches,

BY JOHN CUMMING,

Minister of the Scotch National Church, London.

"The drying up of the Euphrates" began about 1820. In that very year, accordingly, the revolt of Ali Pacha took place. In 1822 the Greek provinces rose as by an irresistible impulse, and warred successfully against their Moslem oppressors. Russia next entered into conflict with Turkey, and exhausted her resources and crippled her energies. The Janissaries were next broken up—the peculiarities of Mohammedanism have disappeared one after another—and even in 1834, so far had this drying up or progressive wasting of the Ottoman empire proceeded, that M. Delamartine, in the Chamber of Deputies in Paris, unconsciously illustrated the truth and fulfilment of the Apocalyptic vision, when he said, "The Ottoman empire is no empire at all; it is a misshapen agglomeration of different races without cohesion between them—with mingled interests—without a language—without laws—without religion—without unity or stability of power. You see that the breath of life which animated it—namely, religious fanaticism—is extinct. You see that its fatal and blinded administration has devoured the race of conquerors, and that Turkey is perishing for want of Turks.

"How far the angel's vial has taken effect," says the author of the "Kings of the East," "and in what manner it has performed its commissioned work, will be best seen by taking a retrospective glance at Turkey, and by comparing her state twenty years ago with her condition now. During the wars of the French Revolution, while the armies of France desolated Spain, Portugal, Germany, Holland, Russia, Prussia, Italy, and Austria, Turkey escaped comparatively harmless. The 'Annual Register' records, in 1820—'The Ottoman empire, by a long and unwonted good fortune, found itself at the commencement of the era (1820) freed at once from foreign war and domestic rebellion.'

"We see, then, Turkey, at the beginning of 1820, blest with more than ordinary repose—the fearful calm which too frequently, however, denotes a storm.—Peaceful within and without, she appeared to the world, and was respected, as a powerful and mighty nation. Contrast her present condition—distracted by rebellion among her provinces—stripped of large portions of her empire, Greece, Egypt, Algeria, Wallachia, Moldavia, and all which she possessed north of the Danube—unable to defend herself against her own vassal—obliged to ask for aid from her great enemy, the Russian, to protect her capital, and from other nations whom she has for years regarded as the great enemies of her faith. Her treasury exhausted, her trade and manufactures destroyed; without her wonted tribute from the provinces, and all the sources of wealth dried up; she sits an object of pitiable helplessness amid the nations."

Dr. Keith, in his "Signs of the Times," has stated the troubles which since 1820 have in succession been poured upon Turkey.

"In the summer of 1820, Ali Pacha of Albania declared his independence. In the November of the same year the Suliots returned to their country from the Ionian Islands, and raised the standard of rebellion against the Sublime Porte. In April, 1821, the Greek insurrection broke out at Patras, while the empire was distracted at the same time by insurrections in various provinces.

"Theodore, at the head of 10,000 insurgents, raised the standard of revolt in Wallachia. Prince Ypsilanti revolted in Moldavia. Candia refused the usual tribute, and all Greece was in arms. In September, 1821, two irruptions were made into the Turkish dominion by the Persian princes, Mohammed Ali Mirza and Abbas Mirza. The prince royal crossed the frontier toward the end of July, 1822, and defeated an army of 52,000 Turks, who fled in disorder from the field. On the 13th of the same month, Aleppo, the capital of Syria, was destroyed by an earthquake. Antioch, formerly its capital, was also overthrown by the same visitation. In 1823 the war in Greece raged with unabated fury.

"The year 1824 was peculiarly signalized by the triumps of the Greeks both by sea and land; and while these insurgents were universally successful, fresh dangers threatened the Ottoman empire.

"In 1825 both the populace and the Janissaries in Constantinople were in a state of great fermentation. The Janissaries revolted and rebelled, pillaged the palaces of the Porte, and committed the most frightful excesses throughout Constantinople. The sultan in consequence determined to destroy them utterly; and on the 15th of July, 1826, he caused the Etmeidan, where the Janissaries were assembled in a dense and tumultuous crowd, to be surrounded by 60,000 men; the attack began on the part of the sultan, by a murderous discharge of grape-shot; many were killed on the spot, and the survivors retired to their barracks. These, like the Etmeidan, were surrounded by cannon, and the buildings set fire to, in which horrible situation the whole body of the Janissaries perished.

"In the next month, a great fire broke out, and destroyed 6000 houses, in the most wealthy and magnificent parts of the city.

"In 1827 the battle of Navarino was fought, and the destruction of the Turkish and Egyptian fleets gave the command of the Euxine to Russia, and paved the way for fresh disasters to the Turkish empire.

"On the 26th of April, 1828, Russia declared war against Turkey, and immediately afterward attacked the sultan in in his Asiatic pashalics.

"In 1829, after successively defeating the Turkish armies to the east and north, in Anatolia, and on the shores of the Euxine, the Russians passed the Balkan, and fixed their head-quarters in the city of Adrianople. On hearing the near approach of the victorious Russians, the Sublime Porte submitted to the terms of peace dictated by the victors. Liberty from the Turkish yoke was secured to the principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia, and not a Turk was permitted to reside north of the Danube. The liberty and independence of Servia, and the region inhabited by Franks in the European dominions of Turkey, had their liberty secured,—Greece being already free.

"In 1829 the French seized upon Algiers, and converted a province of Turkey into a French colony.

"In 1828 the pacha of Egypt determined upon the conquest of Syria; and, under the pretence of putting down an insurrection, sent a fleet well supplied, to execute his purposes. His preparations soon alarmed the sultan, who sent an envoy to the pacha at Alexandria; who, seeing through the measures of the wily vassal, demanded of him plainly, 'What is it you really require from the Sublime Porte?' 'My object,' said the pacha, 'is to keep what I have got. In a few days Acre must be mine: if the sultan consents to my keeping it, I shall stop there; if the sultan refuses, I shall take Damascus: if Damascus be granted me, there I shall stop; but if it be not, I shall take Aleppo. If the sultan will not grant it me—then—who knows—Allah Kerim—God is merciful!'

"The sultan rejected the terms, and Ibrahim advanced victoriously forward till Acre surrendered, after a siege of eight months, in May, 1832. Continuing his forward movement, the army of Ibrahim soon overran all Syria, and driving before him the forces of the sultan, passed the defiles of the Taurus, defeated the army under the grand vizier, in the plain of Koniah, on the 19th December, 1832.

"He had now only to march upon Constantinople, and give a meaning to the incoherent expressions of his father.—Nothing remained to oppose his progress to the capital. In this dilemma the sultan applied to Russia for aid, who immediately sent an army of 50,000 men, and ten ships of the line, with several frigates, to Constantinople. The Russians occupied the heights of Unkiar Skelessi, and placed themselves between Ibrahim and his prize. Ibrahim had, however, arrived at Brusa before the news of the armistice between the sultan and his father reached him.—On the 5th of May, 1833, the sultan entered into a convention with Mehemet Ali, giving up to him Adana, and the whole of Syria. From this period the pacha of Egypt considered himself the sovereign of Syria, and sent, in 1835, an official note to the governments of Austria, France, and England, to obtain their consent to the consolidation of this power over his conquests. The British ambassador opposed, and the conquest of Syria was never recognised by the European powers.

"The inhabitants of Syria from 1834 to 1837 were in frequent, if not constant, rebellion. On the 8th of May, 1839, the sultan pronounced the pacha of Egypt and his son Ibrahim deposed, and appointed Hafiz Pacha, the Ottoman general, governor of Egypt."

"'Within the last twenty years,' (says Mr. Welsh, as quoted by Dr. Keith,) 'Constantinople has lost one-half of its population. Two conflagrations happened while I was at Constantinople, and destroyed fifteen thousand houses. The Russian and Greek wars were a constant drain on the Janissaries of the capital. The silent operation of the plague is continually active, though not always alarming; it will be considered no exaggeration to say, that within the period mentioned, from three to four hundred thousand persons have been prematurely swept away in one city of Europe, by causes which were not operating in any other,—conflagration, pestilence, and civil commotion. The Turks, though naturally of a robust and vigorous constitution, addict themselves to such habits as are very unfavourable to population: the births do little more than exceed the ordinary deaths, and cannot supply the waste of casualties. The surrounding country is therefore con stantly drained to supply the waste in the capital, which nevertheless exhibits districts nearly depopulated. If we suppose that these causes operate, more or less in every part of the Turkish empire, it will not be too much to say, that there is more of human life wasted, and less supplied, than in any other country. We see every-day life going out in the fairest portion of Europe, and the human race threatened with extinction in a soil and climate capable of supporting the most abundant population." (See "The Kings of the East," pp. 2–11.)

From that time the Turkish nation has rapidly wasted; the last streamlet is barely discernible in the once full and overflowing channel of the great Euphrates.—The SHADOWS of Russia and Britain are at this moment, by a strange combination, spread over it to prevent its entire evaporation. They will not succeed. God has pronounced its doom, and no power on earth can prevent its speedy accomplishment. Yea, all efforts to arrest, will only precipitate the sure catastrophe.

The World's Crisis.

LOWELL, JULY 26, 1854.

"Sell that ye have and give alms."

We understand a report is in circulation that we are unwilling to publish any thing on the subject of selling and giving alms. But this is a mistake. I suppose the report grew out of the fact, that Bro. Burlingham's letter was not published immediately. I had, however, no intention of suppressing it; but published it as soon as convenient. It was put into the hands of the printer early enough to have appeared a week sooner; but I suppose for want of room it was not then inserted. For myself, I consider it one of the most blessed injunctions in the Scriptures, and as Jesus told his disciples "it is more blessed to give than to receive." I do not feel that it would be consistent for me to look forward to another year, and make provision for the flesh. I have believed in time with great confidence before, but never before felt so absolutely shut up to the faith, and prohibited from admitting that there might be a failure, as I do in reference to this time. I never before felt condemned for putting in an "if," as I do now. I therefore feel it to be a privilege, and a great privilege, if at the end of each month I have any thing over of my receipts to distribute the same to the glory of God; that my treasure may not be here, that my inheritance may be that which is "pure and undefiled, and which fadeth not away." I believe a man's works ought to correspond with his faith, and that to hoard up treasures for years to come, would be denying the faith of those who expect the coming of our blessed Savior this year. I feel that there is a safety in trusting all our interests in the hands of God, and disposing of all our time, talents and property, as shall be for His glory. Precisely how much of this world's goods a man may hold in possession, and be justified before God, I do not pretend to determine; let each one ask counsel of God for himself in this thing; but to heap up treasures, or to hold them to any great amount, is, in my judgment, subversive of the faith in relation to present truth. I would, therefore, warn all, who are identified with the movement of the church in going out to meet the Bridegroom, not to put their trust in uncertain riches, nor to keep back any part of the price of the land; but without reserve to consecrate all to God, and if he opens the way for the distribution of their property, "to sell and give alms," and go and follow Christ, trusting to receive an enduring substance, even a treasure in heaven, a crown of glory that fadeth not away.

STATE OF EUROPE. Prof. Felton who has recently returned from a visit to Europe, delivered the oration at the late Commencement of Cambridge College; and in course of his address makes the following striking remarks:

Europe was bestridden by the spirit and institutions of the middle ages; France had preferred the will of an autocrat, ruling by a more legitimate right than any other, it was true; Sardinia, weakened and dependent, strangely in contrast, has received constitutional liberty from its king, fearing not a free press though it may turn against him, nor the thunders of the Vatican, the shouts of red republicanism, nor the opposition of nobles. Italian States lay earthbound under the crushing despotism of ages. Was this the end to which intelligence had conducted the world, or the proof that the hopes of humanity and the visions of the poets were dreams.

☞ The Atlantic steam-ship, Franklin, as it was coming into New York in a fog ran ashore on Monday 17th, and is likely to prove a total wreck. Her cargo is estimated at from $1,500,000 to $2,000,000, and is said to be the most valuable ever brought to America. Insured we understand in Europe.

The Parable fulfilled, "even our enemies themselves being judges."

Said Paul, "Some indeed preach Christ even of envy and strife; and some also of good will: the one preach Christ of contention, not sincerely, supposing to add affliction to my bonds: but the other of love, knowing that I am set for the defence of the gospel. What then? notwithstanding, every way, whether in pretence, or in truth, Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice." Phil. 1: 15–18.

We give the testimony of the Boston Herald of the 20th inst.:

THE END OF THE WORLD. The Second Adventists are busy about these times.(1.) In reference to the failure of their many positive predictions of the precise day when the elements should melt with fervent heat, and the heavens be rolled together as a scroll, they fall back upon the standard excuse of all modern prophets, and ascribe the failures of their prophecies to chronology and nothing else. (2). If chronology could be relied upon, they would be found all right, for their figures concerning "a time, times, and half a time," are all correct. At first, the Adventists were somewhat discouraged at their repeated mistakes, (3) but now they are more hopeful—they feel encouraged. (4). There are portentous signs in the heavens and on the earth—nations are struggling together, and the people are filled with perplexity. (5).—Truly, these are encouraging signs to the waiting Adventists,(6), and they are making the most of them, by preaching, by praying, by exhorting; by the press, in the pulpit, and in the family circle (7).—Camp-meetings are called everywhere, and all the brethren are busy preparing for the great event.(8).

A camp-meeting of Adventists was commenced at Salem, yesterday afternoon, to be continued day and night until Monday. The camp is pitched in a grove about a mile from Salem, on the line of the Eastern Railroad. Whoever wants to haer the official account of the last great scene, read the authentic programme of the last crowning act of all in this world's drama should improve this opportunity.(9).

1. Trimming lamps.

2. Not so. The grand mistake of the Adventists in '43 was that they measured from the wrong events, starting the 2300 days from the decree in the 7th of Artaxerxes, instead of the 20th of Artaxerxes; and in reference to the taking away of the daily sacrifice and the setting up of the abomination that maketh desolate,on which the whole question turns in relation to the time, times and a half, the 1260, 1290 and 1335 days, extending to the end of the world, depends, they did not understand what the taking away of the daily sacrifice was, but made it the pagan rites of Rome, instead of the true worship of God. It is now so plain, that the daily sacrifice neither is nor can be any thing else but the true worship of God; under the old dispensation, the mosaic rites; under the new, the sacrifices presented at the Christian's altar, that it is passing strange our eyes could have been so holden as not to have seen it. They therefore measured from the wrong event, to commence the periods connected with the great Anti-Christian power. But on measuring the second time, we do as we are bidden by the Angel, "measure the temple of God, and the Altar," (in that temple), "and them that worship therein." This gives us our present position, extending the 1335 days to 1854. We doubt not this position will be justified by the fulfilment of the promise.

The movement in '44 was essentially one and the same with that of '43. The calculations were based upon the same premises, and the principal difference was that we committed a mathematical error in reckoning the time from B. C. 457 to A. D. 1843 to be 2300 full years, whereas any school-boy can now perceive that the years were not complete till 1844. But why, it may be asked, did we not discover the mistake earlier? Why, I ask in reply, could not all the mathematicians in the world point out the error, till the Adventists discovered it themselves? The reason was, God's hand covered it, as it did the meaning of the daily sacrifice. It is truly astonishing that either of the mistakes were made; but thus it must be, for the scripture cannot be broken, the tarrying time must come.

3. Yes, "they slumbered and slept."

4. Showing that they are begotten again unto a lively hope, or as the Herald says, "they are more hopeful." Thank the Lord.

5. Just as the Scripture says. So we have the testimony of the Herald, not only that the Church are in the position described at the glorious appearing of our Lord, but also the political world. Why, then, is not the Editor looking for a fulfilment of the promise? Is there any unbelief in this case?

6. Amen.

7. Thank God.

8. Going out to meet the Bridegroom.

9. And will not the Editor comply with his own good advice? We would cordially and affectionately invite him, and all others to listen candidly to the arguments, and not judge a matter before they hear it. Probably many think the views of Adventists are the offspring of ignorance and superstition. I once thought so myself, till at length, thank God, I found my own views which accorded with the theology of the day, were to be attributed to my own consummate ignorance of the prophetic word. ED.

CHOLERA. The whole number of cases reported at the Franklin Street Hospital, New York, up to Wednesday noon, was 213, of whom 107 had died, 69 had been discharged, and 37 remained under treatment. Between Sunday noon and Wednesday noon, 16th—19th, 50 patients were taken to this hospital, 26 of whom died. The Health Commissioners have decided to open another hospital immediately, and one of the ward school houses has been stripped of its school furniture, and furnished with beds and other conveniences for this purpose. Other school rooms will be taken, as the schools break up for the vacation, if they are needed. This movement excites considerable opposition from some quarters.

In Brooklyn, N. Y., there were 15 cases of cholera reported for the twenty four hours ending at noon on the 20th; 3 had died and 2 had been discharged. In Nashville, Tenn., there have been 100 deaths of cholera between May 1st and July 11th.

The Richmond (Va.) Inquirer of the 19th, says:—"Yesterday we stated, what we then believed to be true, that the cholera had disappeared almost wholly from our city. We are now called upon to correct the statement. A physician of high standing, familiar with the subject, authorizes us to say that the cholera exists here to an alarming extent, and that, in an epidemic form. Several new cases occurred yesterday; and the disease, instead of being on the decline, seems to be on the increase. It attacks all classes, without reference to their diet or habits of life. We have reliable authority for our present statement.

The cholera has prevailed in New Orleans from the first of June, carrying off an average of nearly forty a week up to July 1st. The yellow fever has also made its appearance. In St. Louis the cholera prevails to an alarming and fatal degree. During the single week ending July 10th, 216 persons had died of cholera, the whole number of deaths during the same time, of all diseases, being 505. Several fatal cases of cholera have occurred in Harrison county, Ohio. The Board of Health of Chicago report 26 deaths on the 10th inst., on the 12th, 22 deaths, and on the 13th, 17 deaths; all of cholera. In Hamilton, Canada West, there were 85 deaths of cholera, between July 1st and 13th, 39 of which occurred during the three last days of this period. At Mackinac there have been several cases of cholera, some of them in the most respectable families of the place. There were 17 deaths on board of a propeller which arrived at Mackinac from Chicago.

☞ We find that fearful epidemic, Asiatic cholera, is prevailing very extensively in America. Beside the localities mentioned above, it has been very fatal at M[illegible] in Canada. In various cities of N[illegible] land, it has also made its appearance, but not to an alarming extent.

It has ever appeared to me that this epidemic is more emphatically a scourge from the hand of God, than any other disease incident to man. "Before Him went the pestilence." It falls heavily on those who are addicted to intemperance and other vices, and comes upon the nations in these last days, as if to warn the wicked of their approaching doom. Some of God's dear children fall by the fell destroyer, but we have reason to believe, most of those who do the will of God, will escape all these things that are coming on the earth.

The French correspondent to the "New York Observer," writing on the diversity of opinion among Roman Catholics upon the Eastern question, says:—

The priests of the Romish church are deeply interested in the war recently declared between Russia and the Western powers. The chiefs of the Popish communion, notwithstanding their pretence of possessing entire unity, upon all important points differ widely on this subject. At Rome, for example, the cardinals are divided into two distinct camps, in relation to the war. Many belong to what is called in the pontifical city the Russian party, and would almost be disposed to smooth the way to universal conquest for the Muscovite Colossus; while others approve of the energetic measures of France and England, and wish for the defeat of the Czar. As to the Pope himself, he has not sufficient strength of mind to form a clear, firm, decided opinion. Whence arises the diversity of views among the cardinals?—The principal cause is that one party is governed chiefly by political, and the other by religious considerations. They who are favorable to Nicholas, behold in him the protector of European order, the defender of the old institutions, the man who is most capable of restraining by military force the revolutionary passions. They fear that if he is conquered, revolutionary ideas will revive, and that Kossuth in Hungary and Mazzini in Italy may provoke new popular insurrections. The sympathies of these ecclesiastical dignitaries are therefore with the Autocrat of the North. Not so the cardinals who place the interests of their religion above their political anxieties. They fear the usurping disposition of Nicholas. They say that Russia is extending her possessions to the borders of the Bosphorus would reign over the Mediterranean, and threaten Italy, and even Rome itself. They picture to themselves the Greek schism violently attacking the Roman church; and if they must choose, they would prefer the democrats to the schismatics.

In the great battle that is coming, great Babylon is to be divided into three parts.—There is a possibility that the separation is about commencing. The writer from whom we have now quoted, speaks of the Cardinals being divided into two DISTINCT CAMPS, in relation the war; and should the republicans show themselves, a third camp would be formed at once. Observe this is in relation to the WAR, which we understand to be "the battle," or as it might have been rendered, and I think more appropriately, the WAR of that great day of God Almighty.

☞ I have received from Bro. Glidden an earnest request for some Brother who is capable of giving light on the subject of Christ's coming this year, to visit Dover, Me., and preach to those who are anxious to hear. He thinks they will be able to pay his expenditures.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PINE RIVER, WASHARA CO., }
WIS., June 11th, 1854. }

Dear Brother Merrian:—Although I have never seen you, yet I feel that we are heirs together of the promised inheritance which is to be given to the saints, at the revelation of Jesus Christ.

About a week ago I received three numbers of the World's Crisis, which I have read with a fervent and increasing interest. My heart says praise the Lord, for I believe we shall soon make the port of eternal rest. Yes, glory be to God, the Cry has gone forth, that the world may be warned of the approaching judgment.

I can truly say, that the truths contained in the Crisis, are a feast of fat things unto my soul; and I rejoice that the Angel (Messenger) seen by the Revelator, as recorded in Rev. 14: 6, 7, is now, and has been for the last twenty years, rapidly coursing his way through mid-heaven, sealing the servants of God in their foreheads. Oh my God, when I look at the signs of the times, at the amazing stupidity, and the lukewarmness that characterizes the [illegible] disciples of the New Jerusalem, [illegible] anxious solicitude that [illegible] of the wise men, [illegible] of the age, the trembling of kingdoms, and the clashing, and upheaving of the nations, together with all the wonders of the present day which bespeak the near approach of a long expected Saviour, I am led to cry out with the poet,

"Oh spare thy people Lord,
And bring them full salvation."

Oh keep them in the hour of temptation which is come on all the world to try [illegible] from the love of the world, from the worship of the Beast, and his image, and the receiving of his mark, or the number of his name.

[illegible] Advent preaching in this [illegible] to my knowledge. Al[illegible] all the people of this state are asleep on the subject of the second coming of [illegible] near at hand. To them the signs in the heavens and the earth have no meaning; they are but opiates; and still they sleep! and must they slumber?—Will not God suffer a ray of light from His eternal throne, to penetrate their dark prison? Will He not warn them of the approaching judgment? and will they receive the great and last message to fallen man, or will they reject it? Hear the language of our Saviour. "He that is ashamed of me and my words, before this wicked and adulterous generation, of him will I be ashamed before my Father, and the holy angels."

Yours, expecting redemption through Jesus Christ in 1854.

P. M. CADY.

MADISON CENTRE, ME., May 16, '54.

Brother Merriam:—I would communicate a few lines to the waiting children who are looking for redemption this year. Truly we are living "in an age on ages telling, to be living is sublime." We are coming up to the Judgment in a few months, or weeks; and all God's dear tried ones will be redeemed, whose names are written in the Book. I thank God that he sent his faithful servants here to give the Midnight Cry. Brethren Randall and Rowe have had a series of meetings in this place for a few weeks past, and it has pleased the Lord to accompany the truth with his blessing. Some are rejoicing in hope of seeing the Lord this year; praise the Lord forever. Some have been converted, and followed the Lord in the ordinance of baptism. Others are convinced that the Advent doctrine is true. Truly the Lord is doing a great work, the Cry is going on the wings of every wind.

The Midnight Cry I love to hear,
Behold the Bridegroom draweth near;
O sound the Cry from shore to shore,
We are going home in fifty-four.

Soon the last servant will be sealed, the last note of warning is now being given to the world; O may we be faithful, and warn the sinner to seek a refuge from the storm that will soon burst upon this ungodly world, and be saved this year.

Yours, looking for Redemption in 1854,
CAROLINE VEASY.

NAPOLI, CATARAUGUS CO., }
N. Y., May 17th, 1854. }

Brother Merriam:—There are a few of the disciples of Jesus in this place, who are looking for their Deliverer to come soon; and we have heard the cry from the East, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet Him." We need to be aroused out of sleep; for we have been sleeping on time about ten years. We believe in time. It was time that awakened me in '43, and it is time that will arouse the slumbering virgins; and if you have got the year of Jubilee, Brn., sound it long and loud. Come this way, into Western New York, and give the trumpet that certain sound, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet Him." Amen. Now, Brethren, traveling east or west via New York or Erie R. R., can stop at Little Valley depot, Cataraugus Co., N. Y., and call on Bro. J. S. Beers, (watch maker) in that place. Brother Beers' heart is warm with christian love; his house is a home for the pilgrim and stranger. The Brn. mostly live four or five miles from Little Valley, on the road from there to Jamestown. We would like to have a grove or conference meeting here this summer, if time should last.—Brn., bear in mind these requests.

Your brother in tribulaton, waiting for deliverance.

DWIGHT WATERMAN.

LITCHFIELD, CONN., June 6th, 1854.

Dear Bro. Merriam:—I am glad that through God's grace we can have so good-spirited a paper as the Crisis. Its value and influence cannot be told in this world. No, its value is beyond gold; and had I the means how gladly woul I bestow it into the treasury of the Lord; for verily I feel the Crisis is the Lord's messenger of the good news of the kingdom. O my dear brother, be patient in your labors although hard. Remember that it is but a little while and all is over, joys eternal then are yours, forever and ever. O the thought, what events are to take place this year! The day of vengeance—the year of the Lord's redeemed—the downfall of earthly powers or governments and the slaying of the Lord's enemies—the burning of the tares and the exaltation of David's throne—the bowing of kings and princes, and the coronation of Jesus—the much hated and despised Christ—who will have a free government, and equal rights, and no contending parties. Blessed be God, He comes, He comes to reign; yea, within a few more days.

Yours in faith,
GEORGE A. BARKER.

EAST SHELBURNE, June 16th, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I praise God that I ever was led to love the appearing of Jesus, and to "discern this time." I think there is a perfect harmony in the prophetic numbers pointing down to this time, if the darkening of the sun, May 19, 1780, marked the end of the 1260 days' (years), the 1335 brings the coming of the Lord and the resurrection of the saints before May 19, 1855. I believe with all my soul. May God in mercy keep me and all His waiting children in this hour of temptation which is come upon all the world to try them" that dwell upon the earth, is the prayer of your unworthy brother, 'looking for, and hasting unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat. Nevertheless, we according to His promise, look for new heavens, and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." Amen.

DAVID WILSON.

BETHLEHEM, N. H., April 21st, 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—There is a small band here heartily united with the Crisis, believing the dear Saviour will come this year. Praise God for the light that shines from the lively oracles. I rejoice when I hear the cheering news. The more I humble myself, and pray, and examine the evidence on the subject, the stronger I feel; and I feel for others that have not heard the joyful, yet solemn news. I hope the brethren that have the faith, will do all in their power to wake up their fellow men, and compel them to come in to the marriage supper of the Lamb. Let the minor points alone, whilst we are in the valley of decision, (Joel 3: 14,) that the cry may have its full power.

Your unworthy yet loving brother in the hope of Israel.

EXTRACTS FROM LONDON PAPERS.

THE WAR IN THE EAST. A Stockholm correspondent of the Hamburger Correspondenten mentions that all accounts that reach there of the feeling in Finland connected with the operations of our countrymen at Uleaborg and Brahestadt describe it as highly exasperated.—This exasperation has reached such a height that the country folk talk of volunteering one man per house, to assist in defending the coast; there seemed to be no want of men to carry out this idea, but only of arms. It appears that an enraged multitude of peasantry, about 900 in number, had banded together for the purpose of attacking the 300 English, who landed at Uleaborg, and that they were only restrained by the exertions of the Governor.

A letter from Wisby, the chief port of Gothland, dated June 23, states:—

"The number of fugitive Finns increases here every day. Whoever walks round our harbor, sees a vast number of ragged people lying about on the stones, whose nocturnal abode is the tents they have contrived out of tattered sails. One shriek of woe sounds through all Finland! It will take many years before those wretched outcasts regain the point which they had hitherto by great assiduity attained. All their vessels, of any size, are in the hands of the English, and the smaller ones totally destroyed. All the stock of timber and pith that they are wont to export to Denmark, and even Germany, in the spring, and which constitutes their chief source of livelihood, is reduced to ashes. Anything and everything that might possibly be useful to the Russians, has been destroyed."

The London Morning Chronicle of July 7, says:—

"Events are hurrying onwards to a great crisis. In our minds there has never been a doubt as to the position of affairs between Austria and Russia.

We have, from the first, regarded these Powers as acting in perfect harmony, though at times seemingly at variance. Others have taken a different view of the relations subsisting between the Courts of St Petersburg and Vienna. They believe that there is a real and decided antagonism between them. They avow their inability to believe that Austria could have signed a convention with Turkey, to drive the Russians out of the Principalities, if she were not heart and soul against the Czar

It remains to be seen who is right. And that we shall see before long The curtain of concealment must soon be raised; and the whole world will be able to form its opinion as to the real position of affairs. Nothing, up to the hour at which we write, has occurred to shake, in the slightest degree, our faith in the views we have entertained all through the piece. We are firmly convinced that Austria was, from the first, a consenting party to the entrance of the Russians into the Principalities.

Of course, she did not so consent openly; the concurrence which she gave to the Czar was given secretly. We, further, believe that there is also a secret understanding between Russia and Austria, respecting the occupation of Moldavia and Wallachia—so that, should the Austrians take possession of these Provinces, it will be in accordance with the views of the Czar, however much he may affect to be indignant at the circumstance

Nor will our opinion on the subject be changed, even should there be one or more collisions between the Austrian and Russian forces, before the latter retire behind the Pruth. For the sake of keeping up the delusion, these two Powers may agree to sacrifice a few thousand men.—That, they doubtless feel, would be the best means of throwing dust in the eyes of Europe. We all know what pretended quarrels and sham fights are There may possibly be something of the latter between Austria and Prussia, and yet they be all the while sworn brothers.—Nothing short of a terrible loss of men, on the part of either Power, will satisfy us that there is any actual enmity between them."

The Swenska Tidning confirms the report of an attack on Bomarsund on the 21st. The bombardment began at five in the evening, and by seven the masked battery was dismounted and abandoned, and at ten o'clock P. M. the Russian magazines were in a blaze The English lost three men The Russians fought obstinately. the artillery were well supported by rifles.—One bomb burst on the deck of the Hecla.—Midshipman Lucas threw another overboard before it burst.

Bomarsund was again bombarded on the 26th and 27th June, and the fortifications were half destroyed

The Paris correspondent of the Times says: It appears to be the opinion of naval officers here, and indeed, I believe of the Minister of Marine, that the approach of Admiral Napier to Cronstadt is less for the purpose of attack on that fortress than to make a reconnoissance. A letter from an officer in the Baltic fleet (French) mentions that the strictest orders have been given by the Admiral to the officers under his command not to give any account whatever in their letters home of the plans of campaign, the direction of the fleet, its strength, or to communicate anything which might be turned to advantage by the enemy.

GREECE. Advices from Athens, of the 30th ult., state that the rebels have been defeated at Calambaca Fuad Effendi took Calambaca by assault. Hadji Petros's band was dispersed.—1000 were killed, and many made prisoners.—The Turks sent 600 heads of the slain to Larissa.

The ministry had shipped off the King's secretary. The revolt in Thessaly is completely at an end.

THE SPANISH INSURRECTION. Paris, Friday, July 7.—Advices from Madrid to the 5th announce that the insurgents, discouraged, continued to retire before the royal troops.

The capital was tranquil.

The Spanish Insurrection causes much uneasiness here. Nobody knows what General Narvaez will do. It is said he will join the insurrectionists, should they get the upper hand.

The naval encounter between the English, French, and Russian steamers in the Black Sea, took place on the 15th of June. The Terrible, Furious, and Descartes, were attacked by eight Russian steamers, near Sebastopol. A shell fell on board the Russian steamship Waldimir.

☞ We take the following extracts from a London correspondent of the Boston Traveller:

Government, to use a homely expression, appear at last to be looking the War in the face, and not as if they expected a speedy termination to it by the patching up of an insidious peace. Reinforcements are being continually dispatched, as quickly as means of conveyance can be procured, to join the army in the East; and towards the Baltic looks of no less urgent foresight are cast. Only ten days or a fortnight ago contracts were entered into with eminent shipbuilders for the construction of six gunboats, viz.: two at Northfleet, two at Deptford, and two at another yard on the Thames. These, one of the builders informs me, are to be of the strongest and toughest capacity, 214 tons burden, drawing little more than five feet water, and armed with ninety-eight pounders! They will lie so low as scarcely to offer a mark to any description of shore battery. They can be thus stationed, and operate between the leviathan ships of the assailing fleet, protected by them, and either uniting with them in action or keeping them out of the fire. The bottoms are six inches thick, and such speed is using that they will be ready in eight weeks. When completed they will be combined with six other boats of a larger and superior class, between four and five hundred tons, and armed with the most powerful artillery—the whole to proceed forthwith to the Baltic, where they may arrive and be in service at the end of September.

Speaking of the Czar's official reply to the recent demands of Austria, the writer of this letter says:

It is to the effect that the Russians will evacuate Wallachia and leave the mouths of the Danube free for the sake of conciliating Austria; but that they will not abandon the original pretence to the protectorate of the Greek subjects of the Sultan and will keep possession of Moldavia as the material guarantee for justice to their claims in future negotiations.

Again, speaking of the probability that Russia will excite insurrections in Hungary and Italy, he says:—

He has already tried the diversion of stirring up Servia, Montenegro and Greece; and it would be a pleasant job to create other employment for the Austrian arms in Italy and Hungary.

Kossuth on the Eastern Question and the War. [By the English correspondent of N. Y. Independent.] Kossuth has broken the dignified silence he has so long maintained, and has spoken freely to the government and the people of England, on the Eastern question. It is little to say, that he spoke eloquently, and like a great statesman; his words were full of dignity and power; they had all the gravity of the historian, and all the solemnity of the prophet.—To a great extent he has expressed the feelings and opinions of the most enlightened Englishmen, even while impeaching the wisdom of the past policy of the government, and uttering forebodings with respect to the present. Much that he has said will sink deep into the minds of many.

The nationality of Poland, of entire Poland—essential to the freedom of Europe; the alliance of England with Austria incompatible with that end—were the themes on which the great Hungarian enlarged, at Sheffield and at Nottingham, and upon which he will speak at Glasgow. He estimated the universal sentiment and feeling of the English people, with respect to Russian despotism and the freedom of the nations, and compared with it England, as seen in her government and diplomacy. Addressing the vast out-of-doors meeting of the men of Sheffield, he spoke in broad, plain, popular style, in answer to the demand that he should "out with it," that is, his whole mind.

His opening words, following upon the greeting of 14,000 people, were noble and touching.

"Whatever may have befallen a man in the vicissitudes of life, he who can boast of the sympathies of a free, noble-minded people, may well boast of having yet saved much in the shipwreck. [Cheers.] Your welcome, and the assurance of your sympathies, would be dear to my heart at any time. It is doubly dear on the present occasion, because the general situation of Europe is such, that popular sympathies may soon become a great power on earth; and secondly, because you afford me an occasion to experience that the mighty outburst of popular sympathy in which Sheffield so cordially has joined, on my first arrival in England, two and a half years ago, has not been a passing emotion, nor has the deep political meaning of those demonstrations been a mere flattering dream—[Cheers.] Since that time, I have grown old by sorrow and with cares; but the burning aspiration of my heart, bent day and night on the one and the same object, has but drawn intensity from its own flame, and this shattered bodily frame must and will obey when the moment to action shall call—and that moment draws near, gentlemen."

Christian Evidence in Turkey. In the House of Lords, on Friday week, Lord Clarendon read a portion of a dispatch, dated February 25, and received by him a few moments before he entered the House, in which extract the ambassador at Constantinople says:

"I have much satisfaction in reporting to your lordship that the firman for establishing Christian evidence on an equality with Mussulman throughout the Turkish empire is complete, and that it received the Sultan's sanction shortly before I had the honor to receive your lordship's instructions relating to the question, which it has now settled once for all on a broad and firm basis. I have reason to hope that this great act of long withheld justice will be followed by other proofs of the Sultan's comprehensive beneficence, and of the improved spirit prevailing among his Mohammedan subjects.—haratch is no longer levied in a manner vexatious to individuals; but it is an unjust and degrading tax, for the complete abolition of which I shall continue to employ my strenuous exertions."

Italy. M. Marion, ex-President of the Republic of Venice, has written a capital letter to the Presse, in reply to Lord John Russell's remarks on the probable course of Italy in the coming struggle. He gives a very clear and ample statement of the reasons why Italy can never remain permanently tranquil as she is.—He declares that Lord John's hope that in the course of time Austria would relent, and relax her severity, does not at all meet the case.—The Italians do not ask the Austrians to relent; they merely wish them to withdraw; they do not demand her to administer her government more fraternally, but to cease to administer at all. The Italians are waiting, like the Poles, and like the Hungarians."

Stseet Preaching in Williamsburg and Arrest of Seventeen Firemen. A disturbance occurred in Williamsburg, on the 2d inst., in consequence of the attempt of an Engine Company to disturb the proceedings of a meeting in the street, where there was street preaching. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon, the meeting was commenced at the usual place—junction of North Second and North Fourth streets—Mr. Parsons and one of his associates being the speakers. An audience of about 1,000 persons assembled to listen. Besides the police force present, there were forty of the Sheriff's special deputies on hand to preserve the peace. Soon after four o'clock, ther was a false alarm of fire, and No. 5 Engine Company, which is principally or altogether composed of Irishmen, and the runners of the company, came running furiously along with her machine, hooting and yelling in a very disorderly manner. As they passed the meeting, instead of continuing in the middle of the street they ran so close to the sidewalk that the levers of the engine extended over the sidewalk. The men on the rope pushed the people back, and the levers struck some of the audience; it was a dangerous act, as there was a great probability of persons being killed. The police and deputies immediately made arrests, to the number of seventeen, of those who were with the engine. There was some violence at the time of making the arrests, and a police man was struck and badly cut in the head, by a special deputy, by mistake. Last evening Justice Boswell was applied to, and went to the Second district station house, where the prisoners were locked up, and admitted a number of them to bail. [N. Y. Herald.

For the World's Crisis.

Come to the Camp-Meeting.

Methinks, in the green, shady groves of West Winsted,
A clustering circle of white tents I see,
Where the children from valley and mountain are gathered,
In one family home, for earth's last jubilee;
There the aged have tottered, with silver locks streaming,
And young Israelites too, from old Egypt's land,
All yearning to hear the glad news of the kingdom,
And share their last feast with the lone pilgrim band.

'Tis a last farewell greeting in dim earthly bowers,
And closely we cling in this holy embrace,
Fearing some may be lost through the world's fearful powers,
We've enshrined in our hearts, in a hallowed place;
Yes, the last tear is flowing, for soon we will gather
In the fair groves of Eden, our golden harps ring,
Where the tree of life's laden with health giving power,
With the Angels we'll next sing our Jubilee hymn.

With the earth for our bed, even a stone for a pillow,
Like the Patriarch of old, we could safely lie down;
The same could erect in the morn for an altar
If the ladder were there, for the angels to come.
In the name of the Lord, we have set up our banners,
And call upon all to enlist in this war;
'Tis the last call of mercy, of love to poor sinners,
And they'll meet it again when probation is o'er.

There's a mixture of sorrow, of hope, fear and gladness,
As greetings are past at this last yearly feast,
How many we love, with their hearts pressed with sadness,
Would gladly be with us, to share this repast;
How many in bondage, in sickness, are sighing,
Some mourn for companions, and children, and friends,
That still coldly turn from their pleading and crying,
Ah! they know not how shortly our stay with them ends.

Now the sweet songs of Zion are floating around us,
Some touching, and tender, some joyful and glad;
They savor, methinks, of divine inspiration,
And breathe from warm bosoms the praises of God.
Ay! the Watchmen now feel their responsible station,
Between porch and altar they often do weep,
As they sound the last warning that closes probation,
Which will seal for the kingdom, or death's endless sleep.

We may not meet again until safe in the mansions
That Christ has prepared for his own spotless bride:
Adieu to the green, shady groves of West Winsted,
We gather no more 'neath thy cool, grateful shade,
We may wander a few fleeting days more in exile,
And far from each other in sadness may roam,
With Apostles, and Prophets, we next will assemble,
And all join in singing the jubilee hymn.

Charlemont, Mass.

Portland, Me., July 21, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—I send you this extract from some lines I found in a late Baptist paper. Please insert them in the Crisis, if you think best.

Catharine E. Clark.

There is a fair virgin, of heavenly birth,
Desiring a bridegroom, here upon earth;
She is a King's daughter of beauty supreme,
Conceived in heaven, a celestial queen,
Her prospect is immortal, she never can die,
She will bloom in fair beauty in eternity.
When earth with its treasures have all passed away,
She'll then in bright glory, her beauties display,
Her clothing of gold wrought exceedingly bright,
And raiment of linen both clean and white.
Her heart formed of love unchangeably true;
With kindness, and meekness, and righteousness too,
And mercy, and peace, and true holiness,
While truth reigns exalted within her fair breast.
She's modest, and humble, her heart is sincere,
She hopes to the end, and will all things endure;
She is quiet, and patient, and has courage too,
Is stronger than death, and the floods can pass through.

Later from Europe.

A Collision between the Austrian and Russian Armies Probable—Austria's Summons Rejected by the Czar—Spain Revolutionized, and the Abdication of the Queen Demanded.

By the Franklin at New York on Monday, and by the Niagara at Halifax yesterday, we have seven days later advices from Europe—dates to the eighth inst. From the armies and the fleets there is little news. Austria was moving her armies into the Principalities, which had not been evacuated by the Russians. The Czar is reported to have said, rather than yield to the demands of the German Powers, he would "resist to the last rouble and the last man!" He has returned a crafty, temporizing reply to Austria and the German powers. It remains to be seen whether they will fall into his net. Operations are being pushed with renewed vigor in the Baltic. The advance of the Austrian army into Wallachia is confirmed.—There is a rumor of a Turkish defeat in Asia. Great uneasiness is felt in England with regard to the ultimate purposes of Austria in this affair, and very strong apprehensions are entertained that she is acting in secret concert with Russia. Lord John Russell, when questioned upon this point in Parliament, could give no satisfactory explanation; he could only reply that the Austrian movement was one in which Great Britain had no share. Many of the newspapers are furious against the Prime Minister, and affirm that the prospect of an honorable peace is more distant than ever. Accounts from Madrid state that an insurrection headed by Gen. O'Donnell had taken place in that city, having for its object the dethronement of the Queen and the establishment of a Regency.—Trade and the markets remained the same.

Prince Gortschakoff (not the General,) arrived at Vienna on the 4th of July, as the bearer of the Czar's official reply to Austria. The precise terms of the reply have not transpired, but Gortschakoff was also bearer of an autograph letter from Nicholas to the Emperor of Austria, the tenor of which is said to be, that by evacuating Wallachia, and leaving free the Danube, the Czar considers that he satisfies the reasonable demands of Austria. Moldavia will not be evacuated, as the occupation of that principality is a necessary guarantee for conditions of a future treaty of peace.

Col. Manteuffel arrived on the 6th at Berlin from St. Petersburgh with the Czar's reply to Prussia. [illegible] stating that the Czar will consent to resign the exclusive protection over the Greek Christians of Turkey, and will accede to a joint protectorate of the five Powers. The Czar will evacuate the Principalities when the Western Powers evacuate Turkey; but he will retain a strong military position in Moldavia, as provisional security.

The Czar also sent Col. Isakoff to Dresden, with a friendly autograph letter to the King of Saxony, and other Sovereigns who were represented in the Bamberg Conference. Meantime hostilities continue, and fighting is reported from the Baltic, the Black Sea, the Danube, and Asia.

The Russians are concentrating in Moldavia and Northern Wallachia, upon the Transylvanian frontier, making a complete change of front with 80 leagues of ground lost, and at least 50,000 men hors du combat. The Austrians have entered Wallachia, and a French army is embarking in English ships at Cherbourg for Finland. This proximity of position of the two armies suggests possibilities of a collision.

All the troops in Russia Poland have been ordered to march towards the Gallician frontier, and a levy en masse has been ordered in Poland. Each landed proprietor is to supply 24 men, twelve of whom are to be armed with scythes.

On the Danube, on the 21st and 22d, an important battle was fought. The Turks fell on the Russian rear guard of 25,000 men near Silistria, on the 21st, and the battle lasted during two days, the Russians losing 2500 killed, but making good their retreat [illegible] continue their concentration [illegible] and Pruth, but appar[illegible] chin, Isatcha and T[illegible] of the Danube. The [illegible] the movements of the [illegible] foundly secret. The [illegible] be advancing by land to the [illegible]. 50,000 Anglo-French troops are still at Varna. Marshal St. Arnaud and Prince Napoleon are also there. Omar Pasha is prepared to establish his head quarters at Rutschuk. On the 1st, Gen. Gortchakoff removed his head quarters from Kalarasch to Wiztsene. Gen. Baraguay d'Hilliers commands the division of the French army about to embark for the Baltic.

From Asia news is bad. On the 9th of June the Turks met with a severe check, in attempting to storm two redoubts between Osurguet and Kutais. The Russians attacked them in flank during the assault, and defeated them with 1500 killed; 13 cannon, 35 [illegible] entire camp equipage, [illegible] erroneous despatch was [illegible] accounts show that the [illegible] defeated.

The cholera was reported to prevail in the garrison of Cronstadt; also [illegible] in the British fleet. It is affirmed that the Duke Alexander is about to join the Russian army in Moldavia.

Greece.—It was announced that Hadji Petros has been completely routed at Kaladaka, in Thessaly. The rebellion is now considered ended. Piracy increases.

From the Baltic.—Napier's fleet, of twelve screw line-of-battle ships, nine steam frigates, five French ships-of the-line, and several French corvettes, was lying in line of battle off Cronstadt, but up to the 29th of June no attack had been made. Bomarsund was a second time bombarded on the 26th and 27th of June, and the fortifications were destroyed.

From the Black Sea.—On the 24th of June, eight Russian steamers came out of Sebastopol and attacked some ships of the allied fleet, and afterwards regained shelter at the batteries.—The affair seems to have been a running fight. The main body of the allied fleet was at Baldzik. The London Times says that Napier intends to offer battle to the Russian fleet or to reconnoitre the defences of Cronstadt, rather than to make a regular attack on that place.

Spain.—A military insurrection, headed by O'Donnell, has broken out in Spain, four thousand of the Madrid garrison having marched out in the direction of Toledo. Accounts are conflicting. One account says that the Queen's cause was hopeless; another, that she had been well received by the troops and populace at Prado. The Capital was quiet, and the provinces tranquil. It will depend on mere accident which party triumphs. The government is very feeble. The insurgents number 7000, of whom 2000 was cavalry. They demand the dismissal of the Ministry, and Queen's favorites. The outbreak, as yet, is entirely military. An action took place near the village of Vicabraro; the insurgents charged three times unsuccessfully, and at length, after a great loss, retreated upon Toledo. The royalists would again attack them, when the reinforcement expected arrived from Saragossa and Valadolid.

All the Europen harvests are promising.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige and save us immense labor and perplexity if they will strictly adhere to the following rules:

1. Over all communications designed to be published write, For the World's Crisis.

2. Over all communications not designed for the public write, Private.

3. At the head of all letters write the date, never failing to give the STATE, and also County, if written from the Middle, Western or Southern States.

4. Write all orders for the paper or for books on a page by itself, beginning thus, Order for the Crisis, or, Order for books, as the case may be.

5. At the close of each letter containing money write the amount, and to whom it is to be credited.

6. Be careful to write names and P. O. addresses in a legible hand.

7. In returning papers write on the paper the name and P. O. address of the person to whom it had been sent.

8. In preparing matter for the Crisis we hope our correspondents will adopt, as the most important and indispensible of all rules, the practice of commending the subject to God, praying fervently for light to be reflected on the position of the Church, and for heavenly manna to feed and nurture the little flock unto eternal life—also that sinners may be induced to flee from impending wrath, and take refuge in the ark before the deluge takes them all away. [illegible] carefully read over, corrected, and, if need be re-written, punctuated and prepared for the press, so far as the writer has ability so to do. If, however, the writer does not understand punctuation, &c., the Editor is just as willing, and if possible more so, to serve the humblest member of the flock in bringing his or her sentiments and feelings before the public, as those who have been favored with higher educational advantages, provided only they write under the influence of the Spirit of God.

Business Items.

☞ The price of our Hymn Books at wholesale is $11 per hundred. We have formerly sold them at 12 1-2 cts at retail, but those who order them by express complain that it is lower than they can afford them, consequently it has been thought best to raise the retail price to 15 cents. ☞ When the names of new subscribers are sent they should be marked as such.

Persons are particularly requested, when writing to this office, to let the business part of the letter, as well as notices of all kinds, stand in a place by itself. We find that some things have been overlooked in consequence of not being separate.

The Earth Renewed.

BY [illegible] STARR.

Lo! from creation's brow the stain of sin
Is wiped. The earth with freshness blooms again,
In primeval beauty sweet; fair as when
The morning stars their joyous anthem sang,
O'er young creation's birth. Drear desert wilds
In smiling verdure wave, decked with flowers
Unfading, more beauteous far, than when
To life they first awoke in Paradise.
Delicious groves the verdant hill-tops crown;
With graceful palm, and fir, and stately pine,
With Lebanon's cedars and oaks of Bashan,
In majesty wave.

Tuneful rills in songs
Break forth, and the musical murmur rich,
Of the crystal fountains' play, in each vale
Is heard. While bright winged songsters echo forth
Their hymnings sweet, the spicy groves among.
The lion and kid, the wolf and gentle lamb,
[illegible]
No longer reigns, but peace her bright banner
O'er all doth wave! Thus in prospective sweet,
Doth rise hill and dale, and flowery vale,
With perennial verdure sweetly clad;
While on yon heights, with radiance seven fold,
Salem's bright city glorious to view
Appears, with jasper walls and pearly gates,
Outshining far, the wealth of Ophir or Ind,
Or of Eldorado in legend wild,
On earth far-famed.

Before its glory sublime,
Earthly pageantry to nothingness sinks,
Like the bubble on ocean billows thrown.
O! vision effulgent! defying the range
Of the mind's soaring pinion to surmount,
Or paint the beatitude of thy bliss.
Myriads of earth's redeemed, immortal,
The gold-paved streets of the city throng, or forth
From its ever-open gates, wander o'er
The bright fields elysian of Paradise;
A host refulgent, with the radiance
Of eternal love encanopied.
Yonder rolls life's river, its waves along,
While high on its ever verdant banks,
Life's immortal tree, with fruit ambrosial,
Wide its branches spread. Thither the seraph host
Their joyous footsteps tend, with golden lyres,
To lays of angelic sweetness attuned.
Hark to the blest symphony, as forth from
Their ranks, along the heights of Zion it rolls.
No discordant note the harmony breaks,
But one song, redemption the theme inspiring,
All tongues employ.

Bliss extatic reigns o'er all,
And o'er all breathes an atmosphere healthful,
Pure, by noxious breath or miasma foul
Undefiled; no deadly simoon's hot breath
Or sirocco's withering touch, e'er sweep
These verdant plains. No earthquake dire, the earth
Upheaving, or volcano long pent up,
Bursting wildly forth.

No dark, angry clouds
Veiling with gloom bright summer's azure sky,
Nor tempest raging wild, the earth deforms;
No wild, wintry blast sweeping o'er the plains,
Nor mournful Autumn's requiem sad, the dirge
Of buried hopes sighing forth. But sweet
Spring
Perennial reigns. No ling'ring disease
Consuming life away, nor shrouded bier
To the dark tomb borne sadly on; for Death
No longer sad dominion holds. No foe's
Invading footstep e'er is heard, nor war's
Wild clarion ringing loudly forth, for
Time's raging scenes to silence are hushed,
And now one Sovereign, universal,
O'er his people reigns.

Signs of the Advent.

"Look up" for ye know that "your redemption draweth nigh." "What sign dost thou give us?" Many signs; "signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken."—These are the signs given us by our divine Master, by which we should be able to determine the near approach of the kingdom of God, and their literal fulfilment makes our proximity to the "day of God" a matter of certainty. "When these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh;" but, "when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand." Bless the Lord for such assurance. Has not God showed "wonders in the heaven and in the earth, blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke?" Has He not turned "the sun to darkness, and the moon into [the appearance of] blood?" Has He not shaken down His stars upon the earth, like the casting of "untimely figs?" Is not "evil" going "forth from nation to nation;" "distress, with perplexity;" the great "powers" being "shaken?" "He that hath ears, let him hear;" yea, he that hath eyes, let him see the faithfulness of our God in bringing to pass his purposes upon the earth! O, what a glorious prospect opens up to the eye of faith! "the King in His beauty" descending through the skies; the sleeping saints awakened by his mighty voice, arising from the dust [illegible] the twinkling of an eye, and "caught up to gether with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air." O, "that blessed hope! and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ." Brethren and Sisters, "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning; like men that wait for their Lord." "Behold, he cometh!"

R. WAKEFIELD.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SOUTH BROOKS, ME.

Brother Merriam:—I take up my pen with feelings not easy to be described.—Beyond a doubt, in my mind, we shall witness the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ, in the clouds of heaven THIS YEAR. We are therefore within a few days of that event. A [illegible] moment to those who are unprepared—but glorious to those who are ready. I feel that we are making our last [illegible] in this world. My heart is full.—I see the ungodly and the sinner disappearing from my view, and there now stands before my mind the professed believers in the Lord's near approach. But what shall I say to them? Alas! we have all been slumbering and sleeping, both the wise and the foolish; but so our Savior told us it would be; and "thus the scriptures are fulfilled." This is the last prophecy relating to events which are to precede the personal advent of our Lord. Now comes the True Midnight Cry. The previous was but the alarm. Now the real one is sounding. Yes, glory be to God.

And Oh, how solemn the hour! The "virgins" have been asleep; yes, all of us; asleep on the time. But the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth.—"Behold the Bridegroom cometh" this year, "Go ye out to meet him." Our work is now to wake up the "virgins," who "took their lamps and went forth to meet the Bridegroom? Where are we now? "If the vision tarry, wait for it." Has not this been our answer since 44? What happened while the Bridegroom tarried? The virgins all slumbered and slept.—Christ's words have not failed; and "the scriptures cannot be broken." It is of no avail to pretend we have been awake: we have been slumbering; not on the fact of Christ's coming, but on the time. We came into the tarrying time—we did not know "how long" it would tarry, and on that point some of us have slumbered—some of us have said in our sleep, "don't fix another time;" so we slept. Now the difficulty is to wake the virgins up. Lord help, for vain is the help of man. Speak thyself, Lord.

O, that the "Father" may now "make known the time.

In 1 Pet. I: 11, it is positively declared that the Spirit of Christ in the prophets, did testify the time for the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow and that glory was to be "at the revelation of Jesus Christ." Speaking of the prophets, Peter says,—"Searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ, which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow * * * Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ." Here we have the fact stated, that the Spirit of Christ did reveal to the prophets the time, not only of Christ's sufferings, but of his glory, or "revelation." Peter shews us the time revealed was not literal but symbolical. "What manner of time?" He also says, that "the angels desire to look into" these "things." By turning to the 12th chapter of Daniel, we find, that after the angel had finished the detailed explanation of the visions, and wound up with the standing up of Michael, [one like God.] the resurection of the saints, and the shining forth of those that had turned many to righteousness &c., Daniel sees, (verse 5,) two angels; "and one said to the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters, of the river, How long shall it be to the end of these wonders." And Daniel heard the man clothed in linen "when he held up his right hand and his left hand unto heaven, and sware by him that liveth forever, that it shall be for a time, times, and a half; and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people all these things shall be finished." This person thus swearing was none other than the Lord Jesus Christ; and he sware to time, and time connected with the second advent, the resurrection, and the glorification of his people. The time, however, is symbolical. But will any man take the position that the Lord Jesus sware to time that meant nothing? Or, which is the same thing, sware, with the most solemn oath, to time that he intended should never be understood? Time is revealed but it cannot be understood without obeying Christ, and "inquiring and searching diligently" what, and what manner of time. Those who are too indolent to search, or who are afraid to follow truth when they find it, for fear of man, whose breath is in his nostrils, will of course remain in ignorance of time, and that day, most likely will come upon them unawares.

O heed the Cry and wake from sleep. "Behold! the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him!!!

Reader, have you heard this solemn "Cry," which has so suddenly awakened the virgins, who were slumbering and sleeping during the tarrying of the vision? Have you heard it while it has been borne on the wings of the wind to every advent church in the land, and aroused them simultaneously from their slumbers, electrifying them with its startling appeal? If you have not, then it is high time to awake out of sleep, and listen to its solemn notes? The cry has gone forth, the Lord, "whose goings forth are from everlasting," is to [illegible] judgement this present year!!! And will you listen to the [illegible] arguments, which are advanced for its support?

In 1844, on the 10th of the 7th month, we believed the Lord would come; and we thus taught, because we thus believed; and when it passed by, and the event for which we looked was not realized, we regarded it as an inexplicable mystery.—Yet we held on to the blessed hope by the new light which was thrown upon the scripture promises: and in which we saw that the vision must tarry to fulfill the jots and titles of God's word; and that we were to wait for it. We saw by the prophecy of Habakkuk 2: 1–4, that when the vision had been written and made plain upon tables, so those who should read it might run and proclaim the message of the coming Savior, it would then appear to [illegible], and we were to wait for it. The vision was still, however, to be for a time appointed, at the end of which it would surely come, and would no longer tarry; should speak, and not lie. That this had reference to the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, we were assured by St. Paul's quotation of it in Heb. 10. 35–39, and his comments upon it, by which he has shown us, that when we had done the will of God in thus writing the vision, we should have need of patience, that we might receive the promise, when, "yet a little while, and he that is to come will come, and will not tarry." God had also shown us by the prophet Ezekiel, 12: 21–28, that the opposers of the advent were to have an opportunity to say the days were prolonged, and every vision had failed. But the same divine word also assured us that when they should thus say then God would speak; and the word that he should speak would come to pass, [illegible] that proverb should be used no more, and then should be the effect of every vision. Notwithstanding we saw there [illegible] such an apparent delay, yet we [illegible] the time of this delay altogether [illegible] and that we could have no more [illegible] to the particular time of the Lord's Advent; and that while it must be near, and might be momentarily expected, yet we could only wait and watch for his coming. We again, contrary to our expectations, find that the Advent churches have been every where electrified by the proclamation of a definite time—viz. 1854. This cry has gone on the wings of the wind, and has been with joy received by a great majority of those who were looking for the Lord in 44, and has also had its compelling effect upon those in the highways and hedges.—And the effect upon such has been most salutary. It has produced deep and abiding solemnity on the minds of those who have received it; and a solemn stillness pervades the meetings of those who believe it. It has caused a giving up of this world, an abandonment of its pleasures, and cares, and a patient waiting for his Son from heaven,—such as has not been witnessed since '44. The whole effect has been so salutary, and it has been so simultaneously and widely extended, that it cannot be accounted for, except through the power of God. It has also been a perfect fulfilment of the parable of the ten virgins in the 25th of Matthew. And we have the movement of the nations to confirm and strengthen us in our position. Glory to God, Daniel will stand in his lot this year, and Christ will appear to us that look for him the second time without sin unto Salvation. O, dear sinner, "behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven; and the proud yea all that do wickedly shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts." O fly to Christ before it is eternally too late.

Your Brother looking for redemption this year, W. C. ROBERTS.

DAYSVILLE, Ogle County, Ill., July 10, 1854.

Dear Bro. Merriam:—Although a stranger to you in person, yet united in the 1854, and children of the same common Father, I make free to call you brother.—I wish to state to you a few facts connected with myself and the Advent cause in this this part of the world.

During the winter of '52, Bro. Samuel Chapman, formerly of Harford, Conn., but now a missionary in Illinois, visited our country. This was the first Advent preaching I had ever heard. I knew nothing of the doctrine; all that I ever heard on the subject was occasional remarks about Millerites. The subject was always treated with so much ridicule and contempt, that I supposed, as a matter of course, Millerism resulted from the teachings of corrupt and designing men; consequently I was not in a frame of mind to hear without prejudice on the subject. These circumstances, together with my being taught to believe the fables of the last days, made me unwilling to hear on the coming of the Lord. But, thanks be to God, I did hear from that godly man on this all-important subject; and thrice blessed be His name for a heart to believe so sweet a truth as that which tells of Jesus coming to establish his kingdom, and destroy them that destroy the earth.

Brother Chapman spent about four months of the most untiring labor in this county, during which time he baptized some fifty or sixty new converts. Sarcely, however, had Bro. C. gone, when men came among us who taught new and different doctrines, which had the effect to distract and divide the minds of the young and unsuspecting in the little flock, the evils of which will only be known at the final judgment of all the earth. Another cause of confusion among us has been the fact, that the most of our number take the Advent Herald, which has always been considered the organ of the Advent church. And Bro. C. himself recommended it to the brethren, believing it would strengthen and instruct us on our way to the kingdom. How far this opinion was true, the sequel will tell. Bro. Chapman taught that the signs of the times, as foretold in Matthew 24th, were past, and as a matter of course our Lord must come soon; but the Herald, instead of corroborating this theory, has contained long articles endeavoring to show that the signs of the coming of Christ could not be distinctly recognized in the past. This will not do—"a house divided against itself cannot stand." Some of us are determined not to let our ears be turned from the truth, while we have God's word and the Holy Spirit to seal its instructions to our understanding. We do not accuse any of wilful wrong, but men are fallible, even the wisest and best of them; and God has told us to cease from man whose breath is in his nostrils.

The truth is, if the tribulation spoken of by our Saviour is not past, the whole is yet in the future; but if the tribulation is past, then are the signs also past, which I believe, and so do many others in this section. I do not judge any, but hope all are sincere, and that God in his mercy will protect us from the false teachings and errors of these last perilous times, and at last gather us, with all the true Israel, into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, for his great name's sake. Amen

Your brother, looking for the Lord in 1854. CHESTER MURPHY.

NEWARK, N. J., June 27, 1854.

Dear Bro. Merriam:—The brethren in Newark are strong in the faith of the Lord's coming for the final redemption of his people this year; and their united cry is, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus;" and although sinners are not flocking to the standard of the Cross as we could wish, yet we thank the Lord that it is as well with us as it is. The Crisis has done good through the blessing of God, and the labors of God's servants have been blest of him. The Midnight Cry has aroused the Virgins, and our numbers gradually increase. We praise the Lord that we have trimmed our lamps, and have gone forth to meet the Bridegroom. The lamp gives a pure and permanent light, and shines even to the end of the church's pilgrimage. It is indeed a sure word of prophecy, which shineth in a dark place: but it is soon to be superseded by the dawn of day, and the bright, effulgent light and glory of the Sun of Righteousness. Then the earth shall be "filled with the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea;" "for as I live, saith the Lord the whole earth shall be filled with my glory." "The desert and the solitary place shall be glad for them, and the wilderness shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." The earth will be clothed with more than its primeval beauty; for it will be incorruptible and unfading; those who inhabit it will be also incorruptible; they will be equal to the angels in all the powers of their existence; neither will they die any more. ☞ The above Diagram is designed to illustrate the measurement of time from the rise of the little horn, with eyes and a mouth (the civil power of the Greek Empire, or Eastern Rome incorporated with the Ecclesiastical Power of the Papacy.—Dan. 7: 8) until the coming of Christ at the resurrection of the saints.

The 1290 years, or time, times and the dividing of time, (Dan. 7: 25) measure the period during which the saints, times and laws were to be given into his hand—The period of the saint's tribulation, we understand, were shortened to 1260 years, (Rev. 12: 6, 14—11: 2 and 13: 5); but times and laws were to remain in his hand during 1290 years, extending 30 years beyond the 1260. "But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion to consume and destroy unto the end." 45 years from the close of the 1290 make 1335 years, when Daniel will stand in his lot, which must be at the resurrection of the saints.

Christ, speaking of this desolating power—the papacy—says, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened,"—which marks a point previous to which the saints were taken out of the hands of the little horn power. Thus we perceive that 1260 years of the 1335 ended prior to the 19th of May, 1780, when the sun was darkened. Add 75 years to 1260 and you have 1335 years, which must end before May 19th, 1855, according to the evidence from the darkening of the sun. But we have abundant historical evidence that the papal power, i. e. the abomination that maketh desolate, was set up in 519, hence the 1335 days (years) end in 1854, which brings the coming of the Lord and the resurrection of the saints the present year.

will possess a heavenly country, and in that country "a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God." The lamp of truth gives the heirs of salvation a glimpse of it now, but its actual dimensions and glory may not yet appear. But it is clear there will be no rival cities. Look at its dimensions—twelve thousand furlongs square—fifteen hundred miles at least. God, I believe, will make it large enough to contain all the redeemed; for "the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it, and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor into it." The literal land of Palestine is not large enough for one-tenth of such a city; and then the glory of it—human tongue or pen must forever fail of giving an adequate description of the same.—"The Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the Temple of it." "No need of the sun, or of the moon to shine on it; for the glory of God will lighten it, and the Lamb will be the light thereof." "There shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie; but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life."—Seeing then that we look for such things, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and Godliness, having our names written in season in the Book of Life, and our robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb?

Amen. JOHN BROWE.

P. S. Brother Flavell has returned from Europe, after having scattered the light in that now benighted land.

BRADLEY, ME., April 21, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—Knowing that the friends of Zion rejoice to hear that the work of the Lord is prospering, down in those last moments of time, I feel it duty to let you know that in this place the Lord is raising up a people to praise his name and be ready when he comes to hail him with joy, and say, "Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him and he will save us." Having been informed by Brother Bragg that there was an ear to hear in this region, I came to Old Town last Friday, and had a meeting in the evening. The people seemed to be willing to hear, and candid in the matter, with the exception of a few who want to fulfill the signs of the last times. On Saturday, I came to Bradley, and had a meeting in the afternoon and evening, from which time we have had meetings every day, never failing of a large congregation. Bro. Reid is laboring here with me now. There have been, as near as I can ascertain, about 15 who have been emancipated from the power and thraldom of Satan, and brought into the glorious light and liberty of the gospel; and quite a number more who have manifested their determination to serve the Lord, and requested an interest in the prayers of the children of God.—The interest is still increasing, and I hope a mighty host in this place may be wise in this their day, and know the things that make for their peace, while the last, lingering notes of mercy are sounding in the sinners ear; for soon it will be proclaimed from the throne of God, "IT IS DONE," soon the Savior will leave the mediatorial seat; then it will be in vain to cry for mercy; soon the Church will have done her work, and the spirit of God be withdrawn from the world. Oh! gloomy thought for those who are unprepared. Fellow traveller to the Judgment seat, are you prepared to meet your God? Is your treasure laid up in heaven, or is it on earth? Is your peace made with God? Is the Judge your friend? These are solemn questions, the momentous importance of which will soon be realized by you and me. The whole human family will be divided into two classes, one of which will not be in darkness, that that day should overtake them [illegible] as a thief in the night; the other will know it not till the actual presence of that day shall overtake them, and they sink beneath the curse, and sink to rise no more. Whil'st I contemplate on the great destruction that awaits the mass of mankind, it causes me to sigh for the abominations that are done in the land. My heart yearns for sinners, who are unprepared. I love their souls, and fain would do them good; but I cannot save them. I can only warn them of the danger, and invite them in my master's name to a free salvation, whether they will hear or forbear. But thanks be to God, the humble child will be safe amid the crash of worlds. Glory be to God, the prospect now grows brighter, the path of the just shineth more and more till the perfect day. R. H. CLARK.

NEW MILFORD, CT., June 5, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—Although not a subscriber for your paper, I have had the privilege of reading a few numbers, and truly it seems to be imparting meat in due season to the wayworn pilgrims, who have long been climbing the rugged pathway towards Mount Zion.

It is now a little more than three years (though very long, long years) since I became a follower of the meek and lowly Jesus. Hard indeed was the struggle, as I bade adieu to my young companions, and left the world behind with all its joys, its sorrows, its cares, and with it, friends that I dearly loved. Yet cheerfully, I followed the despised little flock into the field, which looked so beautiful and green, for I thought in a few more days the good Shepherd would come and gather them into the fold, no more to go out forever. But ah! He tarried. Lonely and weary I watched the rising beams of day-light, and beheld the shades of night close around so many times, until sorrow had found a lodgment within my lonely heart. Just then the cry comes rushing through the land, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh." It imparted new life, new strength, new energy, and fresh zeal; and enabled me to lift up my drooping head and rejoice.

And now, my Brother, will you have the kindness to send me one of the messengers which advocates the same cheering news, and seems to be wafted on by the same gentle spirit that adorned our lowly Savior. I will endeavor to read it carefully, and prayerfully, and try to persuade others to do the same. And may God speed the cry through the land, is the prayer of your unworthy Sister in Christ.

ELVIRA S. FENN.

EXETER, June 19th 1854.

Dear Brother Merriam:—As we see published in the last Crisis, a polite and gentle solicitation, for those who wished the paper to go on to help somewhat to replenish funds for the same, and as we feel that the paper has, and does do under God a great deal of good, we feel anxious and willing to cast in our mite. There is a little band of Brethren in this place that are looking for that same Jesus, that was taken up into heaven to come in like manner as He went, and that very soon; we view the signs to be in the past, with the exception of what are now present, such as the angry state of the nations. We believe this is the great conflict that winds up the things of earth, and at the time appointed the end will be. Many think that there is time enough in the limits of this year for the king of the north, (if he comes like a whirlwind, as the angel said he would,) to plant the tabernacles of his palace between the seas in the glorious holy mountain. Now, dear Brother, we want the paper continued; we love the doctrine it advocates, and the spirit in which it is addressed, and I hope God will still bless the conductors and readers of the paper until the Lord comes.

Yours, looking for the Lord soon,
WILLIAM EDGERLY.

Bro. Merriam:—As there is everything going at the present time which is calculated to lead the children away from the true and living God, and feeling as I do, that we are almost within a "stone's throw," so to speak, of that beloved city which the prophets and apostles saw afar off, perhaps it would be my duty, at this time, to say a few words to stir up the pure minds of your readers by "way of remembrance."

I have, from the commencement of this cry, believed that the cry of "peace and safety," would be made; indeed, I don't see how it can be otherwise, since the "Scriptures cannot be broken." Since the last intelligence has been received from Europe, I am more convinced than ever that such will be the case. But blessed be God, it does not shake my faith in the least. My hope and trust is in God.—But there are many, I fear, that will fall through unbelief, especially as they are about to enter the haven of eternal rest.—But, beloved brethren and sisters, be not deceived. Suppose the nations do not move just as we expect, what then? Shall we begin to doubt God? Is our faith founded upon the rock of truth, or the move of the nations? Is not the God of Israel able to carry onward His own cause? Will he not manage it as seemeth good in his sight? That Christ will come upon the whole earth as a snare, is clearly demonstrated in the word of God. O, then, do not join with those who are crying, "peace and safety," for sudden destruction will come upon all such. But watch and be sober.

In regard to the movement of the nations, I do not expect to see much fighting just yet; for the "angels are holding the four winds," while God is sealing his servants in their foreheads. But the work is about accomplished. Soon it will be said, "the kingdoms of this world have become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ." O, then, brethren, can we not be faithful a little while longer? Be not carried about by every wind that blows, but "stand still and see the salvation of God." Soon we shall be redeemed from this sin-cursed earth, which the polluted breath of men and devils has defiled.—Soon we shall shout and sing praises to God in his everlasting kingdom, which the blessed Jesus has taught us to pray for in his word. The 10th day of the 7th month (Jewish time,) will never pass till Jesus comes. Then let your loins be girt, and your lamps burning, as men waiting for their Lord.

Before closing, allow me to make a little contrast between the spirit of prophecy and the EXPECTATION of the Church:

Christ.—"When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?"	Church.—"Faith? yes, it will so abound that the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea."
Christ.—"As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be at the coming of the Son of man."	Church.—"Not so; for then all men shall know the Lord, from the least to the greatest."
Christ.—"Likewise also, as it was in the days of Lot, even so shall it be when the Son of man shall be revealed."	Church.—"When the Son of man cometh, the whole world shall have been converted."
Christ.—"The harvest is the end of the world. Let the tares and the wheat grow together till the harvest. The tares are the children of the wicked one, and the wheat the children of the kingdom."	Church.—"We are to expect a thousand years of millennial glory, before the end of the world, in which there shall be no tares; for all shall be righteous; iniquity shall be sought for, and it shall not be found."
Apostle.—"Through much tribulation we must enter into the kingdom of God."	Church.—"For a thousand years we shall have no tribulation—no tempting devil, no oppressor, not a dog to move his tongue."
Apostle.—"There shall be scoffers in the last days, saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning."	Church.—"In the glory of the last days, holiness to the Lord shall dwell on every tongue; for all shall sing the high praises of God. Hence there can be no scoffers."
WORD OF GOD.	SPIRITUAL INTERPRETATION.
"For in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die.—Gen. 2: 17.	"Ye shall not surely die; for God doth know, that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil."
"The soul that sinneth, it shall die."—Ez. 18: 4, 20.	"The soul that sinneth, it shall not die, but live forever in misery."
"The wages of sin is death."—Rom. 6: 23.	"The wages of sin is not death; but it is eternal life in fire."
"Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death."—James 1: 15.	"Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth not death, but eternal life in pain and woe."
"Blessed are the meek; for they shall inherit the earth."—Matt. 5: 5.	"Blessed are the meek; they shall not inherit the earth; but inherit a region beyond the bounds of time and space."
"Where I go, ye cannot come."—John 13: 33.	"Where I go, ye can and shall come at death."
"If I go away, I will come again."—John 14: 3.	"If I go away, I will not come again; but will send my spirit to enlighten and convert the world, and this shall be my second coming."
"This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."—Acts 1: 11	"This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall not so come in like manner, but in a spiritual manner."
"And if Christ be not raised, then they which have fallen asleep in Christ have perished."—1st Cor. 15: 17, 18.	"No matter whether Christ be raised or not, those which have fallen asleep in Christ, have entered into everlasting happiness above."
"So man lieth down, and riseth not; till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep."—Job 14: 12.	"So man lieth down and riseth again; as soon as the breath leaves the body, they awake, and are raised out of their sleep."
"For yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be; yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place and it shall not be. For the wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs; they shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away."—Ps. 37: 10, 20.	"For yet a little while, and the wicked shall be; thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall be in the lake of fire."
"The blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen, nor can see."—1st Tim. 6: 15, 16.	"All men have immortality, and all good men, at death, approach unto and forever dwell in that light."
"My sheep hear my voice, and I give unto them eternal life."—John 10: 27, 28.	"Whether they hear his voice or not, all men have eternal life; for their souls never die."

Now this might be called spiritualizing, or bending the word of God to the fables of men, just as one pleases; but it is doing the same thing that the serpent did in Eden—pretending that God says one thing and means another. O, when will people learn to take God at his word? to believe that he means what he says?

One would hardly think it possible for those ministers of the gospel who say, not in their hearts only, but with their lips, "My Lord delayeth his coming," to read the terrible warning pronounced upon such, and not tremble as did Belshazzar when the Divine hand wrote his doom on his palace wall. Will not ministers see that they are literally joining hands with the drunken and vicious of all degrees, while they say my Lord delayeth his coming? Why is this doctrine of the second advent shut from the Church and from the prayer and conference meeting? If this is not a suitable theme for Christians to dwell upon in meditation, prayer, praise, conversation and exhortation, what is? I ask again what is a suitable theme if this is not? Are not those who do not love to hear of the Savior's coming clearly where they ought not to be? Can they claim that crown for themselves, which is laid up for all who love his appearing? It is in vain for any man to say he loves it, if he is disturbed whenever he hears it named.—"Where your TREASURE is," said the Savior, "there will your heart be also."—If Christ is to us the chief, we shall certainly delight to think him near. But, says one, I don't care so much about its being introduced into prayer and conference meetings on my own account, as on account of others; it makes a division of feeling. Whose feelings are hurt by it, I ask? Those who love the Savior as they should? If they are so destitute of the Savior's love as to be disturbed by the very sound of the idea of his coming, I ask if they are in a state of preparation to meet him, if he should come personally at the time?—"But we ought to be always ready."—True, but are you always ready, with such feelings of hostility to the theme? "We ought to be always watching." True, but are you always watching, while you believe the day a great way off? "But I do not know but it may come to-night." The very reason, then, why you should bestir yourself to look at the subject, and get all the light on it which the word of God affords. "But I do not believe the Bible teaches anything about it. Then how do you know he will ever come?—"O, it tells us he will come sometime, but nothing about the time." Then, I ask, if the Lord Jesus meant to deceive the Church, when he told her, "when you see the signs, then KNOW that it is near, even at the door?" He either meant so, or he did not. If he did not mean so, then He has practised deception. If he did mean what he said, then we may KNOW something about it, and are guilty if we do not. "But I mean, I do not believe we can know anything about the definite time." Why, then, not talk about all that can be known, and search the Bible to learn everything that is revealed on the subject? Why refuse to do it yourself, and be displeased if others do it? Do you not fear that by refusing to receive the light, God will withdraw what you now have, and leave you to believe a lie, to harden yourself against the appearing of the Savior, and that he will come and find you beating your fellow-servants for their faith in and love for his appearing?—"But you have a hard spirit, and are censorious, and think no one is a Christian who does not think as you do." Nay, nay, my Brother—my Sister! you wrong me. If you saw, or thought you saw, your neighbor's house on fire, I ask, would you not think it your duty to arouse them and tell them the worst you feared? Would you let them sleep on, lest, by trying to awake, you should offend them by your earnestness and importunity? I believe the Lord Jesus requires of all his ministers and people to look into this subject, and look out for his coming. I do not believe it can be neglected with impunity; and hence I must cry aloud to my fellow travelers. I should be guilty if I did not tell them all I fear will come upon them. Let them show me that my fears are ungrounded, and I will desist from my importunity. I cannot until then. I believe there are a great many good Christians who are yet in the dark on this subject, but will be waked up to it, and believe it before the Lord comes. But if any fight against it until that day arrives, and it finds them in that hostile, and consequently unexpecting attitude, they cannot go into the marriage feast. "But on what are your fears grounded?" I answer, on the latter part of Matthew 24, and a multitude of similar passages.

In all the Bible, I have never found one text that pronounces a wo in consequence of faithfully warning the world of danger, whether real or apprehended. But the Bible abounds with warnings and threatenings against those who neglect to warn the wicked, or who in any way soothe the fears of the guilty and the impenitent. I had rather give ten thousand false alarms, and have the consciousness of having done my duty, than that one soul should perish through my neglect. N.

The Waiting Ones.

"Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand, three hundred and five and thirty days." Dan. 12: 12.

What is meant by the word waiteth? To whom does it apply? There are many who profess to wait upon the Lord, by attendance at church, and by formal prayer at stated seasons. But Webster gives the definition of the verb wait, as follows:

1. "To stay, or rest in expectation: to stop and remain stationary till the arrival of some person or event.

2. To stay proceedings, or suspend any business in expectaton of some person or event, or the arrival of some hour.

3. To rest in expectation and patience."

The word fully implies that some event was expected by the waiting party, before it takes place, or tarries beyond the time at which it was looked for. In this sense the word is employed in the injunction (Hab. 2: 3.) Though it tarry, wait for it, because it will surely come and will not tarry. Or, according to Coverdale: "Though he tarry, wait for him," &c.

Who then are, or will be, the blessed waiting ones, at the termination of the days? Nothing can be more plain than that they will have looked for, and expected some event, before it takes place, and that they persevere in looking and waiting for it. There were many who looked for a glorious event in '43, and especially in '44, but they were disappointed, and where are they now? Have they all continued patiently waiting, and encouraging the confidence of each other from year to year? Blessed be the glorious Lord that a goodly number of them have; and have examined their charts with renewed vigilance, and eagerly embraced every ray of new light or evidence on the subject; and now that a very brilliant additional light has been given them, their joy has greatly increased, even to rapture. Many, however, of those who started with them at the first, have got their eyes so much affected by the dust of the earth, that they cannot see the present light, and are consequently inclined to deride or ridicule the joy of those who have been waiting and watching. It is true they have all slumbered; but some of them, as it were with their eyes open, retaining an upright position; while others have willingly reclined upon the earth, and hence the present dimness of their sight, so that the most brilliant and interesting objects, to them appear at very uncertain distances. But the most wakeful have the satisfaction of knowing that the number of the blessed waiting ones is not restricted to those who went forth with them in '44, but that numbers are daily joining the company with lamps well trimmed, and resolved to wait till the time appointed, that they may inherit the blessing. But the time will soon come, (probably in a few days,) when the indifferent (sleepy) ones will discover their error, and endeavor to obtain aid from the faithful watchers, or request their prayers and intercessions for them. But they will answer "Not so, lest there be not enough for us and you;" in other words, "It now requires all our attention and strength to keep our eyes fixed on the coming Lord, and keep our faith and confidence firm; pray to the Lord for yourselves." It may rationally be expected that as evidences of the immediate appearing of the Lord are developed, the rejoicing, waiting ones will become more and more absorbed in the subject of their own preparation and acceptation; and consequently more indifferent to all things else. And this state of mind is encouraged by the injunction, Luke 17: 31, "He that is in the field, let him not return back." The extacies of joyful hope, and expanded apprehension of approaching glory, will not, perhaps, diminish the personal solicitude of the saints to keep their confidence steady to the last moment.

Blessed, highly blessed are those who WAIT till the glorious King shall appear, coming in His glory with the holy angels.

Washington, D. C. R. P.

☞ D'Aubigne, the Author of the History of the Reformation, has recently published a work of great merit entitled, "History of Protestantism in Hungary," from which I extract the following to show how different the course of the Austrian government was subsequently to 1779, when the Church came out of her great tribulation, to what it was prior to that point of time.

The Protestant Church of Hungary had been brought to the very verge of ruin.—Under the appearance of faithfulness in carrying out the laws of the land, and zeal for the supposed cause of religion,—that is, for the support of the Church of Rome,—no opportunity of crushing the Protestants had passed by without improvement. From being a recognized and established Church in the country, with the same rights and privileges which belong to the Roman Catholics, the Protestant Church was reduced to a state of abject slavery, receiving fewer privileges than were accorded to the Jews. But little remained over, and Hungary would soon be like Austria, Carinthia, and Styria, where the very name of Protestants had ceased to exist.

But the Spirit of God moved upon the waters, and among those whom his gentle breath quickened, was Joseph II, Emperor of Austria.

* * * * * * * *

In the midst of all this confusion the emperor labored hard in repairing and clearing out the ship of Peter, in which the Bishop of Rome had under a false flag carried on for many years a most pernicious smuggling trade. The emperor knew the wares well, as also the secret stores, where they were kept, and the agents by whom they were disposed of.—During the regency with his mother, he had thoroughly studied the intrigues of Rome, and was resolved to free Catholicism at once from its foulest stain and its greatest weakness,—the Papacy; and at the same time to relieve Protestantism from its greatest scourge.

What served the emperor as guide in his work of reform seems to have been a protest of three electoral princes of Germany, handed to him during his regency, containing an appeal to the emperor against the usurpations of Rome.

There were also among the higher clergy in his own dominions men found who ably supported him in his noble work.—Among these was the Archbishop of Prague, Count Przichowsky, who had prepared a translation of the Bible for Bohemia. At his side stood the president of the theological seminary at Prague, a man capable of imbuing the minds of the students with a love of truth. The bishops of Budweis and Leitmeritz vied with John Leopold Hay, the Bishop of Koniggratz, in the noble race. The latter, in his charge to the clergy of his diocese, writes and exhorts them "not to search any more into the secrets of families, nor, under any pretence whatever, to deprive the people of their books. We urge you to peace; and what can become the servant of the Lord better than that he be found promoting peace among the Lord's people? Let there be an end of confusion, of persecution, and of devouring one another, for that is well-pleasing in the sight of God."

In the same spirit was the learned Bohemian prelate, Augustine Zippe, and the Abbot Stephen Rautenstrauch, striving to support the emperor. The latter wrote several pamphlets, explaining to the people the nature of the emperor's reforming measures.

Another of the worthies was Henry Kerren, Bishop of Vienna, who labored successfully in abolishing the superstitious use of relics, pictures, and images, amulets, and holy wells, or pilgrimages to them. He discouraged the offerings of wax, and silver shrines and images, and, for weighty reasons, directed the churches to be all closed at sunset. In the same spirit do we find the Archbishop of Salzburg, and also the emperor's ambassador at Rome, forwarding the good cause.

All these on the side of the emperor.—Against him, however, were arrayed the whole army of monks and and priests, especially the priests of Hungary, and Rome with her Italian policy.

That the emperor understood his position, and that he had thoroughly studied the strength of his antagonists, will appear evident from the close of his memorable letter to the Archbishop of Salzburg, on the commencement of his reign.

"I have," he writes, "a heavy work before me. I should reduce the army of monks, and should try to transform these fakirs into human beings. My task is to reduce the power of those before whose shorn heads the rabble bows with reverence, and who have gained a dominion over the citizens such as nothing can equal."

To give a full view, however, of the emperor's firm resolution and humane feelings, it is necessary to copy the letter which he wrote to the cardinal and legate, his minister at Rome. In his letter is much that is calculated to throw light on the so-called "Josephinism" with which a learned prelate of the latest times is attempting to blind the public. The letter is dated October, 1781, and is as follows:

"MY LORD CARDINAL,—Ever since I mounted the throne, and assumed the first diadem of the world, I have made philosophy to be the lawgiver of my kingdom.—It is necessary to remove out of the category of religion some things which never belonged to it. As I hate superstition and Phariseeism, I shall deliver my people from them. To this end I shall dismiss the monks, abolish their monasteries, and bring them all under subjection to the bishops of the diocese. In Rome they will call this an aggression on the divine rights. They will cry and lament that the glory of Israel is fallen; we shall hear that I am taking the tribunes of the people, and am drawing a line between dogma and philosophy. Bitterer still will be the rage when they hear that I have done all this without consulting the servant of servants, and awaiting his opinion.

"We must thank him for the degradation of the human intellect. Never shall we bring these servants of the altar voluntarily to keep their place and confine themselves to the preaching of the Gospel; never will these children of Levi be willing to give up the monopoly of wisdom and knowledge. The monastic principle has been from the very first directly opposed to reason; they give to the founder of their order a degree of honor approaching to divine worship, so that in them we see the antitype of the Israelites who went to Dan and Bethel to worship the golden calves. This false system of religion has taken possession of the mass of the people, who, while they know not God, except all from their patron saints!

"I shall restore the rights of the bishops, and give the people, instead of the monk, the regular priest, and instead of the legendary romance, a preached Gospel; where there is a difference of religion, there shall be a preaching of morality.

"I shall take care that my plans serve also for the future. The seminaries are the schools of my priests, where they shall come forth enlightened and prepared to communicate knowledge to the people, and in a period of less than a century we shall have Christians. My people will understand their duty, and children's children shall bless us for having freed them from a too powerful Rome, and for having shown the priests how to keep their proper place."

Armed with this intrepid spirit, and supported by a comparatively small number of friends, the emperor began his work of tearing down Rome's abuses.

For very intelligible reasons, the emperor strove to separate the clergy of his kingdom from all foreign influence. Accordingly, under date of 24th of March, 1781, he forbade all connection between the monasteries of the country and foreign monks or inspectors. No deputies dared be sent to attend deliberative meetings of clergy out of the country; and no foreign inspector dared give any directions or prescribe any penalties to those residing in the country. None but natives could be received into the religious brotherhoods, and neither monks nor nuns dared collect money to send out of the kingdom.

On the 26th of March, it was ordered that no papal bull should be published in any part of the empire, without first having obtained the emperor's sanction; the same principle was soon after extended to all foreign bishops whose jurisdiction extended in any way over the Austrian frontier.

Returned from his journey to France, he immediately issued the memorable decree, by which the bull "Unigenitus," and the still more infamous bull, "De Cœna Domini," must be expunged from the ritual; and on the 20th of June, a royal decree abolished the "religious patent," which the bigoted Ferdinand II. had laid on his people, and by which all dissent from the Church of Rome might be visited with the severest penalties. Another decree forbade the reception of novices into the cloisters, and ordered a correct census to be taken of the value of the property in the hands of the monks.

At the same time that these excrescences of the Church of Rome were pruned, and that the Roman Catholics were taught to distinguish between the essentials of religion and the customs of their Church, the Protestants, on the other hand, were permitted to taste privileges of which they had been long deprived. At the very commencement of his reign, the Protestants had handed the emperor a spirited memorial, detailing the historical development of their wrongs; and the monarch, who loved justice, was not slow in ordering that religious opinions should henceforth exclude from no civil office, and that fitness for the post should be the only qualification. This was the dawning of a bright day, and the full splendor of the sun of freedom burst out on the Protestants on the 24th of October, 1781, when the Edict of Toleration was forwarded to all the bishops of Hungary, with the direction to use their influence to persuade the priests to a kindly feeling towards the Protestants. The decree explaining and regulating this edict appeared in December, and contained sixteen articles:—

I. In all parts of the empire where the Protestants of both confessions were prohibited by law from holding meetings, they should now have liberty to meet privately for divine worship, without any inquiry being made whether Protestant meetings had been held there before or not.

II. His Majesty declares these private meetings to mean, not what they had been hitherto in Hungary, but that, in every district where there were one hundred or more families who possessed conjointly the means of building a church, school-house, and manse, without unfitting them for paying their other taxes, they should have liberty to build; their pastor should be free to visit the sick who wished to see him, without any limit whatever, only that the churches should have neither bell nor spire, and that there should be no entrance direct from the street.

III. No one possessing the necessary talents and qualifications for an office should henceforth be excluded on account of his religion. Protestants should have leave to buy and hold landed property, to practise trades, and to obtain academic honors in the same way as Roman Catholics, even in those places where they were hitherto prevented from doing so.

IV. No Protestant shall be obliged to swear by any form inconsistent with the fundamental principles of his religion. No one shall be obliged to attend mass. Much less shall any one be fined for absenting himself from the processions. All [illegible] hereby [illegible].

V. The Protestants shall in all cases keep possession of the churches they at present hold; and where these buildings are decayed, there is hereby perfect liberty granted to rebuild them of wood or stone; yet, with this limitation, that the expense be not above the means of the people.

VI. The chapels of ease which the Protestants possess shall remain in their [illegible] those [illegible] shall [illegible] to the Protestants.

In the remaining articles it was decreed regarding mixed marriages, that where the father is Roman Catholic all the children of both sexes should be educated in that faith; where the father was Protestant, the male issue should be Protestant. Priests were prohibited from visiting sick Protestants unless sent for; and no visitation of Protestant churches or examination of the pastor on the nature of baptism should henceforth be [illegible] by any priest.

The World's Crisis.

LOWELL, AUGUST 2, 1854.

MR. EDITOR,—Dear Sir:—I have heard of late the subject of future misery discussed, and wishing light on the passages which its advocates claim as certain proof, I know of no better source whence I could obtain this information, than to apply to you; hoping you, or some of your able correspondents, will be so kind (God helping,) as to give me this instruction.—I would mention in particular the parable of the rich man and Lazarus.

Yours truly,
A lover of light and truth.
BRIMFIELD, 1854.

As several individuals have requested light in reference to the future destiny of the wicked, and as many readers of the Crisis are doubtless prevented from identifying themselves with Adventists by strong prepossessions in favor of the popular theology, I have deemed it advisable to show from the scriptures, that our faith is based on the immutable word of God, and not on the traditions of men.

The economy of God as revealed to man is not one of retrocession, but of progress. It is not the evening twilight that fades as the receding sun throws more faint and feeble rays on the reflecting mirror of the west. In the plan of infinite wisdom the purposes of the divine government are from age to age more distinctly evolved. It is a maxim even in human governments that revolutions never go backward; and it is eminently so in relation to the developments of the divine economy. It seems to be a principle running through all the plans and purposes of God, that amid apparent defeats, amid partial and temporary reactions, there should be a gradual growth and development. "First the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear." Hence if we trace the "history of redemption," or the unfolding of the divine economy, if we glance the eye at the different eras in the history of the Church, we shall discover a gradual unfolding of the plan of salvation. The early ages of the world were doubtless enveloped in great obscurity; but in Patriarchal times the system of grace began to be revealed, and under the Mosaic economy the types and shadows, pointing to the great anti-typical sacrifice on Calvary, opened to the eye of faith more perfectly the way of life; and that dispensation was ushered in, in glory such as the world had never seen. But sublime and wonderful as were the scenes of that ritual dispensation, even "that which was made glorious had no glory in this respect by reason of the glory that excelleth." Now "the law and the prophets were until John;" since that time "the kingdom of heaven is preached." When John the Baptist stood in the twilight of the new dispensation, the economy of heaven was unfolded to his vision; his powers of apprehension were expanded by the contemplation of such glorious doctrines, such momentous truths as were developed in his day; so that "among them that are born of women there had not arisen a greater than John the Baptist," yet "he that is least," said our Saviour, "in the kingdom of heaven, is greater than he." There was in his day an unsealing of the book, an unrolling of the vision like a panoramic view, that disclosed the purposes of God; and those who were living in the clearest light, and communed most freely and intimately with the great Head of the Church, understood most perfectly "the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven." "If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine." "Henceforth," says Jesus, "I call you not servants; for the servant knoweth not what his Lord doeth; but I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard of my Father, I have made known unto you." John 15: 15.

I have referred to these great principles in the divine economy as a reason from analogy, that provided we are, as we believe, on the eve of a new epoch in the history of the church, standing in the dawning light of a new dispensation, we may expect some clearer developments of light, some more blessed truths to be evolved from the Oracles; not indeed a new revelation, but an eliciting of the light which lay concealed, like the latent spark struck out by steel.

Now leaving all prepossessions, let us examine the teachings of the word on this subject. "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word it is because there is no light in them." To understand this subject we need to begin at the foundation; to ascertain of what elements man is constituted, and upon what the sentence of death was pronounced. Man we find to have been formed out of the dust of the earth, (Gen. 2: 7) and when God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, man became a living soul. Out of inorganic matter, the Lord, formed an organization perfect in all its parts; but the organization denominated man was still insensate and inanimate; the principle of vitality was not there; therefore thought, and feeling, and motion, and consciousness were as foreign from the lifeless mass, as from any other clay. But the Lord "breathed into his nostrils the breath of life." We cannot apprehend this expression to be literal; but as the breath is the first and last indication of life, it is taken for the life itself. In other words, the idea is, God communicated to to the lifeless form the principle of vitality, or the power to inhale the vital air.—The action of atmospheric air on the vital organs creates a circulation of the blood; this in its turn acts on the brain, causing sensation and consciousness; and the organs of the brain being aroused, the whole machinery of the physical and intellectual system is set in motion. So that at his first formation, man was possessed of every member, organ, muscle, &c., of the bodily frame, but without life, consequently without thought, feeling, consciousness, &c.; but when the Lord breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, he immediately became a living, breathing, moving, sentient being. Now admit this idea, which I think is perfectly plain and obvious, viz., that breathing into his nostrils the breath of life was simply communicating to an inanimate system the principle of vitality, or animal life, and the idea of human philosophy, that at the creation a house of clay was formed, and a soul or immortal spirit was brought from some other region of the universe to inherit it, vanishes from the mind. The poet says, "press to thy native skies," and the heathen believe in the doctrine of a metempsycosis, or transfer of the soul from one habitation or body to another; both ideas are based on human reasoning, and not on scripture.—The scriptural principle being established, we at once perceive that when a man's life is extinct, the power of vitality which sets in motion the machinery of the body and mind, and induces consciousness, is lost; consequently all the functions of body and mind cease their action; and there can no more be thought, and feeling, and motion, and consciousness in the man after vitality ceases, than there could be after his formation, prior to receiving the breath of life; for all sensation and consciousness depend on the organism of the man excited by vital action.

I have dwelt thus long on this point because I consider it fundamental; and if we entertain clearly the scriptural view on this point, we shall be better prepared to appreciate a biblical argument on the whole subject. Now the question occurs, what significance is to be attached to the sentence of death as pronounced on the man? Gen. 3. "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." (mar. dying, thou shalt die.) Gen. 2: 17. In explanation of this sentence the Lord tells Adam, that after a life of toil and suffering, he would drop again into his original dust, or as the wise man expresses it, "Then shall the dust return to the earth, as it was; and the spirit (or breath of life) shall return unto God who gave it."—Death, i. e. the privation of life is simply reversing the process of man's creation; There is a return both of the body and of the spirit to their original state. The dust returns to the earth as it was, prior to the organization of the system; and the spirit or breath of life, or in other words principle of animal life, returns to the fountain whence it came; i. e. as God gave life at first, he takes it away at death. If the spirit be conscious and enjoying an independent existence subsequently to its release from the body, then by parity of reasoning, it was conscious and enjoying an independent existence antecedently to its connection with the body; for certainly if the fact that the spirit returns to God proves that it exists as a conscious being in His presence, then the fact that it came from God proves that it existed as a conscious being in His presence before its connection with the body. But the scripture gives no such intimation. It presents not the idea that a living, immortal soul entered as a tenant into the corporeal frame of the man, to be liberated again at death; the idea of scripture is, the lifeless man became a living soul, not admitted within himself a living or immortal soul.

But the sentence of death, some conceive, cannot touch the soul, for that is immortal. This position, however, is assumed. Where is the proof? Why the soul is an invisible, intangible, immaterial substance uncompounded and therefore indivisible and cannot die. True human wisdom asserts this, but what saith the scripture? "The soul that sinneth it shall die." Ezek. 18: 4. Here the principles of philosophy and the teachings of the word are in direct antagonism. If the soul be immortal, its essential condition is, that it can never die; but if we examine critically many passages of holy writ, we shall find abundant testimony to the contrary. Turn to the passage quoted, also 20th and 27th vs. of the same chap. Prov. 16: 17, "The highway of the upright is to depart from evil; he that keepeth his way preserveth his soul." Job 33: 22, 28 and 30, "Yea, his soul draweth near unto the grave, and his life to the destroyers." "He will deliver his soul from going into the pit, and his life shall see the light." "To bring back his soul from the pit, to be enlightened with the light of the living." I might refer to a great variety of passages, but a few are sufficient. The 33d ch. of Job is decisive on this point. It is here clearly represented, that in case of pain and disease the soul draws near to the grave; which could not be the case if it were immortal, and not subject to death. Ps. 49 is very clear and expressive. "None of them can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him: (for the redemption of their soul is precious, and it ceaseth for ever:) that he should still live forever, and not see corruption. Like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them; and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning; and their beauty shall consume in the grave from their dwelling.—But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave: for he shall receive me. Selah."—Vs. 7–9, and 14, 15. It represents that all the wealth, the abundant treasures of the wicked cannot save them from death. No one with all his riches can redeem his dearest friend, that he should still live and not see corruption in the grave; for the redemption of the soul (life) is too precious to be purchased with money. Although they may arrive at all the opulence and splendor and aggrandizement of the world, yet their pleasures are transient. Like the beasts they perish, "like sheep they are laid in the grave;" "but," says the Psalmist, "God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave. Here the contrast is brought to view, and it is this, that while the wicked will ultimately be consumed by death, and no final redemption of their souls is promised, the righteous through the merits of Him who died to redeem their souls from the power of the grave, have hope of deliverance when the Redeemer shall come; and then they will sing, "O grave where is thy victory, O death where is thy sting." If these references do not prove that the soul is liable to death, and to come under the power of the grave, then to my mind language is powerless to prove any thing. We never read in scripture of an immortal, imperishable, or undying soul, or of a soul that can never die. or that must live forever, and be in its existence parallel to the throne of God, &c., &c. Indeed immortality is never applied, in any form, to the sinner out of Christ, either in relation to his mind, or spirit, or soul, or other attribute. On the contrary the opposite truth is clearly revealed.

An evasion of this truth is sometimes resorted to by saying the death of the soul is spiritual; and it has passed into a proverbial expression, that the sentence of the Adamic law was "death temporal, death spiritual, and death eternal." To the idea of its being spiritual death, there are some considerations which are fatal. 1. It is explained in Gen. to be returning unto the DUST, which certainly is not spiritual death. 2. "As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive," 1 Cor. 15: 22.—"Therefore as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." The one assertion is as broad as the other; and both include all mankind; therefore it is inevitable, if it be spiritual death, that spiritual life must be the inheritance of all men. 3. If it be spiritual death, i. e. death in trespasses and sins, the penalty of the law demanded is sin, and not punishment. It is as if a law were enacted, that those who indulged freely in intoxicating liquors should be intemperate men; or that those who hold slaves, should be slaveholders. Intemperance and slaveholding are crimes, and not punishments; so being dead in trespasses and sins is the crime, and not the punishment of the sinner. 4. To make the law honorable its demands must be fully met; and as Jesus was without sin and never spiritually dead in trespasses and sin, He could not have paid the price of redemption in that sense. Here let me remark that formerly I could never understand the true relation of the atonement to the demands of the law; I could not see how Christ stepped in, in place of the transgressor, and presented a vicarious sacrifice, dying "the just for the unjust," "being made a curse for us," &c.; but with my present views, the nature of the atonement opens in a clear, rational and beautiful light. I can now see how He is the "Savior of all men;" how "as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive;" how He made "propitiation for the sins of the whole world;" how "judgment came upon all men unto justification of life," how infants can be saved, &c.; for the penalty of the law being natural death, He suffered it by "pouring out His soul unto death," and thus abolished death, or took off the Adamic penalty from the whole human race; or rather, I should say, purchased their ransom from the power of the grave. Hence it is said, "He rose again for our justification," i. e. He thus showed forth victory over death in vindicating the sinner's cause. Hence, also, He says, "I am He that liveth and was dead; and behold I am alive forevermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell (hades the grave) and of death," Rev. 1: 18. There is such a beauty, simplicity and harmony on this subject, I desire the reader might be favored with that divine illumination, which will present it to him in the clear, vivid light of scripture truth. It would then appear obvious, that being redeemed from the Adamic penalty, the infant cannot be condemned at the resurrection; for being delivered from the first death, occasioned by the sin of Adam, and not having personally sinned, it cannot be consigned to the second death.

But the question comes up, might it not be eternal death, or in other words, endless sufferings? Reasons already assigned in relation to spiritual death, bear also on this point. If an atonement were made by vicarious suffering, then the suffering endured, in order to make it vicarious, must precisely meet the case. Hence whatever death our blessed Redeemer endured, the same must answer the demand of the law, and be the identical death to which the sinner is condemned. Now at a glance we see it was not endless misery: it was the death of the cross; for the scripture assures us He was made "a curse for us; for it is written cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree," and again, "Who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree," 1 Pet. 2: 24; and again, "Forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the Devil," Heb. 2: 14. "Without the shedding of blood there is no remission." Hence the life of the Savior was offered instead of that of the transgressor. This is all simple and plain, without any of that mysterism which attaches to the theology of our day. Truth is always simple and clear when in God's light we see light.

Bro. Merriam:—In examining some books at the Library of the Theological Seminary, Andover, I came across one entitled "State of the Church in future ages. By W. H. London, 1684."

In speaking of Rev. 10: 4, the author translates thus: "Seal up those things which the seven thunders have uttered; and thou shalt write them hereafter." He thinks that John was to write something else first, and afterwards write what the seven thunders uttered. May it not be so?

W.

I do not know upon what authority this author thus translates the passage, I find nothing in the Greek, nor in Murdock's translation of the Syriac, that would favor such a version.

ED.

☞ We have received a letter from Bro. Hiram Bishop, of West Meriden, Conn., stating that his family is suffering for want of the necessaries of life. We are informed by Bro. Adrian, that he is a worthy Bro. and that he labors under infirmities. It is one of the plainest duties of Christianity to give to him that needeth. We hope, therefore, Brethren will obey the injunction, and communicate of their substance as the Lord hath prospered them.

This notice would have been given sooner; but it seemed advisable to wait until further information was received through Bro. Adrian.

☞ Bro. Scott: I will endeavor to be at the Camp-Meeting at Vernon, Vt.—Come my Brethren—come all, let us have a great and good meeting.

EDWIN BURNHAM.

☞ Our paper is so much filled up with notices, that we would request Brethren to write notices of Tent-Meetings, &c., as concisely as possible.

SOUTH BOSTON, MASS., July 20, '54.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I feel I must write you a few lines from this place; for I believe God is about to pour out His spirit of love upon this ungodly city.—This being the first correspondence from this part of Boston, you have received, I will throw out a few hints in regard to the people and place, (for you will soon hear from this quarter shoutings and rejoicings.) There are but three persons out of many thousands, who firmly believe in the Lord's appointed time; and we have been obliged the past year, to walk a distance of some two and a half miles, (back and forth,) to Chapman Hall to hear the truth. There is no Hall in this place but what is occupied nor has there been for two years past; but I have, (for one,) had faith in God's word (since I have been convinced on the subject of time, and the speedy coming of our Lord,) that He would open a way for us to have the glorious truth proclaimed to this people. He has answered my prayers; and I have been able to rent a small church, (on my own responsibility, of course, Bro., for you know no one in these days of prejudice would lend a hand to help the fanatics, as we are termed everywhere,) a fortnight since. It has been occupied by the Free-will Baptists. And now the Lord has sent to us Bro. Brittan, (who came to see me after the services at Chapman Hall, last Sabbath evening,) who feels that there is work to be done. If the Lord will, he will preach here next Sabbath, July 23d, and continue for the present. One thing I must not omit here; for it accords with my own views; the prospect here to any but a true child of God, is anything but inviting; great opposition, only a very few to go to worship, nothing but poverty held out as an inducement to preach the word, (for we are hard working individuals,) but the dear brother seeing all these circumstances, says, he has no doubt but this is the place for him to stop. Now, my Bro., I give God all the glory. I believe He is the same God in So. Boston, as in any other place: all that is required is the faith that will stand in the hour of trial, that will overcome all opposition, prejudice, and every other weapon the enemy may bring against us. I feel that He is about to work a great work here in So. Boston, and many sinners will cry out "Lord have mercy." I rather like this great opposition, to see the clouds look dark and dreary, and even to have every avenue closed to all appearance, against this work. It looks favorable to me, very much so, for the darkest time is just before day, and our necessity is God's opportunity. O my brother, when we look at the scenes now transpiring among the nations of earth, the time of trial that is coming on us all, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness? We cannot get along without the Crisis, those little refreshing hymn books also, we must have. They are full of life, and will cheer up at any time, the poor desponding soul. May God bless you in your great labor of love, and may He give to us all that spirit that will enable us to sacrifice time, talent, all we have, all we are, to His service. I have a laid all on the altar, and am bound for the kingdom, expecting, (at the longest,) to be there at the close of the spring of 1855.

Your brother in Christ,

WILLIAM WOOD.

CHOLERA IN LOWELL. We understand from good medical authority that, notwithstanding reports to the contrary in the newspapers, something like a dozen cases of Asiatic cholera have occurred in this city within four weeks past—we mean cases which our best physicians have pronounced to be of cholera. No alarm is entertained, however, that the disease will rage to any serious extent here. It is well, nevertheless, that the public should know the truth.

☞ In last week's paper I made a remark in respect to distributing my receipts which, it is thought, might be understood as referring to the receipts for the Crisis. I meant simply my own personal income for services, whether from the Office or from labors in the vineyard.

☞ It is stated in a letter quoted by the Parliamento of Turin, of the 2d, that the tomb of Odoacer, king of the Heruli, has been discovered at Ravenna by some workmen, who, it appears, found the body encased in a suit of armor of gold, which they broke into pieces and sold.

☞ 30 to 40 cholera deaths occur in Montreal daily.

NEW DISCOVERIES AT NINEVEH. The London Assyrian Excavation Society has just issued a most satisfactory report of the progress of their agent in Babylonia. The following extract is of the highest interest:

"In addition to the discoveries mentioned by Mr Loftus, the Committee have to announce that a new palace has been found at Nineveh, in the mound of Kouyunjik, of which Colonel Rawlinson reports in the following terms:

"'A most beautiful palace has been recently discovered at Nineveh, belonging to the son of Esar Haddon. The sculptures are infinitely superior in variety of subject, in artistic treatment, and in skill and delicacy of execution, to every thing which has been before found. The palace, also, is of great extent, containing, perhaps, five hundred sculptured slabs, and the marbles are generally in a good state of preservation.'

"In another letter he adds:

"'The new palace is by far the most magnificent thing yet discovered in Assyria.—Each hall, room, and passage is devoted to a separate subject, and where the series is complete, and the sculpture well preserved, as not unfrequently happens, is of extraordinary interest. In fact, the variety of subject, artistic grouping and treatment, high relief, richness of detail, and delicacy of execution, entitle the palace to be reckoned the chef-d'œuvre of Assyrian art. Some of the pavement slabs are most superb, and the animals, trees, and flowers, even the human figures, are much more natural and free from conventionalities than in any of the earlier palaces. There are between two and three hundred sculptured slabs already uncovered, and not above one half of the palace is yet explored.

"'Colossal bulls and lions there are none, but monsters, centaurs, hippogryphs, etc, there are as many as you please.

"'At one of the entrances there are a pair of round ornamented pedestals, which certainly supported columns; but as there are no remains of such columns, they must have been formed, I suppose, of wood.

"'On one slab there is a city with a double wall, and within, a temple, faced with a row of columns supported on the backs of animals.—On another there is a mound, on the top of which is a castle, and, to give more extent to the upper platform, a causeway is run out from the top of the masonry, with sharp-pointed arches stretching down the side of the mound.'

"Another private letter from a gentleman residing at Mosul, speaks in the same terms of praise of these new discoveries, and adds some further particulars regarding the subjects of the sculptures. In speaking of the slab representing the palace or temple alluded to above, he says: 'It represents very minutely the exterior architecture. The second story is built with pillars, which have their bases on the backs of lions and human-headed bulls, with their heads turned like those found at Khorsabad.' He also mentions the representation of a bridge with three pointed arches, and other particulars illustrative of the architecture of the period.

"One of the best executed slabs represents a lion-hunt. 'In this scene,' he says, 'the king is the principal huntsman, and is in the act of striking a lance into a lion springing upon his chariot, whilst seven others, already pierced by many arrows, some of which are dead, and others dying, are most beautifully and naturally portrayed upon the slabs. On another slab they have represented a park, with an open gate, through which is seen the king hunting lions, executed on a very minute scale, as if they intended it to appear far in the distance.'

"He concludes by saying 'that the art displayed in the treatment of both men and animals in these bas-reliefs surpasses every thing discovered in the ruins of Assyria.'

"The Committee take this opportunity of calling the attention of the subscribers to the progress recently made in the deciphering of the inscriptions, which comprise the identification of all the Assyrian kings mentioned in the Bible, of many of those whose names occur in profane history, extending the chronology of Assyria to a period of about two thousand years before Christ. An almost perfect series of the names of the ancient kings of Assyria has also been discovered, and numerous illustrations of the sacred Scriptures, of the highest interest."

AFFAIRS IN ST. PETERSBURG. An American writes from St. Petersburg to the New Bedford Mercury as follows:—

Since my arrival here, on the 10th of June, I have been waiting for the attack of Sir Charles Napier upon Cronstadt, and it has been hourly expected. But not an English or French sail has been seen from Cronstadt until this morning, when a large division of the fleet was seen approaching slowly. I hasten to give you this information, and if a battle takes place, I will lose no time in communicating the particulars. The fortifications at Cronstadt are very strong, and Napier will have a warm reception. English boasting produces considerable merriment here. Of one thing I can assure you; the war is very popular with all classes here, and the stories which you hear of revolutions here and of Imperial extortions, are all utterly false.

The English papers are guilty of fabricating all sorts of reports, to which no credit is to be given. It may sound odd, but the Russians of St. Petersburg call the English barbarians. They say: "If the English feel bound to protect Turkey, why do they not go to Constantinople?—Why do they come upon our Finland coast, to kill innocent people, burn little villages, destroy private property, and take away small vessels belonging to poor peasants? And this they do where no troops are quartered, and where there cannot be the least resistance. These are the acts of barbarians." There is some truth in these remarks. To see little villages, unprotected and unoffending, totally destroyed with many of their inhabitants, for pretended protection of Turkey, suggests only cowardice to the American mind.—Why do the Allies send so large a fleet to the Baltic, to be employed in destroying small towns? Why not try their hand at Revel, Riga, Hessenfort, Cronstadt? We begin to think here that Napier does not dare to come within range of the Russian guns, for, though he is now in sight, many think that it will be mere rashness to engage his ships with the batteries of Cronstadt. I shall go down to the fortress to-morrow, and in my next shall be better prepared to give you some interesting information.

TREATY WITH RUSSIA. A treaty has been concluded by Mr Marcy, with the Russian Charge d'Affaires which provides for perfect neutrality in the present war, and establishes as a principle of National law, the doctrine that free ships make free goods.

The World's Crisis.

LOWELL, AUGUST 2, 1854.

MR. EDITOR,—Dear Sir:—I have heard of late the subject of future misery discussed, and wishing light on the passages which its advocates claim as certain proof, I knew of no better source whence I could obtain this information, than to apply to you; hoping you, or some of your able correspondents, will be so kind (God helping,) as to give me this instruction.—I would mention in particular the parable of the rich man and Lazarus.

Yours truly,
A lover of light and truth.
BRIMFIELD, 1854.

As several individuals have requested light in reference to the future destiny of the wicked, and as many readers of the Crisis are doubtless prevented from identifying themselves with Adventists by strong prepossessions in favor of the popular theology, I have deemed it advisable to show from the scriptures, that our faith is based on the immutable word of God, and not on the traditions of men.

The economy of God as revealed to man is not one of retrocession, but of progress. It is not the evening twilight that fades as the receding sun throws more faint and feeble rays on the reflecting mirror of the west. In the plan of infinite wisdom the purposes of the divine government are from age to age more distinctly evolved. It is a maxim even in human governments that revolutions never go backward; and it is eminently so in relation to the developments of the divine economy. It seems to be a principle running through all the plans and purposes of God, that amid apparent defeats, amid partial and temporary reactions, there should be a gradual growth and development. "First the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear." Hence if we trace the "history of redemption," or the unfolding of the divine economy, if we glance the eye at the different eras in the history of the Church, we shall discover a gradual unfolding of the plan of salvation. The early ages of the world were doubtless enveloped in great obscurity; but in Patriarchal times the system of grace began to be revealed, and under the Mosaic economy the types and shadows, pointing to the great anti-typical sacrifice on Calvary, opened to the eye of faith more perfectly the way of life; and that dispensation was ushered in, in glory such as the world had never seen. But sublime and wonderful as were the scenes of that ritual dispensation, even "that which was made glorious had no glory in this respect by reason of the glory that excelleth." Now "the law and the prophets were until John;" since that time "the kingdom of heaven is preached." When John the Baptist stood in the twilight of the new dispensation, the economy of heaven was unfolded to his vision; his powers of apprehension were expanded by the contemplation of such glorious doctrines, such momentous truths as were developed in his day; so that "among them that are born of women there had not arisen a greater than John the Baptist," yet "he that is least," said our Saviour, "in the kingdom of heaven, is greater than he." There was in his day an unsealing of the book, an unrolling of the vision like a panoramic view, that disclosed the purposes of God; and those who were living in the clearest light, and communed most freely and intimately with the great Head of the Church, understood most perfectly "the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven." "If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine." "Henceforth," says Jesus, "I call you not servants; for the servant knoweth not what his Lord doeth; but I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard of my Father, I have made known unto you." John 15: 15.

I have referred to these great principles in the divine economy as a reason from analogy, that provided we are, as we believe, on the eve of a new epoch in the history of the church, standing in the dawning light of a new dispensation, we may expect some clearer developments of light, some more blessed truths to be evolved from the Oracles; not indeed a new revelation, but an eliciting of the light which lay concealed, like the latent spark struck out by steel.

Now leaving all prepossessions, let us examine the teachings of the word on this subject. "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." [illegible] formed out of the dust of the earth, (Gen. 2: 7,) and when God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, man became a living soul. Out of inorganic matter, the Lord formed an organization perfect in all its parts; but the organization denominated man was still insensate and inanimate; the principle of vitality was not there; therefore thought, and feeling, and motion, and consciousness were as foreign from the lifeless mass, as from any other clay. But the Lord "breathed into his nostrils the breath of life." We cannot apprehend this expression to be literal; but as the breath is the first and last indication of life, it is taken for the life itself. In other words, the idea is, God communicated to to the lifeless form the principle of vitality, or the power to inhale the vital air.—The action of atmospheric air on the vital organs creates a circulation of the blood; this in its turn acts on the brain, causing sensation and consciousness; and the organs of the brain being aroused, the whole machinery of the physical and intellectual system is set in motion. So that at his first formation, man was possessed of every member, organ, muscle, &c., of the bodily frame, but without life, consequently without thought, feeling, consciousness, &c.; but when the Lord breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, he immediately became a living, breathing, moving, sentient being. Now admit this idea, which I think is perfectly plain and obvious, viz., that breathing into his nostrils the breath of life was simply communicating to an inanimate system the principle of vitality, or animal life, and the idea of human philosophy, that at the creation a house of clay was formed, and a soul or immortal spirit was brought from some other region of the universe to inherit it, vanishes from the mind. The poet says, "press to thy native skies," and the heathen believe in the doctrine of a metempsycosis, or transfer of the soul from one habitation or body to another; both ideas are based on human reasoning, and not on scripture.—The scriptural principle being established, we at once perceive that when a man's life is extinct, the power of vitality which sets in motion the machinery of the body and mind, and induces consciousness, is lost; consequently all the functions of body and mind cease their action; and there can no more be thought, and feeling, and motion, and consciousness in the man after vitality ceases, than there could be after his formation, prior to receiving the breath of life; for all sensation and consciousness depend on the organism of the man excited by vital action.

I have dwelt thus long on this point because I consider it fundamental; and if we entertain clearly the scriptural view on this point, we shall be better prepared to appreciate a biblical argument on the whole subject. Now the question occurs, what significance is to be attached to the sentence of death as pronounced on the man? Gen. 3. "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." (mar. dying, thou shalt die.) Gen. 2: 17. In explanation of this sentence the Lord tells Adam, that after a life of toil and suffering, he would drop again into his original dust, or as the wise man expresses it, "Then shall the dust return to the earth, as it was; and the spirit (or breath of life) shall return unto God who gave it."—Death, i. e. the privation of life is simply reversing the process of man's creation; There is a return both of the body and of the spirit to their original state. The dust returns to the earth as it was, prior to the organization of the system; and the spirit or breath of life, or in other words principle of animal life, returns to the fountain whence it came; i. e. as God gave life at first, he takes it away at death. If the spirit be conscious and enjoying an independent existence subsequently to its release from the body, then by parity of reasoning, it was conscious and enjoying an independent existence antecedently to its connection with the body; for certainly if the fact that the spirit returns to God proves that it exists as a conscious being in His presence, then the fact that it came from God proves that it existed as a conscious being in His presence before its connection with the body. But the scripture gives no such intimation. It presents not the idea that a living, immortal soul entered as a tenant into the corporeal frame of the man, to be liberated again at death; the idea of scripture is, the lifeless man became a living soul, not admitted within himself a living or immortal soul. But the sentence of death, some conceive, cannot touch the soul, for that is immortal. [illegible]

[illegible] the scriptures? "The soul that sinneth IT shall die." Ezek. 18: 4. Here the principles of philosophy and the teachings of the word are in direct antagonism. If the soul be immortal, its essential condition is, that it can never die; but if we examine critically many passages of holy writ, we shall find abundant testimony to the contrary. Turn to the passage quoted, also 20th and 27th vs. of the same chap. Prov. 16: 17, "The highway of the upright is to depart from evil; he that keepeth his way preserveth his soul." Job 33: 22, 28 and 30, "Yea, his soul draweth near unto the grave, and his life to the destroyers." "He will deliver his soul from going into the pit, and his life shall see the light." "To bring back his soul from the pit, to be enlightened with the light of the living." I might refer to a great variety of passages, but a few are sufficient. The 33d ch. of Job is decisive on this point. It is here clearly represented, that in case of pain and disease the soul draws near to the grave; which could not be the case if it were immortal, and not subject to death. Ps. 49 is very clear and expressive. "None of them can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him: (for the redemption of their soul is precious, and it ceaseth for ever:) that he should still live forever, and not see corruption. Like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them; and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning; and their beauty shall consume in the grave from their dwelling.—But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave: for he shall receive me. Selah."—Vs. 7–9, and 14, 15. It represents that all the wealth, the abundant treasures of the wicked cannot save them from death. No one with all his riches can redeem his dearest friend, that he should still live and not see corruption in the grave; for the redemption of the soul (life) is too precious to be purchased with money. Although they may arrive at all the opulence and splendor and aggrandizement of the world, yet their pleasures are transient. Like the beasts they perish, "like sheep they are laid in the grave;" "but," says the Psalmist, "God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave. Here the contrast is brought to view, and it is this, that while the wicked will ultimately be consumed by death, and no final redemption of their souls is promised, the righteous through the merits of Him who died to redeem their souls from the power of the grave, have hope of deliverance when the Redeemer shall come; and then they will sing, "O grave where is thy victory, O death where is thy sting." If these references do not prove that the soul is liable to death, and to come under the power of the grave, then to my mind language is powerless to prove any thing. We never read in scripture of an immortal, imperishable, or undying soul, or of a soul that can never die, or that must live forever, and be in its existence parallel to the throne of God, &c., &c. Indeed immortality is never applied, in any form, to the sinner out of Christ, either in relation to his mind, or spirit, or soul, or other attribute. On the contrary the opposite truth is clearly revealed.

An evasion of this truth is sometimes resorted to by saying the death of the soul is spiritual; and it has passed into a proverbial expression, that the sentence of the Adamic law was "death temporal, death spiritual, and death eternal." To the idea of its being spiritual death, there are some considerations which are fatal. 1. It is explained in Gen. to be returning unto the DUST, which certainly is not spiritual death. 2. "As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive," 1 Cor. 15: 22.—"Therefore as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." The one assertion is as broad as the other; and both include all mankind; therefore it is inevitable, if it be spiritual death, that spiritual life must be the inheritance of all men. 3. If it be spiritual death, i. e. death in trespasses and sins, the penalty of the law demanded is sin, and not punishment. It is as if a law were enacted, that those who indulged freely in intoxicating liquors should be intemperate men; or that those who hold slaves, should be slaveholders. Intemperance and slaveholding are crimes, and not punishments; so being dead in trespasses and sins is the crime, and not the punishment of the sinner. 4. To make the law honorable its demands must be fully met; and as Jesus was without sin and never spiritually dead in trespasses and sin, He could not have paid the price of redemption in that sense. Here let me remark, that formerly I could never understand the true relation of the atonement to the demands of the law; I could not see how Christ stepped in, in place of the transgressor, and presented a vicarious sacrifice, dying "the just for the unjust," "being made a curse for us," &c.; but with my present views, the nature of the atonement opens in a clear, rational and beautiful light. I can now see how He is the "Savior of all men;" how "as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive;" how He made "propitiation for the sins of the whole world;" how "judgment came upon all men unto justification of life," how infants can be saved, &c.; for the penalty of the law being natural death, He suffered it by "pouring out His soul unto death," and thus abolished death, or took off the Adamic penalty from the whole human race; or rather, I should say, purchased their ransom from the power of the grave. Hence it is said, "He rose again for our justification," i. e. He thus showed forth victory over death in vindicating the sinner's cause. Hence, also, He says, "I am He that liveth and was dead; and behold I am alive forevermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell (hades the grave) and of death," Rev. 1: 18. There is such a beauty, simplicity and harmony on this subject, I desire the reader might be favored with that divine illumination, which will present it to him in the clear, vivid light of scripture truth. It would then appear obvious, that being redeemed from the Adamic penalty, the infant cannot be condemned at the resurrection; for being delivered from the first death, occasioned by the sin of Adam, and not having personally sinned, it cannot be consigned to the second death.

But the question comes up, might it not be eternal death, or in other words, endless sufferings? Reasons already assigned in relation to spiritual death, bear also on this point. If an atonement were made by vicarious suffering, then the suffering endured, in order to make it vicarious, must precisely meet the case. Hence whatever death our blessed Redeemer endured, the same must answer the demand of the law, and be the identical death to which the sinner is condemned. Now at a glance we see it was not endless misery: it was the death of the cross; for the scripture assures us He was made "a curse for us; for it is written cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree," and again, "Who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree," 1 Pet. 2: 24; and again, "Forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the Devil," Heb. 2: 14. "Without the shedding of blood there is no remission." Hence the life of the Savior was offered instead of that of the transgressor. This is all simple and plain, without any of that mysterism which attaches to the theology of our day. Truth is always simple and clear when in God's light we see light.

Bro. Merriam:—In examining some books at the Library of the Theological Seminary, Andover, I came across one entitled "State of the Church in future ages. By W. H. London, 1684."

In speaking of Rev. 10: 4, the author translates thus: "Seal up those things which the seven thunders have uttered; and thou shalt write them hereafter." He thinks that John was to write something else first, and afterwards write what the seven thunders uttered. May it not be so?

W.

I do not know upon what authority this author thus translates the passage, I find nothing in the Greek, nor in Murdock's translation of the Syriac, that would favor such a version.

ED.

☞ We have received a letter from Bro. Hiram Bishop, of West Meriden, Conn., stating that his family is suffering for want of the necessaries of life. We are informed by Bro. Adrian, that he is a worthy Bro. and that he labors under infirmities. It is one of the plainest duties of Christianity to give to him that needeth. We hope, therefore, Brethren will obey the injunction, and communicate of their substance as the Lord hath prospered them.

This notice would have been given sooner; but it seemed advisable to wait until further information was received through Bro. Adrian.

☞ Bro. Scott: I will endeavor to be at the Camp-Meeting at Vernon, Vt.—Come my Brethren—come all, let us have a great and good meeting.

EDWIN BURNHAM.

☞ Our paper is so much filled up with notices, that we would request Brethren to write notices of Tent-Meetings, &c., as concisely as possible.

SOUTH BOSTON, MASS., July 20, '54.

Dear Brother Merriam:—I feel I must write you a few lines from this place; for I believe God is about to pour out His spirit of love upon this ungodly city.—This being the first correspondence from this part of Boston, you have received, I will throw out a few hints in regard to the people and place, (for you will soon hear from this quarter shoutings and rejoicings.) There are but three persons out of many thousands, who firmly believe in the Lord's appointed time; and we have been obliged the past year, to walk a distance of some two and a half miles, (back and forth,) to Chapman Hall to hear the truth. There is no Hall in this place but what is occupied nor has there been for two years past; but I have, (for one,) had faith in God's word (since I have been convinced on the subject of time, and the speedy coming of our Lord,) that He would open a way for us to have the glorious truth proclaimed to this people. He has answered my prayers; and I have been able to rent a small church, (on my own responsibility, of course, Bro., for you know no one in these days of prejudice would lend a hand to help the fanatics, as we are termed everywhere,) a fortnight since. It has been occupied by the Free-will Baptists. And now the Lord has sent to us Bro. Brittan, (who came to see me after the services at Chapman Hall, last Sabbath evening,) who feels that there is work to be done. If the Lord will, he will preach here next Sabbath, July 23d, and continue for the present. One thing I must not omit here; for it accords with my own views; the prospect here to any but a true child of God, is anything but inviting; great opposition, only a very few to go to worship, nothing but poverty held out as an inducement to preach the word, (for we are hard working individuals,) but the dear brother seeing all these circumstances, says, he has no doubt but this is the place for him to stop. Now, my Bro., I give God all the glory. I believe He is the same God in So. Boston, as in any other place; all that is required is the faith that will stand in the hour of trial, that will overcome all opposition, prejudice, and every other weapon the enemy may bring against us. I feel that He is about to work a great work here in So. Boston, and many sinners will cry out "Lord have mercy." I rather like this great opposition, to see the clouds look dark and dreary, and even to have every avenue closed to all appearance, against this work. It looks favorable to me, very much so, for the darkest time is just before day, and our necessity is God's opportunity. O my brother, when we look at the scenes now transpiring among the nations of earth, the time of trial that is coming on us all, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness? We cannot get along without the Crisis, those little refreshing hymn books also, we must have. They are full of life, and will cheer up at any time, the poor desponding soul. May God bless you in your great labor of love, and may He give to us all that spirit that will enable us to sacrifice time, talent, all we have, all we are, to His service. I have laid all on the altar, and am bound for the kingdom, expecting, (at the longest,) to be there at the close of the spring of 1855.

Your brother in Christ,

WILLIAM WOOD.

CHOLERA IN LOWELL. We understand from good medical authority that, notwithstanding reports to the contrary in the newspapers, something like a dozen cases of Asiatic cholera have occurred in this city within four weeks past—we mean cases which our best physicians have pronounced to be of cholera. No alarm is entertained, however, that the disease will rage to any serious extent here. It is well, nevertheless, that the public should know the truth.

☞ In last week's paper I made a remark in respect to distributing my receipts which, it is thought, might be understood as referring to the receipts for the Crisis. I meant simply my own personal income for services, whether from the Office or from labors in the vineyard.

☞ It is stated in a letter quoted by the Parliamento of Turin, of the 2d, that the tomb of Odoacer, king of the Heruli, has been discovered at Ravenna by some workmen, who, it appears, found the body encased in a suit of armor of gold, which they broke into pieces and sold.

☞ 30 to 40 cholera deaths occur in Montreal daily.

NEW DISCOVERIES AT NINEVEH. The London Assyrian Excavation Society has just issued a most satisfactory report of the progress of their agent in Babylonia. The following extract is of the highest interest:

"In addition to the discoveries mentioned by Mr Loftus, the Committee have to announce that a new palace has been found at Nineveh, in the mound of Kouyunjik, of which Colonel Rawlinson reports in the following terms:

"'A most beautiful palace has been recently discovered at Nineveh, belonging to the son of Esar Haddon. The sculptures are infinitely superior in variety of subject, in artistic treatment, and in skill and delicacy of execution, to every thing which has been before found. The palace, also, is of great extent, containing, perhaps, five hundred sculptured slabs, and the marbles are generally in a good state of preservation.'

"In another letter he adds:

"'The new palace is by far the most magnificent thing yet discovered in Assyria.—Each hall, room, and passage is devoted to a separate subject, and where the series is complete, and the sculpture well preserved, as not unfrequently happens, is of extraordinary interest. In fact, the variety of subject, artistic grouping and treatment, high relief, richness of detail, and delicacy of execution, entitle the palace to be reckoned the chef-d'œuvre of Assyrian art. Some of the pavement slabs are most superb, and the animals, trees, and flowers, even the human figures, are much more natural and free from conventionalities than in any of the earlier palaces. There are between two and three hundred sculptured slabs already uncovered, and not above one half of the palace is yet explored.

"'Colossal bulls and lions there are none, but monsters, centaurs, hippogryphs, etc, there are as many as you please.

"'At one of the entrances there are a pair of round ornamented pedestals, which certainly supported columns; but as there are no remains of such columns, they must have been formed, I suppose, of wood.

"'On one slab there is a city with a double wall, and within, a temple, faced with a row of columns supported on the backs of animals.—On another there is a mound, on the top of which is a castle, and, to give more extent to the upper platform, a causeway is run out from the top of the masonry, with sharp-pointed arches stretching down the side of the mound.'

"Another private letter from a gentleman residing at Mosul, speaks in the same terms of praise of these new discoveries, and adds some further particulars regarding the subjects of the sculptures. In speaking of the slab representing the palace or temple alluded to above, he says: 'It represents very minutely the exterior architecture. The second story is built with pillars, which have their bases on the backs of lions and human-headed bulls, with their heads turned like those found at Khorsabad.' He also mentions the representation of a bridge with three pointed arches, and other particulars illustrative of the architecture of the period.

"One of the best executed slabs represents a lion-hunt. 'In this scene,' he says, 'the king is the principal huntsman, and is in the act of striking a lance into a lion springing upon his chariot, whilst seven others, already pierced by many arrows, some of which are dead, and others dying, are most beautifully and naturally portrayed upon the slabs. On another slab they have represented a park, with an open gate, through which is seen the king hunting lions, executed on a very minute scale, as if they intended it to appear far in the distance.'

"He concludes by saying 'that the art displayed in the treatment of both men and animals in these bas-reliefs surpasses every thing discovered in the ruins of Assyria.'

"The Committee take this opportunity of calling the attention of the subscribers to the progress recently made in the deciphering of the inscriptions, which comprise the identification of all the Assyrian kings mentioned in the Bible, of many of those whose names occur in profane history, extending the chronology of Assyria to a period of about two thousand years before Christ. An almost perfect series of the names of the ancient kings of Assyria has also been discovered, and numerous illustrations of the sacred Scriptures, of the highest interest."

AFFAIRS IN ST. PETERSBURG. An American writes from St. Petersburg to the New Bedford Mercury as follows:—

Since my arrival here, on the 10th of June, I have been waiting for the attack of Sir Charles Napier upon Cronstadt, and it has been hourly expected. But not an English or French sail has been seen from Cronstadt until this morning, when a large division of the fleet was seen approaching slowly. I hasten to give you this information, and if a battle takes place, I will lose no time in communicating the particulars. The fortifications at Cronstadt are very strong, and Napier will have a warm reception. English boasting produces considerable merriment here. Of one thing I can assure you; the war is very popular with all classes here, and the stories which you hear of revolutions here and of Imperial extortions, are all utterly false.

The English papers are guilty of fabricating all sorts of reports, to which no credit is to be given. It may sound odd, but the Russians of St. Petersburg call the English barbarians. They say: "If the English feel bound to protect Turkey, why do they not go to Constantinople?—Why do they come upon our Finland coast, to kill innocent people, burn little villages, destroy private property, and take away small vessels belonging to poor peasants? And this they do where no troops are quartered, and where there cannot be the least resistance. These are the acts of barbarians." There is some truth in these remarks. To see little villages, unprotected and unoffending, totally destroyed with many of their inhabitants, for pretended protection of Turkey, suggests only cowardice to the American mind.—Why do the Allies send so large a fleet to the Baltic, to be employed in destroying small towns? Why not try their hand at Revel, Riga, Hessenfort, Cronstadt? We begin to think here that Napier does not dare to come within range of the Russian guns, for, though he is now in sight, many think that it will be mere rashness to engage his ships with the batteries of Cronstadt. I shall go down to the fortress to-morrow, and in my next shall be better prepared to give you some interesting information.

TREATY WITH RUSSIA. A treaty has been concluded by Mr Marcy, with the Russian Charge d'Affaires [illegible] neutrality in the present [illegible] as a principle of National [illegible] free ships make free goods.

The Bombardment of San Juan, or Greytown, is an event which seems to attract little public attention; and yet it is one of striking significance and interest, as indicative of the foreign policy of our Government. As at present advised, as the lawyers say, it looks to us like a very contemptible affair in more respects than one. In the first place, we had no cause of quarrel which would justify the expenditure of an ounce of powder. The allegation is, that our Minister to Central America, Mr. Borland, was insulted in San Juan some two or three months ago; but by whom and precisely how, we have never yet been officially informed.

In May last, a certain Capt. Smith, an American, murdered, or shot, a native of Nicaragua, and fleeing from justice, took under the wing of Mr. Borland, who happened to be at San Juan on his way home. The authorities of San Juan demanded that Capt Smith should be given up for trial; but Mr. Borland volunteered to protect him from arrest, on the ground, if we remember rightly—for, as we have said, no other than an exparte, unofficial account of the transaction has ever been given to the public—that the government at San Juan was no government at all, or not a government which could properly be entrusted with the disposal of such a case; and during a scuffle which ensued, Mr. Borland was hit—but not hurt—by some unlawful and undiplomatic Nicaraguan missile, against the peace and dignity of the United States, and the honor of one of her ministers plenipo. To obtain due redress for this national indignity and personal insult, our government sent down the Cyane, with instructions to Capt. Hollins to demand such an apology as should heal Mr. Borland's wounded honor and retrieve the national insult. The Cyane went, as it appears; and the apology was demanded and refused—whereupon Capt. Hollins bombarded the town.—There were but few houses, and the population being small, took to the woods, and left the brave commander of the Cyane to have all the fight by himself. He cannonaded away for two or three hours, with no more resistance than Don Quixote received from the windmills. The town was easily demolished, and Capt. Hollins, fearing that if the pieces were saved, some stain of the insult might remain, ordered his Lieut to go ashore and burn them up—which he did accordingly, so that, as we are told, not a vestige of the saucy city remains.

We are curious to see what sort of a story our Government will make out; to justify this mean and most unworthy act, Capt. Hollins, it is said, was instructed to do as he did. For his sake we hope he was, for the honor of our country we hope he was not.—[Bost. Traveller.

TENT MEETING.

There will be a Tent Meeting in Dartmouth, Mass., near Fance's Corner, commencing on Wednesday, August 9, at 5 o'clock, P. M., and continuing over the Sabbath. Brethren coming by Railroad will stop at the head of the River, about four miles from N. Bedford. Bo[illegible]ding on the ground. Let there be a genera[illegible] rally of those who are looking for the Lord. Bro F. H. Berick and J. Couch will be present with the new Tent. Brother Hemenway, and other preaching brethren will be in attendance.

Provisions will be made for board and lodging on the ground. Those who come by way of Boston can obtain Railroad tickets at a reduced price by applying to Bro. Geo. T. Adams, No 167 Hanover st., Boston.

Protestant and Papal Crime. The Boston Traveller, on good authority, publishes the following important statistics, suggestive enough to the reflecting mind:

In England four persons for a million, on the average, are committed for murders per year. In Ireland there are nineteen to the million.—In Belgium, a Catholic country, there are eighteen murders to the million. In France there are thirty one. Passing into Austria we find thirty-six. In Bavaria, also Catholic, sixty-eight to the million; or if homicides are struck out there will be thirty. Going into Italy, where Catholic influence is the strongest of any country on earth, and taking first the kingdom of Sardinia, we find twenty murders to the million. In the Venetian and Milanese provinces there is the enormous result of forty-five to the million. In Tuscany, forty-two, though that land is claimed as a kind of earthly paradise; and, in the Papal States, not less than one hundred murders for the million of people. There are ninety in Sicily; and in Naples the result is more appalling still, where public documents show there are two hundred murders per year to the million of people!

Great Mortality—New York, July 23d. The report of the City Inspector shows that 182 men and 178 women, 313 boys and 242 girls, making a total of 915 persons, died during the week ending last evening. This shows an increase of mortality amounting to 98 cases in seven days. Of the gross number 183 deaths were by cholera. In the same week, ending 22d July, 1849, the deaths in the city were 1409, of which 714 were caused by cholera.—47 adults died of diarrhœa, 24 of various fevers, and 51 of inflammatory affectations, consumption 59, two by sun stroke. The mortality among the infants was very large: 538 of the deceased children were under ten years of age, of whom 317 had not completed their first year. 145 children died of cholera infantum, 70 of convulsions, and croup 6.

"Great and Important Events." Washington, July 27.—The signs of the times indicate great and important events in embryo.—The message to the House in March last, by the President, relating to the Spanish difficulty, has since rested quietly with the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that body finding nothing to justify hasty legislation, or any thing that could not be easily arranged by negotiation. From that time it is thought the Administration has desired to have another message; but no opportunity has offered till the recent movement in Spain seemed to open a way for the easy acquisition of Cuba by purchase, or seek the redress of Americans.—[Boston Trav.

Cholera at the Poor House.—Buffalo, 21st.—In consequence of various rumors concerning a large number of deaths by cholera at the Poor House in this city, a large party of physicians and citizens visited the house to-day, and found everything connected with the establishment in the most horrible condition;—within 24 hours, 18 insane persons and 7 others had died of cholera, and four more were in a collapsed state. The house was found to be so foul and filthy, that it was almost impossible for persons to enter it. The inmates are in the most awful condition imaginable. On inquiry, it was found that they had been kept on insufficient food, and that of the worst quality.

Bermuda—Cholera.—We understand at Hamilton on the 12th inst., that Lieut. Colonel Freeman Murray, of the 72d Regiment, had been appointed Governor of the Bermudas. [illegible] Cockburn Harvey had resigned the office of Receiver General of Bermuda, and A. S. M. Gilbert would be promoted to the vacancy.—The accounts from Barbadoes represent the cholera as raging to an unprecedented extent. About 2,200 had died in the small city of Bridgetown in less than twenty days, and on the last day (12th of June,) that we have a report, there were 244 victims.

Later from Europe.

Withdrawal of the Fleet from Cronstadt.—Serious Distrust of Austria.—The Czar's Letter.—The Russians again Defeated on the Danube.—The Spanish Insurrection.

By the Pacific at New York Wednesday we have four days later advices from Europe—dates to the 12th inst.

The fleet has been withdrawn from Cronstadt without action. Prussia has sent a special envoy to Austria to urge her to refrain from further steps with the allies, and also to unite with Prussia in new negotiations for peace. Very strong suspicions are entertained as to the faith of Austria towards the allies—that power, it is said, at the instance of Prussia, having countermanded the advance of her army into Wallachia.

The Russians are not in a hurry to evacuate Wallachia. On the contrary, the Czar's letter to Prussia says that under any circumstances he insists on retaining the line of the Sereth for strategetic reasons. Considerable mystification still hangs over the diplomatic relations of the Powers. Austria has again resorted to mediation, and it is expected that a fortnight will elapse before the next phase of the negotiations transpires.

At Giurgevo on the 5th of July the Turks crossed the river in force, and meeting the Russians, a battle ensued. The latter lost 500 killed and wounded. The Russians still occupy the Bank of the Danube from the Aluta downwards. The French and English continue to concentrate between Varna and Schumla, 50,000 men are now there. Austria announces a new voluntary loan of 5,000,000 florins, at 95 for 5 per cents, specie dividends.

Greece is quite tranquil. Montenegro professes friendship towards Austria. The allied fleets were at Balchik, doing nothing.

The details of the Spanish Insurrection are conflicting, but it appears certain that the Insurgents maintain themselves, although the country does not rise in their favor.

On the 8th, after a long struggle, the Turks got possession of the Islands of Mokan and Oineka, and subsequently Giurgevo. The Russians were totally defeated on the Wallachian territory. Prince Gortschakoff is forming a camp of 30,000 men between Bucharest and the Danube.

Telegraphic despatches from Dantzic state that Sir Charles Napier had returned with the fleet to Baro Sound. The cholera was raging at Cronstadt, and the Admiral was unwilling to keep his men unnecessarily in the neighborhood.

The Herald states that they have good reason for supposing that an authorized agent of the United States has arrived from Washington, on his way to Madrid, empowered to offer for the purchase of Cuba.

It is telegraphed from Berlin that Count De Konigmark will be the bearer of a Prussian note, and will proceed at once to Vienna.—Prussia, in this document, insists on Austria joining the Berlin Cabinet in proposing fresh negotiations of peace. Continental letters express doubts as to the intentions of Austria, and state their belief that the real difficulties of the war are now only commenced; also, that if Austria could secure the free navigation of the Danube, her further opposition to Russia will be doubtful.

Later.

More Fighting on the Danube.

By the Africa, at New York, Thursday, we have three days later advices from Europe—dates to the 15th inst.

It is now confirmed that the Russians have received counter-orders, and will not quit Wallachia, and the Austrians have, for the present, entirely relinquished their intention to peaceably occupy the principalities.

We have no new facts as to the progress of the Prussian Austrian negotiation. It is believed that all the smaller German States will adhere to the Austro-Prussian Convention.—The feeling in England, with respect to these new complications, is decidedly uneasy.

There has been considerable fighting on the Danube. The Paris Presse states that on the 7th of July the Turks took Moken and Olneika Islands, and on the 8th Omer Pasha, with 40,000 men, surrounded the Russians and took Giurgevo. The Russians cut their way through with a loss of 900. General Shurtliff lost an arm.

It is clear that the Turks have assumed offensive measures, and with the reserve of the Anglo-French, the first divisions of whom are now at Rutschuk, will probably risk a pitched battle. Prince Gortschakoff was advancing at last accounts with 30,000 men, by forced marches, towards Giurgevo. 15,000 Anglo-French troops being at Rutschuk, it is thought that the Turks will risk a pitched battle. The Turks have also crossed in the face of the Russians at Oltenitza. 150 wagons with wounded, have already arrived at Bucharest. Among the wounded are eighty officers. The battle lasted nearly twelve hours. On evacuating Giurgevo, the Russians burned some of their ships.

The Black Sea fleet was last seen proceeding from Odessa in the direction of Sebastopol. Sir Charles Napier's fleet, with cholera on board, had gone to anchor on Bomersund Bay.

It is stated in a despatch from Berlin that Austria will finally summon Russia to evacuate the Principalities within a month, and will occupy Wallachia without waiting for an answer.

The cholera or diarrhœa of a very bad kind appears to have broken out in the Baltic fleet.—Thirty men have died in the Austerlitz, seven in the Duke, and a few in other ships.

An effective blockade of the Gulf of Finland was announced from and after the 20th of June. An imperial decree, published by the Paris Moniteur, confers on Omer Pasha the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor.

Redschid Pacha had resumed the Turkish Ministry of foreign affairs. The ex-ministers of Greece are indicted for malversation of the public money, to foster the recent insurrection.

The Emperor Napoleon is witnessing the embarkation of the French army at Boulogne and Calais, for the Baltic. He reviewed the troops, and issued the following proclamation to the army, amid loud shouts:

"Soldiers, Russia having forced us to a war, France has armed 500,000 of her children.—England has also called out a considerable number of troops. To-day, our troops and armies, united for the same cause, are combined in the Baltic as well as the Black Sea. I have selected you to be the first to those regions of the North. English vessels will convey you there; a unique fact in history, which proves the intimate alliance of the two governments, not to abstain from any sacrifice to defend the right of the weak, the liberty of Europe, and the national honor. Go, my children; attentive Europe openly or secretly offers up vows for your triumph. Our country, proud of a struggle which threatens the aggressor only, accompanies you with its ardent vows, and I, whom imperious duties retain still distant from the scene of events, shall have my eyes upon you. I shall be able to say, they are worthy sons of the conquerors of Austerlitz, of Eylau, of Friedland, and of Moscow. May God protect you. Napoleon."

News from Spain is very imperfect. The insurgents, however, seem to maintain themselves under Generals Serrano, O'Donnell, and Dulce. They number 5000, and are going towards Andalusia. Some movements favoring them have occurred in Valencia. One engagement had taken place in Valencia between the insurgents and the Queen's troops, in which [illegible] [illegible] prisoners was taken, and the chief of the insurgents killed.

The reconciliation of Switzerland and Austria is now unequivocally verified.

It is noticed that the Sultan will visit Omar Pacha's head-quarters, and afterwards proceed to Silestria to distribute rewards to the brave defenders of the fortress.

Cholera still prevails at St. Petersburg and Cronstadt. At St. Petersburg, June 28th, the police report states the number of cases to be 405. On the first of July there were 580.

Asiatic cholera had broken out on board the Australian emigrant ship Dirigo, and the ship put back to Liverpool with 60 deaths.

Irish Riot at Portland. The Portland papers give accounts of an Irish row in that city. The Argus says: "The watch were attracted by the strange behavior of three persons, one of whom carried a bag, and appeared to be going toward the hill. The watch immediately followed them, and upon their discovering that the watch was following them ran to nearly the centre of the open ground between Monument and Congress streets, where they were overtaken. It was here discovered that they had been decoyed, as by the flashes of lightning they could distinguish a body of about 20 or 30 Irishmen, who made an attack upon them. They thereupon attempted to arrest the persons who decoyed them, but were unable from the superiority of numbers. One of the watch named Fairbanks was knocked down and badly beaten. The other, named Wyman, did not fare much better."

Terrible Hurricane. On Thursday last a fearful hurricane visited Davenport, Ill. The steamer Ben Franklin had her pipes blown down. The steamers Golden Gate and Emma Harmon, had their entire upper cabins blown off, and on the latter two persons were killed. A canoe containing three persons was capsized, and all are supposed to have been lost. The store of Wickenham & Son was blown down, and nine persons buried in the ruins. Seven were taken out alive, but the other two, supposed to be females, had not been extricated.

Revolution in England. While Spain is in the throes of a revolution, signs are not wanting of a general breaking up of the present order of things in England at no remote day. The Church is going down; and "with the Established Church," as Lord John Russel once said, "the hereditary monarchy and hereditary aristocracy stand or fall."—Lowell Journal.

☞ Mr McKenna, pastor of the James Street Catholic Church, New York, fell suddenly dead at the chapel, of heart complaint, on Friday. Other sudden deaths also occurred in that city.

☞ An earthquake occurred at Panama on the 10th inst., which caused considerable damage.

Obituary.

Portland, July 29, 1854.

Dear Bro Merriam.—By request of others, it has devolved on me to write an obituary notice of a departed Bro. in Christ for the Crisis. Bro. Joseph D Farnum, of this city, died of the cholera on the night of the 26th inst, after an illness of about seven hours, during which he suffered extremely from the cramping tortures of that disease. And although not with him in his last moments, I am told he appeared to be perfectly [illegible] expressed a wish to be at rest. "And I heard a voice from Heaven saying unto me, 'Write, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them.'" Amen and Amen. He rests from his labors, and is delivered from the time of trouble, "Such as never was since there was a nation." Yet his absence makes Portland lonely, and the household of faith a house of mourning; but we sorrow not as those without hope—we cannot—

"O hope, sweet hope, thou hast not failed,—
But borne us on our way,
And will, we're sure, still buoy us on,
'Till night shall end in day."

May we be followers of him in good works, even as he followed our Lord and his Apostles. His house has long been a "Pilgrim's tavern" as many of our Brethren can attest, and he has now left a mourning household consisting of a wife and five children: for it was announced to me a few minutes ago, that the youngest child of our deceased Brother, named Samuel R. Farnum, died this morning about six o'clock of the same disease. He was four years and one month old. It is hoped that God's stewards will, in this case, remember the widow and the fatherless; for he that giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord. Our beloved Brother was one of the two first ones that sounded the midnight cry in this city; and has been regarded (especially by the Brethren) as at the head of the cause in this city, and one of its main pillars in the Church. As a Brother beloved in Christ his loss cannot be estimated; and as a citizen he was respected and esteemed by all who knew him.

By request of Bro. E. C. Stiles the appointments for meetings in [illegible], Bean's Corner, Jey and Hebron are withdrawn. The appointments were made by request of D. C. Wheeler, who was to assist at those places. But it has been ascertained that D. C. Wheeler is a man whose private life does not correspond with his public profession; consequently the meetings will not be holden.

Springfield, July 23, 1854.

Brother Merriam:—It is the wish of the Brethren that are looking confidently for the coming of Jesus this year, also it is the wish of those that are favorable to the coming of Jesus nigh, that there might be a Tent-Meeting held in this city. Cannot Brother J. Cummings come here with his tent, also Brethren E. Burnham, F. H. Berick, J. Couch. We should be glad to have this meeting, the Lord willing, as soon as convenient. We will provide a suitable place for the gathering, and do all that we are able to give the inhabitants of Springfield a chance to hear this last message that is now being sounded through the land. There is an increasing desire to hear about the coming of Christ this year in this city. Will Brother J. Cummings let us know when he can come with his tent, the Lord willing, and let it be known in the World's Crisis. May the Lord give the Brethren, that are interested in this movement, wisdom how to act, and may we all realize that what is done must be done quickly.

Let the letters and communications be carefully read over, corrected, and if need be re-written, punctuated and prepared for the press, so far as the writer has ability so to do. If, however, the writer does not understand punctuation, &c., the Editor's pen will aid, and if possible more so, to enable the humblest member of the flock to bring his or her sentiments and feelings before the public, as those who have been favored with higher educational advantages, provided only they write under the influence of the Spirit of God.

The Bombardment of San Juan, or Greytown, is an event which seems to attract little public attention; and yet it is one of striking significance and interest, as indicative of the foreign policy of our Government. As at present advised, as the lawyers say, it looks to us like a very contemptible affair in more respects than one. In the first place, we had no cause of quarrel which would justify the expenditure of an ounce of powder. The allegation is, that our Minister to Central America, Mr. Borland, was insulted in San Juan some two or three months ago; but by whom and precisely how, we have never yet been officially informed.

In May last, a certain Capt. Smith, an American, murdered, or shot, a native of Nicaragua, and fleeing from justice, took under the wing of Mr. Borland, who happened to be at San Juan on his way home. The authorities of San Juan demanded that Capt Smith should be given up for trial; but Mr. Borland volunteered to protect him from arrest, on the ground, if we remember rightly—for, as we have said, no other than an exparte, unofficial account of the transaction has ever been given to the public—that the government at San Juan was no government at all, or not a government which could properly be entrusted with the disposal of such a case; and during a scuffle which ensued, Mr. Borland was hit—but not hurt—by some unlawful and undiplomatic Nicaraguan missile, against the peace and dignity of the United States, and the honor of one of her ministers plenipo. To obtain due redress for this national indignity and personal insult, our government sent down the Cyane, with instructions to Capt. Hollins to demand such an apology as should heal Mr. Borland's wounded honor and retrieve the national insult. The Cyane went, as it appears; and the apology was demanded and refused—whereupon Capt. Hollins bombarded the town.—There were but few houses, and the population, being small, took to the woods, and left the brave commander of the Cyane to have all the fight by himself. He cannonaded away for two or three hours, with no more resistance than Don Quixote received from the windmills. The town was easily demolished, and Capt. Hollins, fearing that if the pieces were saved, some stain of the insult might remain, ordered his Lieut to go ashore and burn them up—which he did accordingly, so that, as we are told, not a vestige of the saucy city remains.

We are curious to see what sort of a story our Government will make out; to justify this mean and most unworthy act, Capt. Hollins, it is said, was instructed to do as he did. For his sake we hope he was, for the honor of our country we hope he was not.—[Bost. Traveller.

TENT MEETING.

There will be a Tent Meeting in Dartmouth, Mass., near Fance's Corner, commencing on Wednesday, August 9, at 5 o'clock, P. M., and continuing over the Sabbath. Brethren coming by Railroad will stop at the head of the River, about four miles from N Bedford. Bo[ar]ding on the ground. Let there be a gener[al] rally of those who are looking for the Lord. Bro F. H. Berick and J. Couch will be present with the new Tent. Brother Hemenway, and other preaching brethren will be in attendance

Provisions will be made for board and lodging on the ground. Those who come by way of Boston can obtain Railroad tickets at a reduced price by applying to Bro. Geo. T Adams, No 167 Hanover st., Boston.

Protestant and Papal Crime. The Boston Traveller, on good authority, publishes the following important statistics, suggestive enough to the reflecting mind:

In England four persons for a million, on the average, are committed for murders per year. In Ireland there are nineteen to the million.—In Belgium, a Catholic country, there are eighteen murders to the million. In France there are thirty one. Passing into Austria we find thirty-six. In Bavaria, also Catholic, sixty-eight to the million; or if homicides are struck out there will be thirty. Going into Italy, where Catholic influence is the strongest of any country on earth, and taking first the kingdom of Sardinia, we find twenty murders to the million. In the Venetian and Milanese provinces there is the enormous result of forty-five to the million. In Tuscany, forty-two, though that land is claimed as a kind of earthly paradise; and, in the Papal States, not less than one hundred murders for the million of people. There are ninety in Sicily; and in Naples the result is more appalling still, where public documents show there are two hundred murders per year to the million of people!

Great Mortality—New York, July 23d. The report of the City Inspector shows that 182 men and 178 women, 313 boys and 242 girls, making a total of 915 persons, died during the week ending last evening. This shows an increase of mortality amounting to 98 cases in seven days. Of the gross number 183 deaths were by cholera. In the same week, ending 22d July, 1849, the deaths in the city were 1409, of which 714 were caused by cholera.—47 adults died of diarrhœa, 24 of various fevers, and 51 of inflamatory affectations, consumption 59, two by sun stroke. The mortality among the infants was very large: 538 of the deceased children were under ten years of age, of whom 317 had not completed their first year. 145 children died of cholera infantum, 70 of convulsions, and croup 6.

"Great and Important Events." Washington, July 27.—The signs of the times indicate great and important events in embryo.—The message to the House in March last, by the President, relating to the Spanish difficulty, has since rested quietly with the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that body finding nothing to justify hasty legislation, or any thing that could not be easily arranged by negotiation. From that time it is thought the Administration has desired to have another message; but no opportunity has offered till the recent movement in Spain seemed to open a way for the easy acquisition of Cuba by purchase, or seek the redress of Americans.—[Boston Trav.

Cholera at the Poor House.—Buffalo, 21st.—In consequence of various rumors concerning a large number of deaths by cholera at the Poor House in this city, a large party of physicians and citizens visited the house to-day, and found everything connected with the establishment in the most horrible condition;—within 24 hours, 18 insane persons and 7 others had died of cholera, and four more were in a collapsed state. The House was found to be so foul and filthy, that it was almost impossible for persons to enter it. The inmates are in the most awful condition imaginable. On inquiry, it was found that [illegible]

Letter from Europe.

Withdrawal of the Fleet from Cronstadt—Serious Distrust of Austria.—The Czar's Letter—The Russians again Defeated on the Danube.—The Spanish Insurrection.

By the Pacific at New York Wednesday we have four days later advices from Europe—dates to the 12th inst.

The fleet has been withdrawn from Cronstadt without action. Prussia has sent a special envoy to Austria to urge her to refrain from further steps with the allies, and also to unite with Prussia in new negotiations for peace. Very strong suspicions are entertained as to the faith of Austria towards the allies—that power, it is said, at the instance of Prussia, having countermanded the advance of her army into Wallachia.

The Russians are not in a hurry to evacuate Wallachia. On the contrary, the Czar's letter to Prussia says that under any circumstances he insists on retaining the line of the Sereth for strategetic reasons. Considerable mystification still hangs over the diplomatic relations of the Powers. Austria has again resorted to mediation, and it is expected that a fortnight will elapse before the next phase of the negotiations transpires.

At Guergovo on the 5th of July the Turks crossed the river in force, and meeting the Russians, a battle ensued. The latter lost 500 killed and wounded. The Russians still occupy the Bank of the Danube from the Aluta downwards. The French and English continue to concentrate between Varna and Schumla, 50,000 men are now there. Austria announces a new voluntary loan of 5,000,000 florins, at 95 for 5 per cents, specie dividends.

Greece is quite tranquil. Montenegro professes friendship towards Austria. The allied fleets were at Balchik, doing nothing.

The details of the Spanish Insurrection are conflicting, but it appears certain that the Insurgents maintain themselves, although the country does not rise in their favor.

On the 8th, after a long struggle, the Turks got possession of the Islands of Mokau and Oineka, and subsequently Giurgevo. The Russians were totally defeated on the Wallachian territory. Prince Gortschakoff is forming a camp of 30,000 men between Bucharest and the Danube.

Telegraphic despatches from Dantzic state that Sir Charles Napier had returned with the fleet to Baro Sound. The cholera was raging at Cronstadt, and the Admiral was unwilling to keep his men unnecessarily in the neighborhood.

The Herald states that they have good reason for supposing that an authorized agent of the United States has arrived from Washington, on his way to Madrid, empowered to offer for the purchase of Cuba.

It is telegraphed from Berlin that Count De Konigmark will be the bearer of a Prussian note, and will proceed at once to Vienna.—Prussia, in this document, insists on Austria joining the Berlin Cabinet in proposing fresh negotiations of peace. Continental letters express doubts as to the intentions of Austria, and state their belief that the real difficulties of the war are now only commenced; also, that if Austria could secure the free navigation of the Danube, her further opposition to Russia will be doubtful.

Later.

More Fighting on the Danube.

By the Africa, at New York, Thursday, we have three days later advices from Europe—dates to the 15th inst.

It is now confirmed that the Russians have received counter-orders, and will not quit Wallachia, and the Austrians have, for the present, entirely relinquished their intention to peaceably occupy the principalities.

We have no new facts as to the progress of the Prussian Austrian negotiation. It is believed that all the smaller German States will adhere to the Austro-Prussian Convention.—The feeling in England, with respect to these new complications, is decidedly uneasy.

There has been considerable fighting on the Danube. The Paris Presse states that on the 7th of July the Turks took Moken and Olneika Islands, and on the 8th Omer Pasha, with 40,000 men, surrounded the Russians and took Giurgevo. The Russians cut their way through with a loss of 900. General Shurtliff lost an arm.

It is clear that the Turks have assumed offensive measures, and with the reserve of the Anglo-French, the first divisions of whom are now at Rutschuk, will probably risk a pitched battle. Prince Gortschakoff was advancing at last accounts with 30,000 men, by forced marches, towards Giurgevo. 15,000 Anglo-French troops being at Rutschuk, it is thought that the Turks will risk a pitched battle. The Turks have also crossed in the face of the Russians at Oltenitza. 150 wagons with wounded, have already arrived at Bucharest. Among the wounded are eighty officers. The battle lasted nearly twelve hours. On evacuating Giurgevo, the Russians burned some of their ships.

The Black Sea fleet was last seen proceeding from Odessa in the direction of Sebastopol. Sir Charles Napier's fleet, with cholera on board, had gone to anchor on Bomersund Bay.

It is stated in a despatch from Berlin that Austria will finally summon Russia to evacuate the Principalities within a month, and will occupy Wallachia without waiting for an answer.
